Roosevelt was strong enough to defeat decisively the Platt-Odell-Quigg combination, and the Republican nominee for Governor will be satisfactory to the President. Charles F. Murphy won in New York, but Timothy D. Sullivan holds the balance of power. McClellan is much stronger than was supposed. Hearst was whipped unmercifully by McCareen in Brooklyn, which was the stronghold of the former last year, and in the other counties he did not make the showing expected.

Senator Bacon, who called Bryan's federal railway policy an advanced type of socialism, represents the State of Georgia in the United States Senate and is recognized as a Democratic leader of national reputation. "Conditions would be national under governmental ownership of railroads," said Senator Bacon, in discussing the Nebraska's doctrine. "By the use of the power of such a political machine any party controlling it would perpetuate itself in office and practically destroy the freedom of popular government. In its practical operation it would be the most extreme and radical measure of paternalistic socialism."

That judges should be named by lawyers, instead of by popular vote, has for centuries been a pet theory in a large part of the legal world. The bar of New York City has taken a step toward making this theory practical. The lawyers have named a ticket for the thirteen judicial vacancies to be filled in November, and, defying the regular parties, have gone before the people asking votes for their candidates. The party bosses have paid no attention to the lawyers, and in the regular way, have selected candidates of the regular kind. The issue in New York, therefore, will be squarely between lawyer-named candidates and boss-named candidates.

"Evidently Mr. Jerome considers it good politics to speak with contempt of his rival, Mr. Hearst, as a man lacking both brains and ideas. But is it?" questions the New York World. "It was the advice of Napoleon to his field marshals never to despise the enemy. Certainly it is easier to be flippant and sharp-tongued than convincing. As a matter of truth, Mr. Hearst is probably the cleverest politician in the State today, always excepting Theodore Roosevelt. He is extraordinarily able, and those of his opponents who minimize his ability and pooh-pooh his influence, like Mr. Jerome, are only deceiving themselves. Mr. Jerome needs to take warning against despising his adversary."

One of the interesting features of the New York campaign is the probability that ex-Congressman Francis Burton Harrison will be Tammany's candidate in the Eleventh District, now represented by William Randolph Hearst. It is expected that Hearst will put up his own candidate in opposition and supply him plentifully with ammunition. Harrison is himself a millionaire. He retired from Congress to run for Lieutenant-Governor of New York on the ticket headed by D. Cady Herrick, who is a son of Mrs. Burton Harrison, the novelist, and is a young man of promising ability. His lately deceased wife was Mary Crocker, daughter of the late C. Fred Crocker, of San Francisco.

The Union Labor party of San Francisco met in convention September 19, and, after adjourning as a convention and immediately reorganizing as a political club, endorsed Theodore Bell's nomination by the Democrats for Governor. On September 21 the same party held conventions in the Fourth and Fifth Congressional Districts and ratified and endorsed the action of the earlier gathering, which was denominated "The State Labor Convention" in the resolutions passed. In the Fourth District Andrew M. Wilson was nominated for railway commissioner and Joseph H. Scott was chosen candidate for the State Board of Equalization. These were endorsements of former Republican nominations.

Congressman Robert R. Hitt, of Illinois, died at his summer home at Narragansett Pier, L. I., September 20, aged 72. His wife and his two sons were with him. Robert R. Hitt was born in Ohio, but since his third year had been a resident of Illinois. In 1874-81 he was first United States secretary of legation and then Charge d'Affaires ad interim at Paris. For a short time in 1881 he was Assistant Secretary of State, but he has been a member of Congress ever since that year. In the summer of 1898 he was appointed by President McKinley a member of the commission to establish the Government of Hawaii on the annexation of the islands to the United States. In the fifty-sixth and fifty-eighth Congresses he was chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

For eleven hours without rest or refreshment the delegates in the New Hampshire Republican State Convention battled over the nomination for Governor. On the ninth ballot, Charles M. Floyd, a Manchester merchant and the second choice of the organization, won the prize with 408 votes to 335 for Winston Churchill. The most spectacular scenes ever witnessed in a New Hampshire convention were noted, one being the withdrawal of an alleged reform candidate and his plea to his followers to vote for the machine candidate. There is said to be no basis for the report that Mr. Churchill would effect fusion with the Democrats. He and the men with him are Republicans of the old hard-shell New Hampshire variety, and say they will fight their way in their own party councils and not call in nor ally themselves with the Democrats.

In addition to the nomination of William H. Langdon of San Francisco for Governor, the State Convention of the Independence League named the following candidates:

Secretary of State, O. E. Swain, Alameda.
State Treasurer, Edward Tedford, Santa Ana.
Attorney General, Gessner Williams, Los Angeles.
Surveyor General, I. N. Chapman, Alameda.
State Controller, George W. Hack, Sacramento.
State Printer, John Collins, San Francisco.
Supreme Court Clerk, Edward Rainey, Santa Barbara.
Railroad Commissioner, A. C. Black, Orange.

The Socialist Labor party of California held its convention in Oakland last week and nominated the following ticket:

Austin Lewis of Oakland, Governor; Frank J. Wheat of Los Angeles, Lieutenant Governor; Walter V. Holloway of Berkeley, Secretary of State; O. H. Philbrick, State Comptroller; John M. Reynolds of San Francisco, Treasurer; George W. Downing of Los Angeles, Attorney General; L. B. Matthews, Surveyor General; J. H. Wilde of Sutter County, Clerk of the Supreme Court; Mrs. Anne Ferry Smith of San Diego, Superintendent of Public Instruction; George A. Garrett of San Diego, Superintendent of State Printing; James Andrew of Berkeley, Hiram E. Fletcher of San Diego and Emil Leese of San Francisco, Associate Justices of the Supreme Court. A full Congressional ticket will be named.

It has been a busy summer for the old. Mrs. Elizabeth Hunt, of Brooklyn, celebrated her 106th birthday. At a Vermont county fair Charles Taylor, of Middlebury, aged 100, drove his pacer Robert B. an exhibition half mile in 1.08. Mrs. Sarah Hall Doremus, of Parsippany, N. J., reached 103 in full possession of her faculties, with only her sight slightly impaired. David Hill, colored, of Providence, 104, was arraigned in court. Mrs. Elvira J. Sheeter, of Williamsburg, Mass., took a motor-car ride on attaining centenarian honors. In Vine-land nineteen persons more than eighty years old attended the services at the First Presbyterian Church. The summer's death list of centenarians is interesting. Mrs. Eliza Fairchild Wheeler died at Groton, Conn., and former State Senator Pierson at Swedesboro, N. J., each at the age of 101. Mrs. Lavinia Lovett, who died at North Tarrytown, aged 102, left twenty-five living grandchildren. The oldest man in London, James McNally, died at the age of 110, and the oldest Canadian, Mrs. Ferdinand Reese, at 113. Mrs. Reese saw Napoleon in 1812.

The great height of modern skyscrapers makes it indispensable that they should be actually fireproof—that is, unburnable. Architects are agreed that this can be most effectively done by building the floors and partitions of hollow tile bricks so that in the event of fire it is confined to the area in which it starts. The remarkable showing made by the steel and tile skyscrapers in San Francisco, and the fact that many of them are ready for occupancy again, proves the skyscrapers of this type of construction are safe from any fire, remarks the Springfield (Mass.) Union in this connection. Electric installation in big buildings is now so carefully done that the danger of electrolysis is very remote. In fact as engineers and scientists point out, unless some unknown danger arises the skyscraper of the modern day will stand as solid and as enduring as the pyramids of the ancients.

The new Vreeland law, soon to go into effect, requires that manufactures of gold and silver be truthfully stamped, and provides for imposing penalties in case false stamps are used. As a result of the United States having had no Federal stamping law, the products of American factories lack standing in foreign countries. After the Vreeland law becomes operative, it is expected that American manufacturers will be better able to invade foreign markets. The leading manufacturing jewelers endorse the law.

The Czar of Russia is said to be contemplating resigning the throne because of the efforts on his life. The present house of Romanoff came into existence in 1613, since when there have been 18 assassinations. One of these (Ivan) was an idiot; three have been murdered by their relatives (not including Alixeff, son of Peter the Great, who was poisoned by his father), one was assassinated by his subjects and 12 have died more or less natural deaths.

Some persons think that President Roosevelt's spelling reform should be applied to music also, says the Musical Courier. Then we would have this simplified code: Sim-fonee, Skertzo, Nokturn, Rapsodee, Fewg, Obo, Cord, Baytoyn, Shopan, Tchykufskkee, Greeg, Strous, Shoobert, Shooman, Berlio, Goono, Dandy, St. Sang, Putsheeny, Mascanyee, Hydn, List, Vogner, Glook, etc.

THE INSANE SURGEON.

A Terrible Experience that Blanched a Woman's Hair.

"I have heard of persons whose hair was whitened through excessive fear, but I never saw any one so affected." So I spoke to Dr. Maynard, as we sat on the piazza of his pretty villa, discussing the different effects of terror on dissimilar temperaments. Without replying to me, the doctor turned to his wife and said:

"Helen, will you please relate to my old friend the incident within your own experience? It is the most convincing argument I can advance."

I looked at Mrs. Maynard in surprise. I had observed that her hair, which was very luxuriant, was white, but it only heightened the brilliancy of her fine dark eyes.

The doctor and I had been fellow-students, but, after leaving college, we had drifted apart. I was now on a visit to him for the first time since his marriage.

Mrs. Maynard smiled as she saw my eyes fixed on her snowy hair over her shoulders, and, seating herself by her husband's side, related the following story:

It is nearly two years since my husband was called on one evening to visit a patient several miles away. Our servants had all gone to a wake in the vicinity, the dead man being a relative of one of our serving maids. Thus I was left alone. But I felt no fear, for we had never heard of burglars or any sort of desperadoes in our quiet village, then consisting of a few scattered houses. The windows leading out on the piazza were open as now, but I secured the blinds before my husband's departure, and locked the outside doors, all except the front one; this I left for the doctor to lock after going out, so that, if I should fall asleep before his return, he could enter without arousing me. I heard the doctor's rapid footsteps on the gravel, quickened by the urgent tones of a messenger who awaited him; and, after the sharp rattle of the carriage wheels had become but an echo, I seated myself and soon became absorbed in the book I had been reading before being disturbed by the summons.

But after a time my interest succumbed to drowsiness, and I thought of retiring. Then the clock in the doctor's study struck twelve, so I determined to wait a few moments more, feeling that he would be home very soon. I closed my book, put on a dressing gown, let down my hair, and then returned to my seat to patiently wait and listen. Not the faintest sound disturbed the stillness of the night. Not a breath of air stirred the leaves. The silence was so profound that it became oppressive. I longed for the sharp click of the gate-latch and the well-known step on the gravel walk. I did not dare to break the silence myself by moving or singing. I was so oppressed with the deep stillness. The human mind is a strange torturer of itself. I began to conjure up vivid fancies of ghostly visitants, in the midst of which there occurred to me the stories I had heard from superstitious people about the troubled spirits of those who had died suddenly, like the man whom my servants had gone to "wake," who had been killed by an accident at the sawmill.

In the midst of these terrifying reflections, I was startled by a stealthy footfall on the piazza. I listened between fear and hope. It might be the doctor. But no, he would not tread like that; the step was too soft and cautious for anything less wily than a cat. As I listened again, my eyes fixed on the window blind, I saw the slats move slowly, and then the rays of the moon disclosed a thin, cadaverous face, and bright, glittering eyes, peering at me. O horror! Who was it? or what was it? I felt the cold perspiration start at every pore. I seemed to be frozen in my chair. I could not move; I could not cry out; my tongue seemed glued to the roof of my mouth, while the deathly white face pressed closer, and the great sunken eyes wandered in their gaze about the room. In a few moments the cautious footsteps came toward the door. "Merciful Heavens!" I cried, in a horror-stricken whisper, as I heard the sound of the latch, "the doctor in his haste must have forgotten to turn the key."

I heard the front door open, the step in the hall, and, helpless as a statue, I sat riveted to my chair. The parlor door was open and in it stood a tall, thin man, whom I never before beheld. He was dressed in a long, loose robe, a sort of gabardine, and a black velvet skull-cap partially concealed a broad forehead, under which gleamed black eyes, bright as living coals, and placed so near together that their gaze was preternatural in their distinctness; heavy, grizzled eyebrows hung over them like the tangled mane of a lion; the nose was sharp and prominent; the chin was overgrown with white hair, which hung down in locks as weird as the Ancient Mariner's. He politely doffed his cap, bowed, replaced it, and then said, in a slightly foreign accent:

"Madam, it is not necessary for me to stand on any further ceremony; as your husband, Doctor Maynard," here he again bowed profoundly, "has already acquainted you with the nature of my business here tonight. I perceive," he added, glancing at my negligee robe, "that you were expecting me."

"No," I found voice to stammer; "the doctor has said nothing to me about a visitor at this hour of the night."

"Ah, he wished to spare you, no doubt, a disagreeable apprehension," he returned, advancing and taking a seat on the sofa opposite me, where for a few moments he sat and eyed me from head to foot, with a strange glittering light in his eyes that mysteriously impressed me. "You have a remarkably fine physique, madam," he observed, quietly, "one that might deceive the eyes of the most skilled and practiced physician. Do you suffer much pain?"

Unable to speak, I shook my head. A terrible suspicion was creeping over me. I was alone, miles away from aid or rescue, with a madman.

"Ah," he continued reflectively, "your husband may have mistaken a tumor for a cancer. Allow me to feel your pulse," he said, rising and bending over me.

I thought it best to humor him, remembering it was unwise for a helpless woman to oppose the as yet harmless freak of a lunatic. He took out his watch, shook his head gravely, laid my hand down gently, then went toward the study, where on the table was an open case of surgical instruments.

"Do not be alarmed, madam," he said to me, as I was about to rise and flee, and in another instant he was by my side, with the case in his possession.

Involuntarily I raised my head, and cried: "Spare me! Oh, spare me, I beseech you!"

"Madam," he said, sternly, clasping my wrist with his long, sinewy fingers with a grip of steel, "you behave like a child. I have no time to parley, for I have received a letter from the German emperor, stating that he is desirous of my attendance. I must start for Europe immediately after performing the operation on your breast," and, before I could make the slightest resistance, he had me in his arms and was carrying me into the study, where was a long surgical table covered with green baize. On this he laid me, and, holding me down with one hand, with the strength of a maniac, he brought forth several long leather straps, which bore evidence of having been recently cut, and with which he secured me to the table with the skill of an expert. It was but the work of a moment to unloose my robe, and bare my bosom. Then, after carefully examining my left breast, he said:

"Madam, your husband has made a mistake. I find no necessity for my intended operation."

At this I gave a long-drawn sigh of relief and prepared to rise.

"But," he continued, "I have made the discovery that your heart is as large as that of an ox! I will remove it so that you can see for yourself; reduce it to its natural size by a curious process of my own, unknown to medical science, and of which I am sole discoverer, and then replace it again."

He began to examine the edge of the cruel knife, on which I closed my eyes, while every nerve was in perceptible tremor.

"The mechanism of the heart is like a watch," he resumed; "if it goes too fast the great blood vessel that supplies the force must be stopped, like the lever of a watch, and the works must be cleaned, and repaired, and regulated. It may interest you to know that I was present at the post-mortem examination held over the remains of the beautiful Louisa of Prussia. Had I been consulted before her death, I would have saved her by taking out her heart, and removing the polypi, between which it was wedged as in a vise, but I was called too late. The king and I had a little difference; he was German, I am French. I trust that is sufficient explanation."

He now bent over me, his long white beard brushing my face. I opened my eyes beseechingly, trying to think of some way to save myself. "Oh, sir, give me an anesthetic, that I may not feel the pain," I pleaded.

"Indeed, indeed, madam, I would comply with your wish were you not the wife of a physician—of a skillful surgeon. I wish you to note with what ease I perform this difficult operation, so that you may tell your husband of the great savant whose services he secured, fortunately in season."

As he said this he made the final test of the knife on his thumb. How precious were the moments now! They were fleeting all too fast, and yet an eternity seemed compressed in every one. I never fainted in my life, and I never felt less like swooning than now, as I summoned all my presence of mind to delay the fearful moment, fervently praying in the meantime for my husband's return.

"Doctor," said I, with assumed composure, "I have the utmost confidence in your skill; I would not trust my life to another; but, doctor, you have forgotten to bring a napkin to stanch the blood. If you will have the goodness to ascend to my sleeping chamber, a right of the hall, you will find everything you need that purpose in the bureau."

"Ah, madam," he said, shaking his head sagaciously, "I never draw blood during a surgical operation; is another one of my secrets unknown to the faculty?"

Then, placing his hand on my bosom, he added, horrible playfulness:

"I'll scarcely mark that skin, whiter than snow smooth as monumental alabaster."

"O God!" I cried, as I felt the cold steel my breast; but with the same breath came deliverance.

Quick as thought a heavy woollen piano-cover thrown over the head and person of the madman, bound tightly around him. As quickly was I released and the thoughts that bound me soon held me free. My husband held me in his arms. He had noiselessly approached, and, taking in the horror of my situation at a glance, had, by the only means at hand, set the madman, who was the very patient he had summoned to attend, but who had escaped the vigil of his keeper soon after the departure of the messenger who had now returned with the doctor in pursuit.

As the poor wretch was being hurried away, he turned to me and said: "Madam, this is a plot to rob my reputation. Your husband is envious of my skill as a surgeon. Adieu!"

I afterward learned that the man was once an eminent surgeon in Europe, but much learning had made him mad. When he bound me to the table my skin was black as a raven; when I left it, it was as white as snow.

An amusing story deals with an encounter Mr. Beit had with the grandfather of the present Duke of Westminster. When Mr. Beit approached the head of the Grosvenor family for the land on which his magnificent Park-lane house was built, the duke insisted on so many conditions that the great financier very nearly broke the negotiations to an abrupt close. Eventually, however, an agreement was drawn up, and it was on the eve of signature when Mr. Beit received the following urgent note from the duke's agent: "The duke expects Mr. Beit to spend a minimum sum of £100,000 on the house to be erected on the ground." This was the reply: "Mr. Beit begs leave to inform his grace that he intends to spend the sum mentioned on the stables."

Remarkable figures, showing the extent of betting in France and how the state benefits thereby are published in the statistics of the French race courses for the 1892-1903. All betting on horses in France is done through the government institution known as the Paris-Mutuel, which has booths on all race tracks. The business is thus reduced to a system and many abuses avoided. During the period dealt with, the sum passing through the Paris-Mutuel was $433,699,755, of which the state took its share, amounting to $13,020,087. Most of the profit is devoted to the support of hospitals, monts-de-piété (state pawnshops) and other charitable institutions. Year by year the sums hazarded by Frenchmen on the progress of horse and jockey have increased.

Pinkey, one of the two famous cats of Wilkes-Barre, Pa., to whom Benjamin Dillel bequeathed $40,000 and a home, developed a tumor in her throat, and she was chloroformed with the consent of the executors of the estate. Pinkey and Blackie were the pets of the late Benjamin F. Dillel, who died eighteen months ago and had been for the last thirteen years of his life. His will contained a provision for the care of the cats, and provided a nurse for them at $75 a month. Every door in the house had a hole in it for the cats to pass through.

Forrest F. Dryden, a son of the president of the Prudential Insurance Company, stated under oath that one of the owners of that company who, in the seventies, paid in, in cash, $2200, had made a profit, twenty-five years later, of $327,163.60. The rate of profit in this case is 14,800 per cent—a rate which seems colossal to the policy-holder who has taken advantage of the savings feature of that company and bought an endowment policy—he has never received as much as 4 per cent.

A cable to the New York Herald from Panama says that Chinese residents have cabled to the Imperial Government, making vigorous protest against allowing Chinese labor to be brought to the canal. They represent the climatic conditions are such that a heavy death rate is sure to follow.

A letter has been delivered by the postal authorities at Clacton, an English seaside resort, which bore the address: "Corner house, two stone dogs in front." The writer had forgotten the correct name and address.

SINS OF LONDON'S SMART SET.

Not so Black as Painted in Father Vaughan's Philippics.

It seems, at the present time, extremely doubtful that the volume of sermons promised us by Rev. Father Vaughan will renew the interest that was taken in his philippics when they were delivered. Some will buy the book to learn whether his attacks upon the "man-eating gress in society" were reported accurately, or to determine if his convictions remain steadfast and his denunciations persist in the enduring garb of print. The greater number, however, even of those who were stirred by his other sensational utterances with regard to the prevalence of gambling among the women of the smart set, have dismissed the topic from consideration and will not again take it up willingly. For a time his weekly assault on what he pronounced the distinguishing vice of the period agitated all Mayfair, but when the worst was said—and was bad enough—the waves of indignation and contradiction began to subside. Then Father Vaughan gave over his efforts to correct and warn his hearers and went way to Harrogate to rest.

Father Vaughan, if not an eminent prelate, as was his brother, the late Cardinal Vaughan, is an earnest and greatly esteemed priest. His services in the West End have been attended by the fashionable and socially secure, and only the most thorough conviction of evil conditions could have urged him to such radical declarations. The daily press, of course, took them up, made capital out of them, and even endeavored to augment their force, which was unnecessary. Striking phrases were repeated in newspaper headings, and expressions of assent and dissent alike were encouraged and printed at length. There were many forcible sentences ready to their hands in Father Vaughan's sermons. He had said:

"Any man who ventures into the society of the fast, smart set with any money will come out of it without any." "They go for him, they pluck at him, and when he chance offers they seize upon him, and they devour his substance." "What chance has a man with the woman who will cheat and swear and lie and steal, hield by the name of woman?" "How can I dare to hold my peace when I know of the girl ruin that is actually being wrought in the midst of this fashionable quarter of our mammoth city?" "Many innocent and beautiful English girls have been drawn into this vortex, have been ruined over the card-table." "It is this cursed gambling which is the millstone about society's neck, dragging it down into the depths of this sewer of putrid filthiness."

To those of Father Vaughan's hearers and critics who ventured to deny and remonstrate, he answered that only those who led secluded lives were ignorant of the facts that he declared. In this rests the crux of the matter. There is a society that is no longer secluded. It is a growth of later years, and is famous for its extravagances. Entrance into its circles may be bought; in fact, is bought without difficulty. It is not made up altogether of the newly rich, whether of our own people or of those who have come to us from other lands. The most active ones in its inner knowledge are those who live by its ambitions and excesses. They sell introductions, they tutor and direct, they fasten upon and bleed the novitiates who feel no compunction in submitting to extortions petty or gross if they are allowed to win what they consider to be social victories.

Subtle changes have taken place in English society generally during the life of the present generation, although the changes affect women more than men. There is less of drawing-room and teacups and more of the club and golf links. Women are more nearly on equal terms of companionship with men. They are no longer delicate and hysterical, but athletic and confident. That they have lost charm will be contended only by those who still preserve tender memories of a sentimentalism that was not robust enough to endure in free air and sunshine. Young women are better sportsmen now. They are not addicted to drink or to gambling, as has been charged. They crave and attain other excitements, more healthful amusements.

By way of special instances, in place of generalities, let me say that real conditions negative Father Vaughan's belief. Young women, unmarried, seldom gain admission to women's clubs where bridge is played. At week-end or house parties in the country, English girls are accompanied by their mother or some elder relative, and no hostess would permit a young woman to become involved in dangerous play. As for the young man who might become the prey of the harpy whom the clergyman has pictured, I am certain that such find excitement more to their taste in other and different surroundings. There are exceptions, as there have been since Australia and Canada became havens for reckless and impoverished sons.

Weakness, greed and cunning still exist, and mayhap will continue. The sort of society in which take place occurrences that justify some of Father Vaughan's flagellations is shown in the court record of the recent case of the Most Honorable John James Dudley Stuart, Marquis Townshend. He needed a wife with plenty of money, and once was very nearly married to an enormously wealthy American heiress. Balked in that project, the agents financially concerned brought off a match which later developed a distressing want of caution on their part. The father-in-law was practically bankrupt, and the marriage brokers still lack their commission. Besides the smart set there is a seedy set, and also a shady set.

OLD FAVORITES.

The High Tide at Gettysburg.

[At Gettysburg, September 15, on the historic battlefield where they struggled for supremacy the survivors of General Pickett's division of the Confederate army met in fraternal reunion the survivors of the Philadelphia Brigade, which was composed of four regiments of Pennsylvania Volunteers. The reunion was held at the "bloody angle," where General Pickett made his famous charge.]

A cloud possessed the hollow field,
The gathering battle's smoky shield.
Athwart the gloom the lightning flashed,
And through the cloud some horsemen dashed,
And from the heights the thunder pealed.

Then at the brief command of Lee
Moved out that matchless infantry,
With Pickett leading grandly down,
To rush against the roaring crown
Of those dread heights of destiny.

Far heard above the angry guns
A cry across the tumult runs—
The voice that rang through Shiloh's woods
And Chickamauga's solitudes,
The fierce South cheering on her sons!

Ah, how the withering tempest blew
Against the front of Pettigrew!
A Khamsin wind that scorched and singed
Like that infernal flame that fringed
The British squares at Waterloo!

A thousand fell where Kemper led;
A thousand died where Garnett bled:
In blinding flame and strangling smoke
The remnant through the batteries broke
And crossed the works with Armistead.

"Once more in Glory's van with me!"
Virginia cried to Tennessee;
"We two together, come what may,
Shall stand upon these works to-day!"
(The reddest day in history.)

Brave Tennessee! In reckless way
Virginia heard her comrade say:
"Close round this rent and riddled rag!"
What time she set her battle-flag
Amid the guns of Doubleday.

But who shall break the guards that wait
Before the awful face of Fate?
The tattered standards of the South
Were shriveled at the cannon's mouth.
And all her hopes were desolate.

In vain the Tennessean set
His breast against the bayonet!
In vain Virginia charged and raged,
A tigress in her wrath uncaged,
Till all the hill was red and wet!

Above the bayonets mixed and crossed,
Men saw a gray, gigantic ghost
Receding through the battle-cloud,
And heard across the tempest loud
The death-cry of a nation lost!

The brave went down! Without disgrace
They leaped to Ruin's red embrace.
They only heard Fame's thunders wake,
And saw the dazzling sun-burst break
In smiles on Glory's bloody face!

They fell, who lifted up a hand
And bade the sun in Heaven to stand!
They smote and fell, who set the bars
Against the progress of the stars,
And stayed the march of Motherland!

They stood, who saw the future come
On through the fight's delirium!
They smote and stood, who held the hope
Of nations on that slippery slope
Amid the cheers of Christendom.

God lives! He forged the iron will
That clutched and held that trembling hill.
God lives and reigns! He built and lent
The heights for Freedom's battlement
Where floats her flag in triumph still!

Fold up the banners! Smelt the guns!
Love rules. Her gentler purpose runs.
A mighty mother turns in tears
The pages of her battle years,
Lamenting all her fallen sons!

BENJAMIN IDE WHEELER ON SPELLING

President of the University of California Opposes Mooted Reform.

In an address before the students at the Stanford University commencement exercises last week, Benjamin Ide Wheeler, president of the University of California, stated his objections to the scheme of spelling reform recently endorsed by President Roosevelt. After dwelling upon the definition of language, its purposes, its orthoepic and orthophonic features, and the origin of the demand for writing, President Wheeler said:

In the inevitable discussion of the reform of English spelling, a sober consideration of all that is involved must warn against the rash imperiling through shallow judgment of the greater good for the lesser benefit. Here follow certain points of view:

First: Uniformity in the written language throughout its entire territory in any given period, as the present, is a prime demand of civilized intercourse.

Second: The establishment for the United States of a standard of written English different from that recognized elsewhere in the English-speaking territory, is an isolating and divisive movement promising loss and waste to intercourse and culture, and introducing consciousness of contrariety where the opposite is desired. The needless irritation caused by the minor differences already existing points ominously to what would result from greater.

Third: The English language is not the property of the people of the United States, still less of its government; it is a precious possession of the English-speaking world, and the moral authority to interfere in its regulation must arise out of the entire body and not from a segment thereof.

Fourth: Every person who is born to the use of the language inherits thereby a definite advantage in the world of intellectual gain for influence and effectiveness, yes, even for commercial success, by very reason of its extension of use in uniformity of standard. This inherited advantage constitutes vested interest, and must not be trifled with.

Fifth: Any radical change, such as for instance would be involved in phonetic writing, would have the effect of cutting us off from the language of Shakespeare and the English Bible, making this a semi-foreign idiom, to be acquired by special study. Indeed our entire present library collections of English books would be placed beyond the reach of the ordinary reader, and be as Dutch to his eyes. The bond uniting all the products of the language from the Elizabethan period to the present day creates a very precious heritage for every speaker of the English tongue.

Sixth: The adoption of a phonetic writing, it should furthermore be remembered, would involve imitation of the various dialectal forms of the spoken language, all of which is highly interesting to phonologists, but to the plain reader anathema.

Seventh: Print is addressed to the eye, and the reader's eye taking in whole words or even the composite form of whole phrases in rapid glance is disturbed and hindered by abnormal forms of spelling.

Eighth: The proposal gradually to introduce through the co-operation of volunteers a certain number of new spellings, and then, when these are well under way, presumably certain others, seems to promise an era of ghastly confusion in printing offices and in private orthography and heterography, as well as much irritation to readers' eyes and spirits.

Ninth: The list of three hundred words proposed by the Simplified Spelling Board is a somewhat haphazard collection following no very clear principle of selection. One hundred and fifty-seven of them, such as "color" for "colour," are already in their docked form familiar to American usage. The remainder seem to have their inclusion in the list to their having been mis-spelled a number of times in English literature; thus the "y" is tabooed in "pigmy" (for pygmy), not in "synonym"; the older spelling is resumed in "rime" (for "rhyme"), but not in "gest" for "guest," or "tung" for "tongue." There is no excuse, however, for "thru" (for "through") from any point of view. The symbol "u" generally carries in English the value "yu" (in "use") or "u" (in "but"); only very rarely, as in "rural," "rumor," has it the value "oo." "Thru" has not even the authority of error.

REMEYNI, HUNGARIAN VIOLINIST.

Fellow Student of Joachim, Friend of Liszt, Discoverer of Brahms and Melba.

There is no biography of Remenyi. In place of a formal history of that musical genius and romantic interpreter of the choicest compositions in his own style for the violin, is a volume of memories and appreciations, written and gathered by a few of his intimate friends. The book is entitled "Edouard Remenyi: Musician, Litterateur, and Man," and it is edited and prefaced by Gwendolyn Dunlevy Kelley and George P. Up-ton.

Remenyi was born at Miskolcz, Hungary, July 17, 1830, the son of John and Rosalie Hoffmann. Though of Jewish descent he was Hungarian and Romany by nature, and early in his career he Hungarianized his name. His musical studies began at the age of nine, when he entered the Vienna Conservatory, and he studied the violin under Joseph Bohm, the teacher of Joachim and Laube. Joachim, a year younger than Remenyi, was a student at the conservatory at the same time.

War interrupted his studies, for when he was eighteen he joined in the uprising of Hungary against Austria, led by Kossuth.

As soon as the opportunity offered itself he took service under General Gorgey, who succeeded Kossuth as dictator, and acted as a kind of musical aid-de-camp to that officer. The revolutionary army hailed him as its camp violinist. His superior officer also evidently considered his violin a more effective agency in the service than his sword, for he would not permit him to go into battle. There are stories that, carried away by enthusiasm, he sometimes eluded Gorgey's vigilance and was found on the field, but even there he was carefully protected; Gorgey knew the value of his musical services, and saved him from any unnecessary risks. So his time was mainly occupied in keeping up the spirits of the revolutionists by playing the "czardas" about the watchfires, or the "Racokzy March" from village to village with its stirring call to arms. That the government appreciated the dangerous possibilities of his playing in spreading the insurrectionary spirit, is shown by its effort to suppress it, but he escaped its vigilance.

When the end of the revolution came with the surrender in August, 1849, Remenyi, with others, was obliged to expatriate himself. He sought refuge in the United States, and supported himself with his violin.

His first concert was given at Niblo's Garden, New York, January 19, 1850, with the assistance of Mme. Stephani, a soprano vocalist; H. C. Timm, pianist; and William Scharfenberg, pianist and violinist—two of the ablest musicians of that time—and an orchestra led by Theodore Eisfeld, one of the pioneers of orchestral music in this country. He remained in the United States but six months, and then returned to Europe.

The year 1853 marked an eventful period in Remenyi's life:

Early in that year he was giving concerts in Hamburg. Upon one occasion, his accompanist being ill he made inquiries among the local musicians for a substitute and was referred to Brahms, who was at that time teaching music and much in need of money. Brahms readily accepted Remenyi's offer, and so commended himself by his great ability that the latter was delighted with him and suggested that they should make a concert tour. Brahms, who was as young, as enthusiastic, and as poor as his associate, at once accepted the proposition.

From the first Remenyi recognized Brahms as a genius, and he unselfishly set about pushing the fortunes of his friend. By means of a letter from Joachim, he played with Brahms before King George at Hanover, but that monarch was not impressed with the pianist. He introduced him to Liszt, at Weimar, but Brahms did not make a good impression there, and so Remenyi secured a second letter from Joachim favoring his project, and sent Brahms with it to Schumann at Dusseldorf, he remaining with Liszt.

The first tidings they heard from Brahms was contained in the famous article "Neue Bahnen," which Schumann wrote for the Leipzig "Neue Zeitschrift für Musik," in which he hailed Brahms as the "New Messiah of Music." This is the version of their relations substantially as given by Remenyi himself.

Brahms speedily forgot his friend and never wrote to him. In fact, he really committed an act of treachery, if Remenyi's statement is accepted, as certain Hungarian airs published under his name were really written by the violinist. Remenyi had few of the eccentricities, and none of the jealousies of the musical genius. Madame Remenyi gives several examples of his enthusiasm when he heard something fine or beautiful:

I recall him coming home in ecstasy after hearing an unknown individual play admirably, and he could not be reconciled to the knowledge that that person was only a member of a small orchestra. After hearing Cesare Thompson he wept for joy at having heard the violin played with such mastery. In June, 1890, when Remenyi was in London, he went to a concert given by Sarasate. He was in such transports of pleasure over his beautiful and silvery playing that he immediately hurried to a florist and bought a basket of the most lovely flowers which he sent to the Spanish maestro. Sarasate frankly acknowledged that he had never had a similar tribute offered him.

Colonel Henry Kowalsky, of San Francisco, who furnishes one of the chapters of the volume, gives this description of a meeting of two master spirits and congenial artists:

It happened that he and Ysaye were sojourning in San Francisco at the same time. Ysaye was very fond of Remenyi and very enthusiastic over certain pieces that he played; and while enjoying a social afternoon together in my rooms at the Baldwin Hotel, Ysaye induced him to play a Hungarian rhapsody and a Russian czardas. Remenyi played with tremendous intensity; he was on his mettle, and anxious to impress Ysaye with a heroic interpretation of the piece he performed. It was interesting to watch the player and the listener. As Remenyi proceeded, Ysaye became excited, and the more Remenyi played the more Ysaye abandoned himself to his feelings. He played for fifteen minutes. The whole air was charged with his fantastic music. Ysaye was greatly excited, and when the little old man laid down his violin he took him in his embrace and kissed him on each cheek, shouting, "Charmant! Magnifique! Bravo! Bravo!" It was a rare sight—Ysaye, the world-accepted virtuoso of his time, lovingly and affectionately embracing his friend and proclaiming that no man alive could play that class of music like him. Tears trickled down Remenyi's cheek; he said criticism from such a source was worth all his life's labor.

This incident, also furnished by Col. Kowalsky, shows the boyish enthusiasm of Remenyi in all things artistic:

Remenyi in his time had been a collector of rare oil-paintings; he was a judge of good work, and his opinion on a painting was valuable. Upon one occasion I accompanied him to see some pictures done by an artist who, by reason of his intemperance, had lost his position in the art world. He had about a dozen which he placed with an art dealer, and, wanting money at once, left word with him to sell them at any price. They were landscapes and scenes in California, and the moment Remenyi saw them he proclaimed them the work of a good artist. He requested me to inquire the price. I was told we could have our choice at fifteen dollars each. Remenyi said that he must have made a mistake, and directed me to inquire again. The price was confirmed. He said: "We take them all." The dealer requested to know where he should send them. Remenyi was very nervous and answered that he need not send them; that he would take them away himself. He turned to me and said: "I am going to impose a hardship on you, but this is a test of your affection for me. We must carry these pictures away ourselves." I said, "Why?" He answered: "I think in the first place the man will change his mind on account of the price; and, second, I could not in justice to my feelings take a chance and leave them behind me." So we started through the streets with them, he almost on a run. Many persons recognized us and turned and looked after us.

The distance to the hotel, of course, was not far, but when we arrived at our apartments he placed the paintings about the room and danced around in admiration over the bargain he had made. While in the midst of his glee, a knock on the door caused him to lose color; he was pale as a ghost. He put his finger on his mouth as if to direct silence. When the knock became stronger he remarked: "I knew it; they have discovered they have made a mistake and come for them; but we have paid for them and have the receipt. A bargain is a bargain." Then again the knock was repeated. He nervously opened the door, and in front of him stood a bell-boy with a card from his piano accompanist. Remenyi was much relieved, handed the boy a tip, and said, "Tell him to come up."

In speaking of famous violinists and those who attempt the mastery of the violin, Remenyi said:

"To speak of a person as the master of the violin is to assert that which has never yet been achieved. Hundreds of thousands fiddle, thousands play at the violin, and thousands play on the violin, a few thousands perform well, and a few hundred play very well. The great artists who achieve fame and are world-renowned number less than fifty, while those who are credited with being great virtuosos you can count on one hand; and, as to its master, he has never been born. So you begin with millions and come down to nothing, leaving the violin unconquered."

One who first met Remenyi at the home of a friend in Hungary, where both spent some time, gives the following reminiscence of the artist, who had practiced early one morning near the room of the other:

"Remenyi worked well this morning," he said, after breakfast.

He never spoke save in praise of himself, and always talked of himself in the third person. "Yes, on a Bach concerto," said I.

He drew himself up, exclaiming: "Remenyi plays other things," and calling Nardor, he asked for his violin. Twenty persons ran for it. He played a Hongroise. With the first note his vanity dropped from him like a cloak. He possessed every quality that genius can grant—imagination, delirious fancy, mild caprice, skill, clearness, precision, eloquence, color. He laid down his bow, smiling like a child. The music had worked a wondrous change in him. He was natural and ingenuous. Now and then he took up his violin and played one strain after another. Thus we heard the ball-room scene from Berlioz's "Romeo and Juliet." It was like a magical spell. We were in Italy; the silvery moonbeams fell on the silent rows of cypress trees and marble statues; fountains flashed; then a fair palace appeared, all light and music; a crowd hurried by masked and gaily dressed; the night wind wafted strains of dance music through the garden; then all this faded, and we heard Juliet's cry.

When I thanked the great artist and expressed my admiration of his wonderful execution, he replied: "If Remenyi is only satisfied with himself!" with an expressive gesture to complete his phrase.

Strange to say, Remenyi had home interests in Hungary, the country that always held him in deep esteem:

In 1872 he was married to Miss Gisella de Fay de Faj, daughter of a famous Hungarian musician, by whom he had two children, twins, Adrienne and Tibor. His friendship with Liszt at this time was somewhat weakened, though Liszt was at his wedding and wrote some special music for the occasion. He was also concertizing with Liszt in 1872 and assisted at his jubilee in Budapest.

Remenyi's movements were never made by schedule. Routine was impossible in his uncertain career, hence it was never safe to predict where he would be from one season to another.

In the latter part of 1873 he made a home tour. In 1874 he was in Egypt, and played to the Arabs on the great Cheops pyramid. In 1875 he was in Paris, playing in the salons and the Pasedeloup concerts.

In the spring of 1877 London heard him again, and in the summer he was back in Paris. In the summer of 1878 he played in the Reviere concerts, Covent Garden, London. In the autumn of that year he made his second visit to the United States, giving his first concert at Steinway Hall, New York, November 11. During the next few weeks he played in the New York Philharmonic concerts; in the Brooklyn Philharmonic concerts under Theodore Thomas's baton; in the Carlberg symphony concerts, in Boston, Hartford, and, in the latter part of December, in Washington, where he was the guest of President Hayes at the White House. The following year he continued his American tour, playing in New York, Albany, Troy, Buffalo, Cincinnati, Chicago, Quincy, Illinois; Burlington, Iowa, and other cities. In 1880 he went as far west as Colorado and greatly enjoyed himself in the mining camps, where he made himself a favorite with the miners by his impromptu performances.

Then followed another of his mysterious disappearances. He never traveled the beaten paths laid out by his managers. His own fancies were his managers, and they were as uncertain as the winds:

The next tidings of the wanderer came from Australia, where he had made a new discovery—the brilliant vocalist Melba. The next year he was in India, and from 1886 to 1890 where was he not? There are records of him in the Sandwich Islands, Japan, China, Cochinchina, Tasmania, New Zealand, Burmah, Singapore, Java, Mauritius, the Philippines, Ceylon, Madagascar, South Africa—where he made a fresh discovery, this time, violins—and numerous other remote places. His movements were always mysterious. There would be long silences; then would come detailed reports of his death. How many times he was shipwrecked, captured by savages and assassinated! How many times he vanished from human sight! How many times he was reported deserted and dying in strange countries! Soon, however, he would be announced as playing in some place on the far edge of the world—always happy, always finding something beautiful, always a roamer, always a gypsy. In 1891 his far Eastern travels were over and he went back to London. He stayed there a few weeks and then after sixteen years of absence went to Hungary and home if he can be said to have had a home.

At a reception tendered to him by the New York Hungarian Literary Society on the eve of his departure for the West, his last earthly journey, he said to a friend, the Hungarian consul: "My dear Cukor, this piece of wood and its predecessor were my truest, my closest companions through life. When I wept, they sobbed, and when I rejoiced, they laughed; they shared my sorrows and my joys. I know and I feel that I shall die in harness; that I shall go on my last earthly tour with these precious companions of mine, interpreting the very depths of my soul and giving expression to my tenderest and deepest inspirations. Yes, my dear boy, I shall die fiddling."

It was as the artist predicted and wished. The story is told in this paragraph, taken from a dispatch from San Francisco to the New York Herald, and dated May 16, 1898:

"Edouard Remenyi fell dead this afternoon at the Orpheum Theatre. It was Remenyi's first appearance on the vaudeville stage. As the artist appeared, and was greeted with tumultuous applause, he bowed his acknowledgment and seemed immensely pleased at the reception given him. He had played two or three classical pieces, and had answered to an encore with the familiar "Old Glory." Remenyi played as if inspired. His three thousand auditors, as he approached his climax, literally rose with him, leaving the seats in their excitement, completely carried away by his achievement. When the music ceased the house was swept with a torrent of bravos. In response to another outburst of applause, Remenyi commenced to play, but had complete but a few bars when he leaned forward as if to speak to one of his musicians in the orchestra. He seemed to pause a moment, and then, hugging his violin tenderly to his breast, slowly fell forward on his face. One of the musicians caught him just before he touched the stage and prevented him from falling off. All was over."

There are several engravings in the volume from photographs of the musician at various stages of his career, and in them there are few suggestions of the dreams, the unrest, the imagination and the world-wide sympathy and appreciation for the beautiful that possessed that wandering minstrel. Several of his letters and essays are added to the reminiscences of his life.

LATE VERSE.

San Francisco.

But yesterday thou wert a queen divine
Of Love and Song! Venus and Sappho sweet
Ceased their rivalry 'neath thy golden feet.
Poised 'twixt the New and Old! Both did incline
And for thy beauty, all their pomp resign.
Excelling Phœbus: We thy sun did greet Aloft, as rival to Jove's regal seat.
Which all the world's sweet melodies confine.

From laughing Thais to weeping Niobe,
Did Mother Earth constrain thee to relent,
In guise so grand, that man could not resent
Chastising thee, for that upon thy knee
Thou didst not sooner give in worldly fee,
A dole to Fortune and to be content
To sever from thy old life, and repent
Like Ariadne moaning by the sea.

A Rhyme of the Ruins.

[The following verses were read at a dinner at the Cosmos Club soon after the disaster, and when that club was the only one left with a home in the city. They were also given at the mid-summer jinks of the Bohemian Club, and, as before, their spirit was warmly applauded. A friend of the author has sent them to the Argonaut for publication, but he did not inclose the name of the author.]

Put me somewhere west of East street, where there's nothing left but dust,
And the boys are all a-husling and everything's gone bust;
Where the buildings standing there sort of blink and blindly stare
At the damndest finest ruins ever gazed on anywhere.
Bully ruins, brick and wall, through the night
I've heard you call,
Sort of sorry for each other, cause you had to burn and fall;
From the Ferry to Van Ness you're a god-forsaken mess,
But the damndest finest ruins, nothing more and nothing less.

And the Rubes they come a rubbering and hunting souvenirs,
And the fools they try to tell us it'll take a hundred years
Before we're even started, and why don't we come to live
And build our homes in Oakland, on the land they've got to give?
Got to give! Why, on my soul, I would rather bore a hole
And live right in those ashes than to go to Oakland mole;
And if they'd give the pick of their buildings fine and slick,
In those damndest finest ruins, I would rather be a brick.

Mount Tamalpais Railway will be extended, the directors having decided to build a branch line down the west side of the mountain seven miles to Redwood Canyon, where a hotel will be erected. The redwoods in the canyon range from fourteen to eighteen feet in diameter, and are about 250 feet in height. The hotel will be fitted up in the most approved fashion and should rival the popularity of Tamalpais Tavern. A. H. Johnson has been elected manager of the Tamalpais Tavern in place of the late General Warfield.

The reply to the question, "How to tell a man from Chicago," which was awarded the prize by a New York paper was, "You can't tell him anything."

President Roosevelt has appointed Col. Culver chief paymaster-general of the army, to succeed Gen. B. Dodge, retired. The new official is now in New York Jan. 1, 1844. He was born in Brooklyn, and married Miss S. R. Wain September, 1873. He has been in the United States army since March 3, 1877. He is assistant secretary to President Grant, and is regarded as one of the most popular officers in the army at the present time. He served in Cuba during the Spanish War, and for several years he has been stationed at Washington as assistant paymaster-general.

Only three men in the United States surround themselves with bodyguards wherever they go. They are: Theodore Roosevelt, President of the United States, who is afraid of nothing, but yielded to public desire; John D. There were also 11,000 troops and 1000 gendarmes in possession of the city.

Congratulations have just been given to Earl Nelson on attaining his eighty-third birthday. The present peer is the third earl, and is a great-nephew of the hero of Trafalgar. Earl Nelson succeeded the second holder of the title in 1835, and took his seat in the House of Lords in 1845, so that he has been a member for sixty-one years. He was born only eighteen years after Trafalgar, the centenary of which was celebrated a year ago. The earldom was created in 1805.

Mayor James Dahlman, of Omaha, was applauded and commended on his return home for his actions in playing cowboy at the Bryan homecoming in New York. A number of Democrats had been roasting the mayor, saying that he was undignified and had acted foolishly in roping Bryan as he came from the steamer, and in lassoing cab horses, etc., in the streets of New York. The resolution passed at the meeting of welcome commended Dahlman for giving the city wide advertising and in showing the Easterners what a typical Westerner can be when he wants to.

David R. Francis, of St. Louis, the representative of the World's Fair, has visited recently several of the crowned heads of Europe. He has presented medals to the Emperor of Germany, the King of Sweden, and the King of Denmark. King Oscar of Sweden, who is undoubtedly the most learned and intelligent of all the crowned heads of Europe, embraced Mr. Francis and said he loved America and the Americans, and he longed to see the great republic, but he is now too old to travel, for he is nearing the completion of his seventy-eighth year.

Dr. Zamenhof is said to wish that he had never invented a new language. When the Esperantist congress broke up the delegates tried to show their regard for their hero. Hundreds shook his hand, and hundreds more embraced him with every show of affection, and this he bore with exemplary fortitude. But when the Esperantists of the weaker sex insisted on kissing him good-bye, the fortitude that stood by him so well throughout the conference deserted him. The congress, held in Geneva the last week in August, the first international meeting of Esperanto enthusiasts, was attended by five hundred representatives of fifteen nations, including many Americans.

Bell heard that he was likely to be promoted, he went direct to Secretary Taft and asked as a personal favor that he be overhauled by at least two other officers—Gen. Jesse M. Lee and Gen. Theodore J. Wint, both men of much longer service than himself. Naturally, the Secretary could not resist so unselfish an appeal, and Gen. Lee, who retires for age next January, will be promoted to the major-generalcy he would not otherwise have obtained. The army has every reason to be proud of Gen. Bell's fine record, but it will like him all the more for this Sometimes when one reads society news, one is tempted to imitate the historic millionaire, and say: "Ow 'orribly 'ollow it all is," remarks the Manchester (Eng.) Chronicle. For instance, would not this advertisement, which appears in a fashionable London paper, make you feel just a little doubtful about your society acquaintances? "Ladies moving in good society may earn substantial commissions by promoting a subject easily and naturally introduced into conversation." Just imagine what ballroom conversation will become if this sort of thing spreads. You lead out the charming Countess of Rosendale to the mazy dance, and her first remark is: "Don't you find dancing a little tiring, Capt. Vavasour?"

Of course, you reply that in her company no one could possibly be tired. The Countess beams her thanks for your pretty compliment, and proceeds: "But I am sure you suffer from tired feet the day after." Eager to gain her sympathy, you admit the soft impeachment. "Then, captain, let me urge you to use 'Death to Corns.' It is only 1 1-2 a box. Mind you, beware of imitations. Without the trade-mark of the dancing skeleton you have been basely imposed upon. And, please say I recommended you when you write—then you are sure to be properly attended to."

And you leave the Countess and her corn cure to flirt with a Duchess who is pushing somebody's cocoa, and finish the night by sitting out the last dance with a Marchioness who begs you to use "Mugge's Soap."

The Duke of Rutland has just died in England at the ripe age of eighty-six. All his life he had the control of vast estates and ample wealth. He was twice married but never divorced. He had literary gifts, ambitions and accomplishments. Cultured tastes made him fit for refined society.

What a contrast such a life, not unusual among the British aristocracy, presents to those of so many suddenly rich men out of Pittsburg, remarks the New York World, editorially. It can not be something in the smoky Pittsburg atmosphere which makes its men change their wives when they become rich. The divorces, murders, extravagance and general notoriety which the Pittsburg millionaires inflict on public attention must result from general primary causes.

Until recent years there were not many millionaires in Pittsburg. The Lockhart family had become rich through Standard Oil. Andrew Carnegie made money out of iron and steel. The first Thaw had amassed a few million dollars by buying or building little railroads and selling them to the Pennsylvania. Besides these there were hardly any Pittsburg millionaires. One brewer was worth more than a million dollars, and three or four second-rate iron and steel men made more annual profits than the interest on a million, but none of them dared leave business to go to Monte Carlo, and all got along with the wives who had married them when they were poor.

This Pittsburg epidemic of domestic unhappiness, scandal and crime is nature's retributive process, continues the same writer. It is what happens when a beggar is put on horseback. A man may know how to make steel rails or to puddle iron without being fitted to spend $100,000 a year decently. Such a man as President Corey of the Steel Trust was probably happier when he was working in the Homestead mills and lived in a frame cottage renting for $15 a month. He was more in his own sphere than when he gave a champagne supper at Delmonico's in celebration of his wife's divorcing him.

Men must either be educated by early environment in the handling of wealth, or they must have become rich gradually, or their heads must have the exceeding hardness of a Carnegie, if they are not to be made wild by wealth. Spending money is a harder art to learn than earning money.

If these Pittsburg millionaires had known established society in its different grades they might not be making such fools of themselves now, when the distribution of the speculative results of Mr. Morgan's great steel promotion makes them the prey of their own weaknesses suddenly unloosed.

Isadora Duncan, the San Francisco classic dancer, has divided Berlin into two warring factions. Her classic dances are modeled essentially on the poses of the dancing girls of ancient Greece. At every big social function given in Berlin the leading question of the hour was "what is your opinion of 'The Duncan'?" The fact that her adherence to the Greek form of dancing robe caused her to appear on the stage with bare feet, brought her the deep condemnation of the conservative burg and earned her the sobriquet of "The Bare-Footed Dancer."

But Miss Duncan has become the craze of artistic Germany. All the leading artists are her adherents. The famous Lenbach painted her. Professor Humperdinck, composer of "Hansel und Gretel," has written music for her to dance to. Frau Cosima Wagner has paid her the signal honor of asking her to lead the dance of Venus-Berg in the famous performance at Bayreuth.

Miss Duncan has, through her dancing, amassed a fortune in Germany. She has bought a residence, one of the enormously costly villas in the plutocratic Grunewald colony, and filled it with valuable works of art.

Recently one of the wealthiest newspaper proprietors asked her what would be her terms to dance at a private soiree. Her received reply was that it would be establishing a precedent for the dancer to appear in private, but she would be willing to appear for $750 an hour. The wealthy man replied that he did not wish to spend so much money upon the entertainment, but would she dance twenty minutes for $250? She accepted and established a record price.

Is or is not a telephone conversation private? This is the question which has been agitating Vienna, where a high court has just decided that he who talks over the telephone, however secluded he may think himself in a telephone box, carries on a public conversation. The decision was in a suit brought by a telephone girl against a subscriber, who called her a "fresh person," reports the New York Evening Post. The usual term of obloquy for operators being, according to the Vienna newspapers, a "stupid goose," this "hello girl" declared herself publicly wronged in both official and private capacity.

The subscriber produced four persons who had listened to the conversation, and who denied emphatically that the words "fresh person" had crossed the defendant's lips. The telephone lady then asserted that it was a second conversation in which she was insulted. The suit was actually carried up through all the courts until the highest declared the subscriber guilty, on the ground that as a telephone conversation might be overheard, the calling of names constituted a public slander.

It is hoped that the news of this decision will not induce American operators to "listen in" more frequently than heretofore in the hope of hearing themselves called names, and then bringing suits for heavy damages. Still a telephone is generally quite a safe medium for secrets. At least two young women think so. One was recently urged by the other to tell a secret over the telephone, but she declined for fear she might be overheard. After a second urging Central broke in cheerfully with, "Oh, go on, tell her. I won't listen!"

"Why does a woman button her garments on the left side?" The question is being discussed in the Tailor and Cutter by several correspondents, one of whom advances this theory: "For ladies to have the buttonholes in the right side of their garments has its origin in the times when it was necessary for a lady when going out at night to have a gentleman escort, who supported her upon his left arm, leaving his right or sword arm at liberty. Thus the lady's left hand would be free to fasten or unfasten her cloak at her own pleasure and without inconvenience."

Young women who think they are gifted with a voice and are building air castles about a career in opera will do well to read a report to the state department on what it costs to study music in Milan and some of the dangers and temptations surrounding those who go to Milan to study, by United States Consul Dunning at Milan.

Mr. Dunning gives warning that no single young woman should attempt to study in Milan without at least $1 a day for living expenses. Teaching English to the natives is an uncertain means of support. The only safe way is to have $75 to $100 coming from home every month. Daily music lessons alone cost $30 a month. Then Milan's two-cent carfares are delusive. There are no transfers. Theaters are expensive and clothes cost as much as in America.

And when, after long and impatient preparation, it comes to the triumphal event of a debut, Italian "dressmakers are quarrelsome and avaricious." In other words unless you can afford to, "Don't."

Into a Broadway car stepped a man and a woman, both young, well groomed, and good looking, says a writer in the New York Evening Mail. There were only two vacant seats and they were on opposite sides of the car, so, instead of sitting side by side, they were divided by half the length of the car. Presently the man at the girl's right hand gallantly arose and stumbled over to the unfortunate young man. "I will exchange seats with you, sir," he said.

The young man hesitated, blushed, but accepted the offer. Everybody was interested and expected to see the young couple strike up a conversation without delay. But they did not gush. They did not even speak, and when the conductor came around, the man dived down into his pocket for a nickel and the woman dug around in her purse and brought up another, and they paid their fares independently. An audible sigh went up from the rest of the passengers. The man with the chivalric spirit felt worse than anybody else, unless it was the young people themselves, both of whom understood the situation and blushed furiously.

"Well, I don't care," growled the gallant man finally. "I did my duty, anyhow, and he has had the pleasure of sitting beside her even if he doesn't know her."

Sir James Crichton-Brown, who is the leading authority in Great Britain on mental diseases, addressed the Congress of Sanity Inspectors last evening at Blackpool, the seaside resort of Lancashire, and said that the temperament of the times is bilious, and nervous diseases are very greatly on the increase. Rapid locomotion is simply a craze, and fast motoring at its worst tends to homicidal mania. The confirmed motorist becomes sluggish in intellect and excitable in temper. Sir James advised people to keep in touch with nature and to read the newspapers, which are not only the bulwarks of sanity, but acted on nervous life like a current of electricity. The distinguished specialist is undoubtedly right, and if he will only cross the Atlantic, the press of America will give him a warm and cordial welcome.

The Hofbrauhaus of Munich is, perhaps, the oldest and largest saloon in the world, owned by the King of Bavaria, and patronized by an average of 12,000 customers a day. On holidays the number often runs up to 15,000 and 16,000, notes W. E. Curtis, in a letter from the Bavarian capital. Nothing to drink is sold but beer, brewed at the royal brewery, which was started by King Ludwig the Severe in 1255. The present Hofbrauhaus was built in 1644, and the beer was brewed on the spot until 1878, when the brewery was moved into the country to less expensive quarters.

There are seats for 1,500 customers—plain wooden benches without backs beside plain wooden tables without covers. In the garden or court are 100 empty beer barrels set on end which are used for tables. The steins, which are very heavy and hold a quart of beer, are piled up in stacks before the bar on the floor in the morning, where they remain until they are used.

When a customer wants beer he picks out a stein, takes it to one of the basins of running water which line the walls, and washes it himself. Then he carries it to the counter and hands it over to the bartender, who fills it with beer from the barrel. There are 100 steins of beer in each barrel, and from ninety to 100 barrels are consumed each day. The price is 6 cents a stein, and the profits support the hospitals of the city, although the king could claim them if he desired to do so, as the brewery and the Hofbrauhaus belong to him by inheritance.

In bidding journalists to remember that they are the literary successors of men of letters like Swift and Dr. Johnson, the Provost of Trinity College, Dublin, might well have warned his visitors to beware of the awful example of the doctor, whose last hours were embittered by the reflection that he had deceived the public. Within a few days of his death he confessed to John Nicholls that the Parliamentary Debates were the only part of his writings which gave him any compunction; "they were frequently written from very slender materials, and often from none at all—the mere coinage of his own imagination." Probably for that reason he never wrote anything with "greater velocity." Three columns of the Gentleman's Magazine in an hour was the rate of output. The speed with which the doctor spun eloquence for the dumb ones of Parliament was doubtless a result of the method of payment—so much per hundred lines, a long hundred, ruefully explained Johnson.

The California Wine Association, the Italian-Swiss Colony, Lachman & Jacobi and C. Schilling have reached a decision to require from the makers, when purchasing wines, both dry and sweet, a warrant of purity. This action is taken in order that the merchants will be able to meet the requirements of the pure food law to furnish a certificate of purity to their purchasers. In the future winemakers will be required to sign and execute a certificate guaranteeing the purity of their products, which will contain a sworn statement to the effect that the dry wines contain no cane, beet sugar or glucose; that they are the pure juice of the grape, and are free from added color, antiseptic or other adulterants. The certificate for sweet wines will be modified to meet the conditions.

An extraordinary demonstration of feeling occurred on the Stanford University campus recently when it became known that Chas. Rufus Lot Green of the faculty committee student affairs had tendered his resignation, rejoicing of the men of the university knew bounds, and they gave expression to their joy in a noisy manner. A large portion of the hurriedly gathered their musical instruments, falling into line, headed a great parade of w. excited collegians up and down the street the campus. Professor Green resides on S. tierra street, and the procession stopped in of his house and yelled and cheered wildly. an interview Green said that many students were dropped because of failure in their st were generally supposed to have been victim the student affairs committee. He said that years ago the disciplinary board dropped men, all for flagrant drunkenness. Last year men and one woman were suspended. Be Allen was one of these. Of the others were barred for hazing, one for drunkenness, the last for theft. Professor William F. rand, head of the mechanical engineering de ment, has been appointed chairman of the student affairs committee.

A trained ostrich recently disconcerted exhibitor at a vaudeville house by continuing endeavoring to break away from all rest and to climb over the footlights into the chestra. The widely advertised act came sudden end and Professor Smart emerged behind the curtain and apologized for the tions of his pet in about these words: "L and gentlemen, H'i ham very sorry to appoint you this evening. STAGE GOSSIP.

Belasco & Mayer have laid the foundations for their new Alcazar Theatre at Sutter and Steiner streets, and will erect a steel-frame, fire-proof building, with all the appointments of the best modern theatres. Their plans are so far advanced that the company has been engaged for the opening, late this year, and White Whittlesey will return to be at its head.

Neil Burgess will play his eighteenth year and his first season in the South in "A Country Fair."

The theatrical adaptation of "The House of Mirth," made by the author of the book, Mrs. Edith Wharton, and Clyde Fitch, was produced by Charles Frohman in Detroit a few days ago. Fay Davis played the part of Lily Bart.

Ferris Hartman is managing and Paul Steinorff conducting the comic company now appearing at Idora Park Theatre, Oakland. The organization includes many of the old San Francisco Tivoli company, and this week it is presenting Victor Herbert's "The Idol's Eye."

Franklin Fyles, the New York critic, laughed at Ida Conquest as the heroine of the Cottrell-Moroso play, "The Judge and the Jury," recently produced at Wallack's Theatre. He says: "Ida told them she was a wild child of the Rockies, born in a mining camp and bred on a cattle ranch, but they wouldn't believe her, for it was plain that she was right from the shady side of Broadway, pink and white, instead of tanned, and her clothes were spick and span new, from the densest sombrero on her blonded head, which lacked nothing but the Marcel wave to indicate Fifth avenue hairdressing, to the unwrinkled yellow boots, in which she might have just stepped down from a polisher's stand at the Broadway corner. And her speech was that of a graduate from Vassar or Wellesley. She cracked her whip and straddled her leggings when she declared herself a cowgirl, but we knew she was kidding us."

Five theatres presenting plays, another with a musical travesty bill, and a seventh given to vaudeville, are prosperous in Los Angeles.

Grace George, wife of William A. Brady, the theatrical manager, surrounded by what is said to be the highest priced company on Broadway, has just made a reasonable success in Channing Pollock's new play, "Clothes," at the Manhattan Theatre in New York. In the piece a sidelight is thrown comically on the theme of vanity in dress by having the heroine change a guy of an old maid into comeliness by fluffing her hair, turning in her gown at the neck, rolling her sleeves to the elbows, decorating her with flowers, and powdering her face. The showy third act is at the ball, where the function is very ornamentally represented, and here the traduced girl throws her drunken villifier down a flight of stairs in a startling stunt. Frank Worthing is the tumbler.

J. M. Barrie is writing a new play which will be presented by Maude Adams in London at the close of the American season.

Mrs. Leslie Carter-Payne is not likely to be provoked into entire disregard of her former tutor and manager. It is reported that Mr. Belasco has presented to the actress the entire scenic and costume equipments of the colossal productions of "Du Barry" and "Andrea." Each of them cost very much more than $50,000. He has also released her from all obligations for royalties on his share in the authorship of "Du Barry." Mrs. Carter is now under the direction of Charles Dillingham, and is not to be presented to the public by the new management until after the holidays.

London critics are now engaged upon views of the production at His Majesty's Theatre by Beer-ohm Tree of "The Winter's Tale," with Ellen Terry as Hermione. Notes of their opinions will recall to old theatre-goers the last appearances of Mary Anderson in America, when she played the parts of Hermione and Perdita in that latest tower of Shakespeare's genius.

The Belasco Theatre in Washington, formerly the Lafayette Opera House, has been completely remodeled. This theatre stands on the site of the old Red House, also known as the Blaine mansion, which was successively the home of a number of American statesmen, first of Secretary Edward, and last of James G. Blaine.

Richard Mansfield will produce Ibsen's "Peer Gynt" in Chicago near the close of next month. The play will be given in eleven scenes, and no ballets are a part of the necessary accompaniment.

The Burbank Theatre School of Acting of Los Angeles, offers "two prizes for the best and second best One-Act Plays, of $25 and $15 respectively," with a guarantee of a public performance to be given at the Burbank Theatre at one of the students' matinees this winter. The plays will be judged upon the following points:

first, originality of plot; second, characterization; third, literary value; fourth, situation and knowledge of stage technique. Manuscripts must be in the hands of the director of the school not later than January 1st.

Paul Potter and George Horace Lorimer are writing a play for William H. Crane, entitled "Old Gorgon Graham."

Edna May returned to her old place at the Vaudeville Theatre, London, with the result that the box office receipts are said to have jumped $1500 a night, and now she has left her place, it is said through jealousy of Camille Clifford.

Truly Shattuck, late of George M. Cohan's "Governor's Son" company, will be a leading member of Anna Held's organization.

Georges Jacobi, composer of the opera, "The Black Crook," which had a run of more than 300 nights, and of "La Marise depuis midi," written for Mme. Judic, and sung by her all over Europe, and of innumerable ballets, died a few days ago in London. He was born in Berlin on February 13, 1840, and at the age of six began the study of the violin under Edward and Leopold Ganz. In 1849 he went to Brussels, studying under De Beriot and Auber. After playing in concert and as a member of orchestras all over Europe, he went to London in 1871 and became conductor of the Alhambra orchestra. During his twenty-six years at the Alhambra he composed no fewer than 103 grand ballets and diversifications, many of which are almost as well known in America and on the Continent as in London. He also wrote the incidental music for the productions by Irving at the Lyceum Theatre of "The Dead Heart" and "Robespierre." M. Jacobi's compositions were always full of melody, and devoid of the affectation, vagueness, and vulgarity of much of the theatre music, while it always met the demand of the dramatic situation. As a teacher M. Jacobi excelled, and in 1896 he was made a professor at the Royal College of Music in London.

The Orpheum.

Carter De Haven, formerly of the Weber and Field forces and last season in this city with his sextette, and Flora Parker, a dainty comedienne well known all over the East, will head the list of attractions at the Orpheum this Sunday afternoon, and present an artistic singing and dancing skit entitled "A College Boy's Frolic." The Zazell and Vernon troupe of Parisian acrobatic comedians will return with their French pantomime, "The Elopement." The "Three Roses" come back with the musical entertainment in which they play the violin, cello and piano, and they also have voices of unusual cultivation. Adamini and Taylor, known as "The Wandering Minstrels," carry special scenery and effects and appeal to lovers of high-class music. Clifton Crawford, the monologist, for his second and last week will present much that is new. Eleanor Dorel will change her selections, and Le Roy and Woodford, Tom Fortune and Josephine Davis, and Orpheum motion pictures, showing the latest novelties, will complete a varied programme. On the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located, are to be found amusement devices of every description.

Bohemian Club Concert.

Rehearsals for the Bohemian Club Concert are now going forward, and from present indications the entertainment will be the most successful ever given in the history of the club. The following programme has been announced by the committee:

Overture, "The Man in the Forest," Joseph D. Redding; song, "To the Skylark (words by Bret Harte), Wallace A. Sabin; Christmas ode (for solo, chorus and orchestra), Theodore Vogt; part songs, "The Chamber of Sleep," "Bedouin Love Song," H. J. Stewart; prelude, "The Quest of the Gorgon" (solos, chorus and orchestra), Vogt; part songs, "When Sylvia Saunters By," "A Spring Madrigal," Sabin; gavotte (orchestra), Redding; selections from music for a Christmas pantomime, Stewart; numbers from the new opera, "Cleopatra," W. J. McCoy.

The demand for tickets has been so great that the sale already runs up in to the thousands. However, the vast seating capacity of the Greek Theatre insures to every auditor an excellent opportunity of hearing the music, for even on the topmost row of seats the most delicate tones can be heard to perfection.

Grand Army national encampments will do without parades in the future owing to the advanced age of the veterans. It is felt that the annual parade has of late years tended to shorten the lives of those participating, and that such marches are not desirable, especially when the encampments are held in August.

My Arizona Bedroom.

O my Arizona bedroom
Is beneath the Milky Way,
And the moon is in its ceiling,
And the star that tells of day,
And the mountains lift the corners,
And the desert lays the floor
Of my Arizona bedroom.
Which is large as all outdoor.

O my Arizona bedroom
Is ventilated right;
Every wind that's under heaven
Comes to me with blithe good-night—
Comes to me with touch of blessing
And of ozone one drink more,
In my Arizona bedroom,
Which is large as all outdoor.

O my Arizona bedroom
Has the lightning on its wall,
And the thunders rap the panels,
And their heavy voices call;
And the night birds wing above me,
And the owl hoots galore
Through my Arizona bedroom,
Which is large as all outdoor.

O my Arizona bedstead,
It sometimes seems to me,
Is afloat in middle heaven,
With each star an argosy;
And the tide that turns at midnight
Drifts us down to morning's shore,
Floats us, stars and bed and bedstead,
On the ocean of outdoor.

O my Arizona bedroom
Is beneath the splendid stars,
And the clouds' roll up the curtains
And the windows have no bars,
And I see my God in heaven
As the ancients did of yore,
In my Arizona bedroom,
Which is large as all outdoor.

Where Are the Nudes of Yesterday?

[Lines on the Raid of Anthony Comstock on the Art Students' League.]

I wonder in what cellars dim
Apollo poses debonnaire,
Where Venus and where Psyche prim
In muslin, frocked from vulgar stare,
Dream of their hidden beauty rare,
Since Comstock dragged them all away?
What trousers staid does Cupid wear?
Where are the nudes of yesterday?

And tell me in what cheesecloth grim
Does Hermes mourn in mute despair?
Where Satyrs, Nymphs and Cherubim
With lamentations fill the air?
Where stately Juno tears her hair
Since Tony barred décollete
For what new styles do Sirens care?
Where are the nudes of yesterday?

Say where immortal line and limb
Stand shrouded deep with dust, and where
The shapes that once were synonym
For storied Greece, oblivion share;
And bath-robed Goddesses declare
That classic curves are not au fait
And art undraped is tres vulgaire?
Where are the nudes of yesterday?

When ruthlessly he bore away
The naked Gods and Naiads fair
That once were nudes of yesterday.
—George S. Marsh.

A California Thespian Club in New York.

There is a well organized movement on foot to establish among the members of the theatrical profession in New York City a California club. It is estimated that fully 500 prominent actors, managers, and playwrights now in New York, hail originally from California, says the New York Globe. The originator of the movement to establish the club is Edwin Stevens, a comedian, who began his career at the famous old Tivoli of San Francisco, a theatre which up to its destruction by the earthquake held the record of having had presented on its boards more comic operas than any playhouse in the world.

By circular letter Mr. Stevens has communicated with a number of his former San Francisco colleagues, all of whom are enthusiastic about the matter. Among those who regard the project favorably are David Warfield, W. A. Brady, David Belasco, Ben Teal, Marcus R. Mayer, Al Hayman, Max Freeman, Frank Hatch, E. D. Price, George Lask, Hugh Ford, Joseph Grismer, Blanche Bates, "Lotta" Crabtree, Florence Roberts, Phoebe Davis, Desmond Kelley, and Rosabel Morrison.

Pulpit Praise of the Play.

A party made up of clergymen from Southern towns recently visited New York City and most of its attractions for the first time. One of the ministers wrote a letter to the New York World, expressing pleasure in his reception and treatment and including the following criticisms of things theatrical:

Of three of New York's theatrical plays—namely, "The Lion and the Mouse," "The Man on the Box" and Blanche Bates' "The Girl of the Golden West," the first named is by far the greatest and purest. The second named is a good moral show. The last named is not objectionable, though there is no great moral principle involved. Ministers of the Gospel should hear and study great actors. But there is a black side to theatrical life in New York. I saw acts on the New York stage that would bring the blush to a wiry and fiery demon from hell. Any play that shows a woman above her knees was conceived in hell, and those who patronize that class of shows can not possibly behold such things and keep pure.

San Bernardino and Redlands school officials are taking concerted action to stamp out fraternities existing in the public schools, adopting the most stringent measures. This aggressive action is the result of the conduct of the societies, one of which in persuading the wife of Professor Cyrus Rector, a science teacher at the High School, to be initiated, blindfolded her, put a halter around her head, tied her by a rope to the back of a hay wagon and led her in broad daylight through the streets of Rialto.

LITERARY NOTES.

The "Cities" of Spain.

"I went to Spain in ignorance and in love," says the author of "The Cities of Spain." "She is the one country left to us that is almost untouched by all that we mean by modern civilization; and though for no other cause, yet for this I find her the most beautiful country in Europe; that with her abide the mountains and the deserts and over all the sun."

There is not a dollar sign, a pound mark, a line of statistics in the book. Mr. Hutton will have none of Barcelona—"a hateful city"—because, forsooth, it is the one city in Spain that is devoted to commerce. And pretentious Madrid, aping Paris, is only ridiculous in Mr. Hutton's eyes. Her architecture is modern, debased, and feeble; "her streets are ill-paved and filthy, her people noisy, miserable, and rapacious, her climate the worst in Spain." He would have Spain remain the Don Quixote of the nations, fighting windmills—manufactured in other countries—proudly garbed in tattered finery and mounted on her spavined hobby, Ancient Splendor. Mr. Hutton, in short, would have her remain a picturesque, but poor, refuge and holiday ground for the occasional sympathetic tourist. But commerce buys navies and clothes armies; and battleships and soldiers preserve and protest national pride—and insular possessions.

We are, however, grateful to Mr. Hutton for his charming book. An impressive introduction at once puts us in touch with his mood and manner. Journeying by mule out of Zamora, accompanied by an old peasant, they pitch their tent at nightfall under the silence of the desert stars. "Suddenly I saw my companion a little way off on his knees between the immense horizons, praying. As I watched the rugged, picturesque figure of the old man, his head buried on his breast, his hands clasped before him, I thought it was Spain that I had seen, alone, talking with God in the desert."

Entering Spain by the classical gateway Irun, from the north, Mr. Hutton visited Burgos with its magnificent cathedral; Valladolid, "commercial and uninteresting," but reminiscent of the Inquisition; Salamanca, the Rose of the Desert; golden Zamora, whose streets of old were crimsoned by the blood of Moor and Spaniard; Avila, the holy city of Castile, beautiful in her desolation, "the visible image of the word Amen"; Segovia, and its Roman relics; the Prado Gallery of Madrid, with its Titians, its Murillos, its Goyas, its Riberras, and its almost complete collection of Velasquez; Toledo, scarred but still lovely; Cordova, like "a ruined sepulchre forgotten in the midst of the desert from which even the dead have stolen away"; gay Seville, the city of women; Cadiz, the white city; Malaga, still possessed in spirit by the Arabs; Granada, "the color of dust, shrunken and thirsty, continually burning away," and above her, the Alhambra, rising among the woods, a dream temple.

And over all the sun—and all about, silence. The book is beautifully illustrated; of the 48 pictures, 24 are handsome watercolors by A. Wallace Rimington.

Published by The Macmillan Company; $2.

Hopkinson-Smith's Romance-Tragedy.

"The Tides of Barnegat," by F. Hopkinson-Smith, will be welcomed in book form by those who read the story as a serial. The tale is more serious and tragical than one would expect from the creator of Colonel Carter. But while there is the gloom of impending storms, there is also the light of a glistening summer sea. The author's skillful delineation of character, and his luminous descriptive touches are in none of his books given more artistic expression.

"The Tides of Barnegat" is a tale of sin and self-sacrifice. The story covers a period of twenty years. Lucy Cobden, a willful, spoiled young hoyden, spends her young womanhood in Paris, that Warholld village may not learn of her shame. Her sister brings the child to the family home, and upon her, through all the years, rests the burden of Lucy's misdoings. Uncomplainingly, Miss Jane bears the obloquy, and not until the boy, and his father, are drowned and cast ashore by the tides, is the burden lifted from her. The ending is dramatic in the extreme.

The illustrator, George Wright, has portrayed the pivotal incidents of the story with sympathetic art.

Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $1.50.

Father Prout.

"Benigna Vena: Essays, Literary and Personal," by Michael Monahan, were worth the reading if only for the author's appreciations of his two gifted countrymen, Father Prout and William Maginn. His sketches of Heine, Maupassant, Poe, Byron, Dickens, and other choice spirits of the last century, are written in the sympathetic manner of the ardent lover of books, but, excellent as they are, they have been done better by others. Mr. Monahan reckons Dr. Maginn and Father Prout as the two wisest Irishmen of the last century. Both were strong Tories and good Irishmen; both were profound linguists and classic essayists; both were inveterate literary hoaxers; and the one was a Catholic priest, and the other a stout Protestant.

The Prout Papers, many exquisite translations from Horace and the Italian poets, and other admirable work, give Father Prout an honorable place in literature. But, as Mr. Monahan observes, you do not always get what you expect from the roguish Father Prout. Some of Prout's fooling—a polyglot version of a familiar Irish song—got into the hands of several members of the College of Cardinals, and they proposed to the Pope to reward a priest-author of such eminent attainments. Father Prout's comment was: "All roads they say, lead to Rome, but would it not have been droll if I had got there myself through the 'Groves of Blarney'?"

Prout ingeniously attempted to prove that Moore's melodies were plagiarized from the Greek, and it was only last July, as we noted in a previous issue, that a writer in the Critic announced the "amazing discovery" that Wolfe's poem, "The Burial of Sir John Moore," was a translation from the French, to learn, to his chagrin, that Prout had made the French version and pretended to regard it as the original.

A Detective Mystery.

"Frances Baird, Detective," is, as indicated by the title, a detective story with a good-looking sleuth for a heroine. Needless to say, since the author, R. W. Kauffman, finds it necessary to engage the reader's sympathies for his heroine, that Frances is a fair sentimentalist who allows her feelings to interfere with business. She strikes us as a very poor detective, being much given to evolving elaborate and ingenious hypotheses which prove untenable. The story, however, will prove a sufficiently toothsome bait to satisfy the reader who likes to nibble at detective mysteries.

New Publications.

Wallace Irwin's latest collection of verse, "Chinatown Ballads," is dedicated to "The City of Dreams that has returned to the magic box of the Dreamer"—that city which has inspired him in the singing of care-free songs, and whose bard he gives promise of being. In "Chinatown Ballads" there are the half-shadows of the noisome alleys, the red and gold of the balconies, the rustle of the slave-girls' silks, the odor of punk smoke, the crack of the highbinder's pistol, described in the dialect of the white "hop fiend." Published by Fox, Duffield & Co., New York; $1.25.

Right Rev. D. S. Tuttle, who was the Episcopal bishop of Montana, Idaho and Utah, from 1867 to 1887, has published a recital of his experiences under the title, "Reminiscences of a Missionary Bishop." Bishop Tuttle's pastoral duties were extended over a field 350,000 square miles in extent, and his adventures were many and varied as he journeyed from camp to camp. He gives interesting glimpses of Mormonism in its zenith. Bishop Tuttle lived in the midst of "the Saints" for seventeen years. Published by Thomas Whittaker; $2.00 net.

"The Rainy Day Railroad War," by Holman F. Day, is a stirring story for boys. Both artist and author have given of their best for the entertainment of their young readers. Published by A. S. Barnes & Co.; $1.00.

"The Balance of Power," by Arthur Goodrich, is an American novel—as American as Thanksgiving Day. The story is concerned with life in a Connecticut factory town—its labor troubles, its captains of industry, its romances, and its everyday occupations. The characterization is clever, and the dramatic quality strong. Published by the Outing Publishing Company; $1.50.

"The Upper Hand," by Emerson Gifford Taylor, is the tale of a series of odd happenings that disturbed the serenity of a New England town. The village Graggrind, his lovely ward, her artist lover, and a mysterious character who has been a piratical sea-farer, are the participants in strange adventures. There is also a budding Socialist, who foments a strike, an incident which seems to be necessary to the "atmosphere" of the present day novel. Published by A. S. Barnes & Co., New York; $1.50.

The fifth edition of "The Young Folks' Cyclopædia of Persons and Places," by John Denison Champlin, A. M., has just been issued. This valuable work has been thoroughly revised and brought down to date; events as recent as the San Francisco disaster are noticed. The book deserves a place in every school and home library. Published by Henry Holt & Co., New York; $2.50.

Recent excellent text-books of The American Book Company, New York, are: "Half Hours with Fishes, Reptiles, and Birds" (60 cents), by Charles Frederic Holder, of Southern California. This is an interesting introduction to the study of zoology. A four-book course in singing, "Melodic Music Series," by Frederic H. Ripley and Thomas Tapper. First Reader (25 cents); Second Reader (30 cents); Third Reader (40 cents); Fourth Reader (50 cents). A feature of this series is a noteworthy collection of songs by eminent living composers. "Little Stories of France (40 cents), by Maude Barrows Dutton, tells the story of France by taking from each epoch a central figure—such as Joan of Arc or Napoleon. Milne's "Progressive Arithmetic." First Book (35 cents); Second Book (40 cents); Third Book (45 cents). Brooks' "Readers." First Year (25 cents); Second Year (35 cents); Fourth and Fifth Years (50 cents); Sixth, Seventh, and Eighth Years (60 cents).

An essay "On Reading," by George Brandes, the eminent Danish critic, may be read in ten minutes, and pondered over for as many hours. Published by Fox, Duffield & Co., New York; 75 cents.

A neat booklet entitled "A Dictionary of Sierra Madre" has been compiled by J. G. Blumer, for the guidance of tourists, travelers and investors. Mr. Blumer has not found it necessary to use the high-flown exaggerations of the boomer. His concise and pertinent paragraphs give the seeker for information all the necessary details, without comment. Published by the Sierra Madre Development Co., Sierra Madre, Cal.

"Our Little Scotch Cousins," by Blanche McManus, is a narrative of the visit of a party of children to the historic spots of Scotland. Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston; 60 cents.

"The Cruise of the Conqueror," by G. Sydney Paternoster, is the adventures of a twentieth Century Captain Kidd. In his wonderful motor-boat he pursues and holds up an ocean mail steamer, seizes the Prince of Monte Carlo, and burns a vessel at sea. It is an exciting story for boys. Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston; $1.50.

LITERARY NOTES.

Health Aristocracy.

All of us, in theory, account perfect health a priceless possession. None of us, in theory, would exchange good health and no wealth for poor health and great wealth. "I would rather be healthy than rich," is the trite expression. We don't mean it.

In "The Aristocracy of Health," the author, Mary Foote Henderson, reminds us of the astonishing perseverance with which we compel the body to accept health-exhausting habits. Our beginnings in alcoholism are attended by nausea, and the protests of outraged stomach, nerves, and heart. We smoke our first cigar with chokings, and coughing, and expectoration. Nature is crying out against the poisonous intruders. But we return again and again to the attack, and our tortured membranes, paralyzed and enfeebled, at last cease to rebel, and we are the proud possessors of two accomplishments—a capacity for liquor, and a wholesale consumption of tobacco! If we are sincere in our desire for sound bodies, the author assures us, we need simply avoid our favorite poisons—alcohol, tobacco, tea, coffee, meats—from which proceed practically all ailments, all crime, and all insanity. If we would enter the chosen circle of health aristocracy the means are at hand—fresh air, pure water, wholesome food, and systematic exercise. In short, illness is a product of our own culture, to be remedied only by a culture in reverse.

Mrs. Henderson marshals a host of scientific facts to rout the plausible fallacies of the stimulant-users. Do not men and women use tobacco, spirits, coffee, and tea, and live to be eighty years? Undoubtedly, but they are endowed with a constitution that is possessed by one person in many thousands. An octogenarian president of a notorious drinking club in London contended that liquor did not injure him. But he acknowledged that he had buried the whole club three times.

May one not drink and smoke moderately without injury and intoxication? Are not the French, all wine-consumers, a temperate people? You will find only one centenarian among 365,000 Frenchmen; in the United States, one in every 9,000. Insanity has tripled in thirty years in France; every third birth in Paris is illegitimate. The author proves that the assertion that alcohol is a food, is John Barleycorn's grimmest joke. Well, then, a short life and a merry one. Short you will have it, says Mrs. Henderson, but no one knows better than yourself that your racked body knows little of merriment. Temperance advocates are reminded that their love of tea is an inebriation differing from the whiskey-drinker's only in degree. There are several valuable chapters on diet.

A Navel by May Sinclair.

The publishers are profiting by the success of "The Divine Fire," by reprinting the earlier novels of May Sinclair. In "Audrey Craven," Miss Sinclair has portrayed a character that might easily have been improbable and stupid in less skillful hands. Vain, fickle, flirtatious, commonplace even—a small creature struggling with things too great for her—Audrey's conquests we accept without question. Haviland, the artist, she sends to the gunsmith's on suicide bent, Hardy, the sportsman, chooses deliberate drunkenness and degradation, Reed, the minister, compromises with the Church of Rome and celibacy. Wyndham, the novelist, the one lover to whom she has offered sincere affection, spurns her, after he has exhausted his study of her for literary purposes. And at the end Audrey closes her quest of the superlative by marrying a nonentity.

A Story of the Bonanza Days.

"Blindfolded," by Earle Ashley Walcott, is a delirious tale of San Francisco in the Seventies. As a serial, it had the honor of succeeding "In the Bishop's Carriage" and "The House of a Thousand Candles," in the pages of The Reader. It belongs in the pink sheets of The Messenger Boy's Own. The hero witnesses a murder on the Barbary Coast, a few minutes after his arrival from the East, and until his election as President of the Omega Mining Company, a month or so later, his path is slippery with blood, and dark with mystery. The story is sibilant with "Hists!" It will make a capital melodrama for a ten-cent playhouse.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

A household edition of the "Complete Poems of Edward Rowland Sill," with a portrait and a brief biography will be brought out this fall.

No part of Mark Twain's life history, which is now appearing serially, will be published in book form while he lives. He has already written 250,000 words of his autobiography, which he began many years ago. His aim, he declares, has been to set down the things which have interested him. Mr. Clemens says he confided his plans to Mr. Howells, who approved of them, which, as the autobiographer remarks, was wise and judicious. "If he had manifested a different spirit I would have thrown him out of the window. I like criticism, but it must be my way."

Henry George, Jr., has turned novelist, and it is said his father is the hero, or the original of the hero, of his story, "The Romance of John Bainbridge."

The North American Review is now issued as a fortnightly magazine, and contains a new department devoted to the criticism of current literature. Ninety-one years ago the North American started as a quarterly. Sixty years later it became a bi-monthly, and for a generation it has been a monthly.

Among the books just out or soon to appear are "Back to Mafeking," by Gen. Baden-Powell; "The Great Days of Versailles; or, Sketches from Court Life in the Later Years of Louis XIV"; "The Life of Richard III," by Sir Clements Markham.

Anna Katherine Green is in private life Mrs. Charles Rohlf, wife of the well-known Shakespearean scholar, and owner of the "Rohlf Shop" in Buffalo, producing original and artistic pieces of furniture signed by the maker. Her "Leavenworth Case," has been in constant demand for twenty-five years.

Michael Monahan of Cranford, N. J., has given up the publication of his magazine, The Papyrus.

Upton Sinclair, whose novel, "The Jungle," resulted in the searching inspection of the Chicago packing houses, is preparing a novel. It is called "The Financier," and it deals with the accumulation of vast American estates and their subsequent disposal.

An attempt was made recently by a New Orleans negress to show that she was the legal wife of Lafcadio Hearn. The effort proved a failure. The New Orleans Times-Democrat, to which Hearn contributed many of his early sketches, defends his reputation. It flatly contradicts an article in the New York Sun which gave many fanciful and derogatory details of Hearn's life. The Southern editor quotes the Sun's statement that Hearn "lived with negroes, not of the ordinary cornfield type, but the Congo priestesses and prophetesses, as a matter of fact with no less a personage than Marie Laveau, the voodoo queen," and says that this wonderful tale is based on one simple fact. Hearn interviewed a negro woman who called herself Marie Laveau, and who pretended to know something about voodooism, and who, it was shown, was a fake.

The correspondence of Dr. John Brown, author of "Rab and His Friends," will soon be published. The book will contain letters from Erskine, Thackeray, Ruskin, and many others.

Charles H. Lummis, editor of Out West, has an elaborate article, in the September issue, on the Los Angeles Public Library, of which he is librarian. He describes some of the features of the library, which surpasses in circulation the free libraries of Baltimore, San Francisco, Cincinnati and other cities. It ranks first among public libraries in this country in number of volumes per capita and in circulation per capita, second in circulation per volume, ninth in gross circulation even as against cities fourteen times the size of Los Angeles and with ten times as many books.

The September Sunset.

The September Sunset magazine is an attractive number. There is a striking article by Joseph Le Conte, "In the Highest Sierra," dealing with a trip from the Yosemite to Kings River canyon. Mr. Le Conte's word-pictures of the region, and remarkable photographs by the author, give one an excellent idea of the magnificent scenery of the river canyons. A feature of the September Sunset is a symposium on "San Francisco's Future" to which the following contribute: W. A. Magee, Mayor Schmitz, Dr. Omori, W. H. Marston, C. H. Dunsmoor, and L. E. Aubrey. The third part of Charles Warren Stoddard's "Old Mission Idylls" is devoted to the closing years of Junipero Serra's life. Other readable, illustrated articles are "The Klamath Irrigation Project," by C. J. Blanchard; "The Newest Manhattan," by Henry Hedrick; "Those Nevada Bonanzas," by Clara E. Douglas; "The Sunny Side of Yuma," by Jerome B. Landfield, and "California's Capital County—Sacramento," by W. B. Thorpe. "Sunset's Rodeo," a department for short articles of various kinds, is an interesting new department. Of the verse, the best is a dialect rhyme of San Francisco's breadline, by Charles K. Field, entitled "Barriers Burned."

A Bookman's Outlook.

I can't afford a mile of sward,
Parterres and peacocks gay;
For velvet lawns and marble fauns
Mere authors cannot pay.

And so I went and pitched my tent
Above a harbor fair,
Where vessels picturesquely rigg'd
Obligingly repair.

The harbor is not mine at all;
I make it so; what odds?
And gulls unwitting on my wall
Serve me for garden gods.

By ships that ride below kaleid-Oscopically changed
Unto my mind each day I find
My garden rearranged.

These, madam, are my daffodils,
My pinks, my hollyhocks,
My berds upon a hundred hills,
My phloxes and my flocks.

And when some day you deign to pay
The call that's overdue,
I'll wave a landlord's easy hand
And say, "Admire my view!"

An American Author's Anniversary.

Thus far little or no attention has been paid to the memory of N. P. Willis in this year which marks the one hundredth anniversary of his birth. There was no more conspicuous figure in American letters in his own era than Willis. Prof. H. T. Peck, in The Bookman, fears that he is but vaguely remembered at this time. He was born Jan. 20, 1806, and died in 1867. Prof. Peck somewhat atones for the neglect to fittingly celebrate his centenary by an article on Willis and his contemporaries, in which he treats of his hero as the friend of Byron and the Countess Guiccioli, of Charles and Mary Lamb, of Joanna Baillie, of Campbell and Disraeli, of D'Ossay and the fair Blessington, of Thackeray and Dickens. Marryat challenged Willis to a duel because of some indiscreet remarks Willis had made about Marryat's sea stories. In America Willis was the contemporary and friend of Longfellow, Emerson, Hawthorne, Peter Parley, Parton, Chevalier Wikoff, Edwin Forrest. Moreover, he was a poet, romancer, and essayist, who from the very first lived well on the product of his pen. He was well paid for his work in an era when literature generally was poorly remunerated. Prof. Peck says:

When he first went abroad, in 1831, it was with only $500 as his fortune and a promise of $10 for every letter he should write for The New York Mirror—not more, however, than one letter each week. In Europe Willis lived with nobles and gentlemen, dined at ease with kings, consorted with the greatest in whatever land he visited, paid his way, married, returned home, purchased an estate, received what was then the handsome revenue of $7500 annually, entertained lavishly, went everywhere—and all by the magic of his pen, in a country which had but half awakened to an appreciation of literature, and which was hungering only after newspapers.

Probably this view of Willis, as the handsome, popular raconteur and gossip is more interesting and informing nowadays than a mere statement of the fact that he wrote the once enormously popular poems called "Absalom" and "The Leper," and that he edited The Home Journal and The Corsair.

Lewis Melville, the English author, has finished a book on George IV., "The First Gentleman of Europe." The book treats of the social life rather than of the political affairs of the later Georgian period, and everything is grouped round the King as a personality: his gaming and racing, his dissipations and his love affairs, his friends and his enemies—all that makes a complete portrait of him.

An English critic having said that Mr. Henry James "gropes his way through the English language like a blind man tapping with a stick," the London Globe rejoins that he might do worse, that his methods at least are "better than those of some other novelists who dance through the language as if they were doing a cake-walk."

The poems of Sarah C. Woolsey, better known by her pen name of Susan Coolidge, who died in April, 1905, have been collected by her sister, Mrs. Daniel C. Gilman, and will be published.

PERSONAL.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

The engagement is announced of Miss Carmelita Dibblee, the daughter of the late Mr. Thomas Dibblee of Santa Barbara, to Mr. Francis T. Underhill. No date has been announced for the wedding.

The wedding of Miss Eva Powell and Mr. Andrew Thorne took place on Wednesday of last week at the home of the bride on Pine street. The ceremony was performed at noon by the Rev. Bradford Leavitt of the First Unitarian Church. There were no attendants and only the nearest relatives were present. After a brief wedding journey Mr. and Mrs. Thorne will live at 3873 Clay street.

Mrs. Henry Glass was the hostess at a tea recently at her home in Berkeley, in honor of Mrs. Charles Plummer Perkins of the United States Naval Station at Yerba Buena Island. Among the guests were Mrs. Merrill Miller, Mrs. Spencer Browne, Mrs. John F. Swift, Mrs. John Parker, Mrs. Dodd, Mrs. Norris, Mrs. Frank Glass, Mrs. Henry Martinez, Mrs. Henry Butters, Mrs. Greenleaf, Mrs. Woodworth and Miss Brown.

Baron von Horst took a party of twenty guests to Santa Rosa last week to see the hop pickers there, going up in Mr. A. W. Foster's private car, which he gave for the occasion. Those in the party were: Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Mrs. Patrick Calhoun, Dr. and Mrs. A. H. Voorhies, Mrs. Ynez Shorb White, Miss Anita Harvey, Miss Martha Calhoun, Miss Janette von Schroeder, Miss Isabel Donahue, Miss Genevieve Harvey, Miss Margaret Calhoun, Count de la Rocca, Mr. Burke, Mr. Philip Paschel, Mr. Thornwell Mullally, Mr. Harry Stetson and Mr. Edward Davis.

Mrs. Charles Plummer Perkins entertained on board the S.S. Pensacola at Yerba Buena Island on Friday of last week in honor of Mrs. Patrick Calhoun. Among the guests were: Mrs. Calhoun, Mrs. A. W. Foster, Mrs. A. H. Voorhies, Mrs. Henry Glass, Mrs. Malcolm Henry, Mrs. Reynolds, Mrs. Ynez Shorb White and Mrs. W. W. Dixon.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Butters entertained at dinner on Tuesday of last week at their home in Piedmont in honor of Secretary and Mrs. Victor H. Metcalf, who left on Sunday last for their home in Washington, D. C. Among those present were: Mr. and Mrs. Robert Augustus Bray, Mrs. G. B. Cook, Mr. and Mrs. David S. Edwards, Miss Viva Nicholson, Miss Marie Butters, Miss Marguerite Butters, and Mr. Howard Metcalf.

Mrs. Simpson, the wife of Colonel Wendell L. Simpson, U. S. A., was the hostess at a "500" party at her home at the Presidio on Tuesday afternoon of last week.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a resume of movements to and from this city and Coast and of the whereabouts of absent Californians.

Mr. and Mrs. Patrick Calhoun, Miss Martha Calhoun and Miss Margaret Calhoun left on Monday last for Cleveland, Ohio.

Mr. and Mrs. Julius Kruttschnitt and Miss Rebecca Kruttschnitt, who have been staying at the Del Monte, left last week for their home in Chicago.

Mr. and Mrs. Timothy Hopkins and Miss Lydia Hopkins have gone from their country place at Menlo to Del Monte for a few weeks stay.

Mr. and Mrs. Francis J. Sullivan and their family have taken a house in San Jose, where they will spend the winter.

Mrs. Longstreet and her brother, Mr. Alfred Wilcox, came up last week in their motor-car from their home in Los Angeles for a brief stay in town.

Mrs. Frank Van Ness has arrived here from Cape Town, South Africa, and is a guest at the home of her husband's parents, Mr. and Mrs.

T. C. Van Ness, on Octavia street. Mr. Van Ness expects to come here soon and they will make their home in California.

Mr. and Mrs. James V. Coleman are spending a few weeks at their cottage at Angels, but will go abroad a little later for an indefinite stay.

Mrs. Gertrude Atherton sailed recently for Europe and will spend the winter at Munich.

Mr. Charles W. Dilke, a son of Sir Charles Dilke, has arrived here for a visit, and has been a guest at the University Club.

Mr. and Mrs. Ernest Willsee have returned to Paris after a five weeks' stay at Carlsbad.

Mrs. Herman Oelrichs has recently been the guest of friends at San Mateo.

Mrs. J. J. Brece, who spent several days last week in the city, having come in from her country home in the Napa Valley, left on Sunday night for a visit to Santa Barbara.

Mrs. Lloyd Baldwin and Miss Grace Baldwin are spending several weeks at Los Gatos.

Colonel and Mrs. W. R. Smedberg and Miss Cora Smedberg, who have been in San Rafael for the summer, expect to remain there during the winter. Miss Smedberg has recently returned from a week's stay at Burlingame.

Mr. and Mrs. Andrew Carrigan have returned from a three weeks' trip to Eureka.

Mr. and Mrs. C. E. Maude have returned to Del Monte after a visit to Mrs. Henry T. Scott at Burlingame.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Foster Dutton sailed on the Siberia on Friday of last week for Honolulu, where they will be the guests of Mrs. Dutton's sister, Mrs. Harry Macfarlane.

Dr. and Mrs. Alexander Garceau will come to San Francisco on October 1st to spend the winter, after having been at San Mateo for several months.

Mr. and Mrs. Wellington Greggs, Jr., have taken a house in San Mateo, where they expect to spend the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Jules Clerfayt have returned from a trip through Northern California and will spend the winter in Oakland.

Miss Marietta Havens of Oakland will leave shortly for a visit to Dr. and Mrs. Thomas McNab in Los Angeles.

Mr. and Mrs. Emil Bruguiere have returned from Europe and are at their home at Monterey.

Miss Kathleen Thompson has returned from a week's stay at Mare Island as the guest of her cousins, Admiral and Mrs. Henry W. Lyon.

Mrs. Ives and Miss Florence Ives have returned from Del Monte and are here for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles Butters, who went abroad recently, have left London and arrived early this month in Paris.

Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Charles Meyerstein left last Sunday for New York and will visit Dr. and Mrs. Harold A. Johnson of Boston. In October Mr. and Mrs. Meyerstein and Mr. and Mrs. Johnson will probably go abroad.

Miss Adeline Mills, who has been living in San Jose for some time past, accompanied by Miss Josephine Polhemus, sailed last week from San Francisco for Japan. They expect to return by way of Europe.

It is believed that Mrs. Philip V. Lansdale and her sisters, Miss Helen Sidney Smith and Miss Bertha Sidney Smith, were on board the Mongolia when she went on the rocks off Midway Island. Mrs. Lansdale and her sisters, who have been traveling in China and Japan for six months past, were in Yokohama when last heard from, expecting to sail on the Mongolia, due to arrive in San Francisco on September 23. If they sailed as planned they have doubtless passed through some trying experiences.

Vice-President and General Manager Lewis Glass of the Pacific States Telephone and Telegraph Company has gone to the Philippine Islands on a three months' trip, combining business with pleasure. On his return to San Francisco he will resume his duties with the Telephone Syndicate under President Henry T. Scott. His relations with President Scott are most cordial, and the same can be said of his relations with the Boston and New York people who are interested in the Pacific States and California telephone and telegraph service.

Notes from Lake Tahoe.

Mrs. Will S. Tevis is still enjoying her houseboat at Sand Harbor, Lake Tahoe, in company with Mrs. Will Taylor, and the two make it agreeable to their many visitors from other points on the lake.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Kohl and Mrs. William H. Kohl, who have been at their villa, four miles from Tahoe Tavern, since June, are making preparations for their regular autumn exodus. The Kohls have entertained numbers of their friends at luncheons and teas at their home and in yachting during the season.

Mr. and Mrs. Isaias W. Hellman have closed their home on Lake Tahoe for the season, where they have had many visitors, including their sons and daughters and their children.

Miss Van Nuys of Los Angeles has been visiting Mrs. I. W. Hellman at Lake Tahoe.

Among the people still remaining at Lake Tahoe are Mrs. Charles S. Fee and children, Mr. and Mrs. Ben C. Truman and daughter, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Herrick, Mr. and Mrs. Pillsbury and Mrs. Arthur C. Page.

Mr. William A. Bissell and Mr. and Mrs. Babcock are still at their summer places on the lake.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Charles Sedgwick Aiken (formerly Miss Ednah Robinson), has been brightened by the advent of a son.

Memories.

I remember, I remember

My magenta wool delaine,

My salmon togioni, too

(Twas lined with satin jean),

My lovely light blue empress cloth,

Picked out with bands of dove,

I wore the night Joe came to call,

And told me of his love.

—Carolyn Wells, in Good Housekeeping.

Oh, Carolyn, fair Carolyn,

You do surprise me so!

Now, something of this love affair

I'd greatly like to know.

If Joe made love to you one night,

Down 'mid the sands and shells,

Just please to tell me, Carolyn,

Why is your name now Wells?

—Edwin A. Oliver, in Yonkers Statesman.

Oh, Oliver, dear Oliver,

Why should you worry so?

Let Carolyn a sister be

To Jim and John and Joe.

And, Oliver, you shouldn't chaff

About an unchanged name;

For, oh, the fault may all be yours—

And that would be a shame.

—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Chicago's annual advertising show, the third event of its kind in the world, promises to be the most comprehensive exhibition of commercial promotion, business publicity, and competitive ingenuity ever given. The show is to be held October 8th to 16th, inclusive, and each day will have its special programme including addresses by experts from all parts of the world. Daily newspapers will operate plants showing complete workings, several novelty manufacturing concerns will have displays, from abroad will come a number of rapid printing presses and presses for special purposes, original and ingenious experts will show their latest and most startling schemes, and the exposition will be one of education for the general business man.

The desperation with which the managements of the New York and Mutual Life Insurance Companies are fighting to keep their positions indicates that even the reduced salaries are still much too large and attractive. The president's pay in the case of the Mutual has been cut from $150,000 to $50,000, but the new incumbent is nevertheless resorting to all sorts of expedients to prevent the policy-holders' committee from electing a new board of directors which would probably elect a new president; and the same is true of the aged and otherwise largely occupied Mr. Orr of the New York Life, who also gets $50,000 a year in place of the $100,000 paid John A. McCall.

Charles Campbell, a survivor of the world-famed battle between the Monitor and the Merrimac, died a few days ago in the asylum at Fort Stratoom, Washington, aged 74 years. When the United States fleet was blocking the waters of Hampton Roads, Campbell was aboard the man-of-war Cumberland, one of the wooden warships which were rendered worthless by the advent of the protected vessels. When the Cumberland went down he was one of the few survivors. He was taken aboard another man-of-war and for twenty years more served his country in the navy. For the last twenty years he lived at Old Tacoma.

Shipping men generally are much interested in a cable dispatch from Tokio, which states that the Empress of China, on arriving at Tokio, reported that considerable changes have taken place in Pacific ocean currents. They regard this as accounting for the stranding of so many steamers recently in the Pacific in the vicinity of the Hawaiian Islands. The Tokio dispatch adds that the report of tidal changes harmonizes with the Kobe report of a great earthquake in mid-Pacific which preceded the convulsion at Valparaiso by several hours, and is believed to have made important changes in the bed of the ocean.

James McNally, the oldest man in London, is dead at the age of 109½ years. Many years ago he spent some time as a seaman in the royal navy, and there is a legend that he was discharged from the navy as being unfit for further service on account of delicate health. Last St. Patrick's Day he sang a song before fellow-inmates of St. Peter's Home at South Lambert.

"Doctors are as a usual thing intensely loyal to their country and their locality." "What makes you think so?" "I have just been reading that a California physician's first prescription whatever the ailment of his patient is invariably prunes."—Houston Post.

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy people who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Lieutenant General Arthur MacArthur, U. S. A., accompanied by Colonel Frank L. Winn, U. S. A., and Major S. W. Dunning, U. S. A., visited Alcatraz and Angel Island on Tuesday of last week. While at the latter post a telegram arrived announcing that the President had signed General MacArthur's commission as Lieutenant General of the Army. Colonel Alfred Reynolds, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., ordered the Lieutenant General's salute to be fired at once, and assembled his officers for an informal reception in honor of the highest officer of the army.

Brigadier General Frederick Funston, U. S. A., sailed on Monday last from Port Tampa, Florida for Havana, to join Secretary Taft.

Brigadier General James Biddle, U. S. A., married, who lives at Santa Barbara, is at present visiting his son, Mr. Nicholas Biddle in New York. He will spend several weeks in the East and will before his return visit Washington, D. C.

Colonel William H. Comegys, U. S. A., chief paymaster, Department of California, was recently promoted to his present rank on account of the retirement of General F. S. Dodge, U. S. A., paymaster general of the army.

Lieutenant Colonel John P. Wisser received a telegram from Washington, D. C., last week authorizing a delay of three weeks in his departure from Fort Baker for Washington, where he goes to receive instructions prior to his departure for Berlin as military attaché.

Lieutenant Colonel George F. Cooke, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., has been granted a month's leave of absence on a surgeon's certificate of disability.

Captain Frank L. Winn, U. S. A., has been appointed as military secretary to Lieutenant General Arthur MacArthur, U. S. A., and assumes thereby temporary rank under regulations as lieutenant colonel.

Major George L. Anderson, U. S. A., who will receive his promotion to be a lieutenant colonel almost immediately, has arrived here and reported for duty in the inspector general's department.

Major Zerah W. Torrey, inspector general's department, U. S. A., now in Washington, D. C., has been ordered to proceed to San Francisco to report to the commanding general of the Pacific Division for duty as assistant to the inspector general of this division.

Major Charles A. Bennett, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been ordered to proceed to Fort St. Houston and assume command of the Second Battalion Field Artillery.

He is now directing Major Parker West, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., to join his regiment at once has been amended so as to direct him to proceed to Fort Des Moines for the purpose of packing and shipping public property upon the completion of which he will join his proper station.

Major William Stephenson, Medical Department, U. S. A., returned to the Presidio of San Francisco last week from Camp Tacoma.

Captain Ira A. Haynes, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., whose promotion will take place almost immediately has been ordered to proceed to Vancouver Barracks and assume command of the Eleventh Battalion Field Artillery.

Captain Frank C. Jewell, U. S. A., quartermaster of the transport Logan has been granted twenty days leave of absence to take effect as soon as his services can be spared after the arrival of the Logan here.

Captain Chauncey B. Humphrey, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., has been granted one month's leave of absence on a surgeon's certificate of disability.

Captain R. W. Kirby-Smith assistant surgeon, U. S. A., has been granted one month's sick leave with permission to apply for an extension of two months.

Lieutenant Edwin C. Long, U. S. A., aide-de-camp to General Frederick Funston, U. S. A., did not accompany General Funston to China, but returned here on Friday of last week.

Lieutenant Douglas MacArthur, U. S. A., will remain here on duty at division headquarters until October 25th, when he will go to Washington, D. C., to the Engineer's School.

It is announced that Lieutenant Thomas E. Stridge has been assigned as instructor in the Department of Ordnance and Gunnery at the United States Military Academy at West Point.

Lieutenant Edward E. McCammon, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., has been granted two months' leave.

Assistant Surgeon W. F. Schaller, U. S. N., and Acting Assistant Surgeon R. I. Longabaugh, U. S. N., are ordered detached from the naval post at Mare Island and assigned to duty in attendance on a course of instruction at the Naval Medical School, Washington, D. C.

The battalion of Field Artillery, commanded by Major E. T. Brown, U. S. A., did not return from Camp Tacoma with the rest of the troops at the close of the maneuvers, but remained there for target practice.

Lieutenant Louis Brechemin, Jr., sailed on the Syria on Friday of last week for Honolulu to join her husband, Captain Brechemin, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., who went from Seattle on the transport Buford to the wrecked vessels, Sheridan, Manchuria and Mongolia, in mid-Pacific.

The officers and crew of the Marblehead have been transferred to the Yorktown, while the former vessel is being extensively overhauled at Mare Island.

The Twenty-first Infantry, U. S. A., commanded by Colonel C. A. Williams, U. S. A., will arrive here on October 20 on the transport Logan, from the Philippines, and will proceed to Fort Logan, Colorado, for station.

The Sixth Infantry, U. S. A., commanded by Colonel J. W. Duncan, U. S. A., will arrive here from the Philippines on November 10th. The headquarters, band and first battalion will go to Fort William Henry Harrison, Montana, the second battalion to Fort Lincoln, North Dakota, and the third battalion to Fort Missoula, Montana. The return of these two regiments will reduce the number of troops in the Philippines to the number stationed there before there was the possibility of any trouble in China.

The contractor's trial of the U. S. S. California now building at the Union Iron Works, will take place about October 1st. The final trial will take place about November 1st, being conducted by a board of officers selected from among those on duty on the Pacific Coast.

Judge Robert J. Tobin, pioneer jurist and banker, died at his home in San Francisco, September 18, aged 78. He was born in Waterford, Ireland, in 1828. Ten years later, with his father, mother and brother Richard, he sailed for Australia, going thence to Chile, where the family resided for a decade, Robert meanwhile spending several adventurous months in Tahiti. He came to San Francisco in October, 1847. From the first he was prominent in public affairs. He was a justice of the peace for many years, a position which was no sinecure in the exciting era when San Francisco was being evolved from Yerba Buena into a Western metropolis. For thirty-three years Judge Tobin had served as secretary of the Hibernia Savings and Loan Society, and he was a founder of that institution. As president of the city's Board of Police Commissioners he held office for twenty-three consecutive years.

Rear-Admiral Sir Edward Chichester, who commanded the British squadron at Manila during the Spanish-American war, died at Gibraltar, September 17th. In July, 1898, Von Diederichs was in command of the German squadron gathered in Manila Bay, and it was believed that he, representing his Emperor, was hostile to Dewey's plans. Von Diederichs asked the then Captain Chichester what he would do if the Germans interfered to stop the bombardment of Manila. Captain Chichester answered promptly: "Only Admiral Dewey and myself know, sir." This answer settled forever any thoughts Germany might have had of interference, and did much to knit close the hearts of Americans and Englishmen in the Far East.

Senator William A. Clark, the millionaire copper king and owner of the Salt Lake road, will sail from France on October 5, arriving in New York City on October 12. He will hurry to Salt Lake and take a train over his own line to Los Angeles. From that city he will come to San Francisco and then make his way to his home in Butte. The coming of Clark to California is taken to mean that he intends looking over the properties of the Sierra Railway, with a view to their purchase and extension. This railroad is owned by San Francisco and Los Angeles capital and runs from Oakdale via Jamestown to Sonora and Angels Camp. It has already begun an electric extension into the Yosemite valley.

Mayor Eugene E. Schmitz is going abroad for a vacation. He will visit first the principal Continental cities and the places of worth in the British Isles. Then he will go to Berlin, where, met and assisted by Assistant City Attorney Newberg, he will represent to the German Emperor the attitude of the American people on the welching German insurance companies. The Mayor feels that his protest will have great weight in forcing the welchers to come back into the dollar column.

Miss Hamlin has announced two courses of lectures on "Great Books," by Professor Charles M. Gayley of the University of California at her school, 2230 Pacific avenue. The lectures will take place on Tuesday afternoons during October and November, beginning at 3 o'clock. In the first course Professor Gayley will dwell upon the modern drama, taking up Stephen Phillips, Maeterlinck, Ibsen and possibly Suderman and Shaw.

The steamer Mongolia, which went aground on Midway Island a week ago, got off without assistance, and is not damaged seriously.

Karl A. Bickell, '07, president of the political division of the Social Service Club, of Stanford University, will invite A. Ruef, Mayor Eugene E. Schmitz of San Francisco, James D. Phelan, E. A. Hayes and J. N. Gillett to visit the campus and deliver discourses on organized politics.

Buffalo Bill's Wild West show closed a four years' tour of Europe with a performance in Brussels a few days ago. Colonel Cody sails for Antwerp, the rest of the troupe and the material following, to commence the last American tour of the show before the retirement of Colonel Cody.

THE FAMILY ALBUM.

Its Contents Identified for a Visitor.

Yes'm, that's my marriage certificate, and them pictures pasted on it is me and pa the day we was married. No, he wasn't sick, but he was so scared it made him look peaked. Do you like to look at photographs? Most everybody does, I guess. Wait till I get the album. Yes, it is kind of a pretty cover. Real plush. I got it off a book peddler lady, dollar down and fifty cents a month.

Them's twins; there was two of them. They looked just like you see them there. One of them is my husband but nobody can tell which he is, now. Sort of creepy, ain't it, not to know whether your own husband is one twin or the other? One of them died when he was sixteen, and that broke the set. I think it is the sweetest picture in the album, they look so simple and harmless, just like two little calves. Gran'ma Jones used to make their clothes herself—you'd never guess it, would you? She used to lay the cloth in two thicknesses and cut out two suits at once. If one of them had been a girl she couldn't have done it. Turn over the page.

That's the gentleman Aunt Jane nearly married. He looks like a college professor, don't he? He was so refined and meek and so eloquent at prayer meeting. But he wasn't a professor, he peddled Griggs' Infallible Cure for Hog Cholera and lectured on Temperance. He was awful poor in his health, and the minute Aunt Jane set eyes on him she made up her mind to marry him. She was forty and she usually got what she wanted, and everybody said it was a thousand chances to one that she would get him. But just when Aunt Jane was sure she had him he got wind of it. He went back to Massachusetts the next day and died peaceful. Turn over the page.

That's my sister Gertie and a bass singer we used to have in the choir. His name was Spung—Launcelot Spung—and he was a barber by profession. Him and Gertie was engaged for six weeks, but she found out he had a wife and six children at Boston so she didn't marry him. He was the sweetest singer! You'd never imagine he had a wife and six children if you could have heard him sing. Ain't it awful how sinful people can be and yet look so innocent? Gertie took on awful when she heard the facts about him and she wouldn't get engaged to anybody else for a long time; and you know what that means for a choir-singer. Turn over the page.

Sue Hartwick, that is, one of my old girl chums. She ran off with a cattle buyer and got married, but that wasn't until five years after this picture was took. She had a lovely character—so light and playful, and that fond of handsome clothes! I remember the day she had that picture took. She'd been to a picnic with a traveling gentleman from Cincinnati and got engaged to him. I helped her trim the very hat she has on. It was a green straw with roses, one red and one blue and one yellow. It matched her complexion lovely. She was a dark blonde with red hair. Oh, yes, she always smiled that way on account of one front tooth being out. Turn over the page.

That's my Aunt Phoebe, by marriage, the day she was married. Ain't she sweet? The basket wasn't hers, it belonged to the man that took the picture. Neither was the curls all hers though they didn't belong to the photograph man. I've got them now, laid away till they come in handy. I tell pa it's a pity it ain't man's hair, 'stead of lady's, and then he could wear it. Baldness seems to run in his family. His father was so bald that he never used a brush and comb for forty-two years—used to comb his hair with a flannel rag. That dress of Aunt Phoebe's is the lowest necked anybody on either side of our family ever had, but then she was a great one for society. Turn over the page.—Ellis Parker Butler, in The Reader.

LATEST STAGE SLANG.

Lines Given by Rose Stahl in "The Chorus Lady."

The smile's the hard part a dancin'. It's no cinch stannin' on one toe with the other pointin' to a quarter to six an' then look like the cat that's eat the canary.

You must enjoy life to beat the band—nothing on your mind but your hair.

After seventeen weeks a touring imitation towns this is certainly peach preserves.

When I think a the men I see other women stacked up against you vain easy.

It's always a bad season for bad shows with bum backing. I hope I'll get my hooks into something when the main money ain't given to doing panics if the show ain't pullin' down coin from the jump.

I've met more than one doll as has thrown a good man down hard just to get back to the bright lights. They hand out a lot of junk about love for their art when it was nothing but a hunch for the excitement.

If a girl's good, she's good anywhere. But say, when you're scrippin' along on twenty per and the next girl to you in your dressin' room comes down to the show shop every night in a benzine waggin—in ermine capes an' diamonds big as oysters, it ain't religion so much as a firm grip on home an' mother that makes you sit tight an' keep on handin' out the frozen mitt and the icy eye to the man behind the bank-roll.

Ain't he got a crust tryin' to kiss a girl an' him ain't got a cent in the world?

I'm a specialty lady—I've been in the front row for five years.

Say, girls, are you pipin' the veil? Ain't it a Susie Smitherine. I don't think it's at all loud, do you?

After I bought these yellow kicks my pocket-book looked like a disaster.

I just said it was up to me to refurnish from cellar to dome.

I wouldn't care what it was so long as I could wear blue tights—I'm just wasted in skirts.

Was the show comical? Well, I never noticed anyone laff themselves to death. The comedians was a couple of morgues. The best joke in the show was the star—a hand-made blonde as was billed the "Queen a Burlesque." She wuz in the original "Black Crook" and had a daughter at school then.

There wuz a couple a song and dance kikes, a team a acrobats, a troupe a moth-eaten dogs an' a chorus that looked like the chambermaids' union.

Will I play a part? That depends on the part. Like as not I'll just go back in the chorus. What's the use of being ambitious? Only makes you uncomfortable in your mind.

You play seventeen weeks a one night stands just to have a whack at a speakin' part and see if it won't take the ambition out a you.—New York World.

Sensing Relief.

[By means of a new invention it is claimed that petrol can be made sweet scented.]

You may seek through scented bowers

Twined with jessamine and rose,

Which the gentle, vernal showers

Have made nectar to the nose;

You may gather Eastern spices

From Mysore and Malabar,

But you'll find that naught so nice is

As the perfume of my car.

You may sack the stores of Rimmel,

And may blend his choicest scents

With the fragrancy of Kimmel

And of luscious liniments;

You may add a drop of attar

From some Syrian bazar,

Yet not touch the perfumes that are

Left behind it by my car.

I should add that I'm not speaking,

Of the present year of grace,

When the countryside is reeking

Rather rankly as they race.

Though today the victim rages

'Gainst conditions as they are,

Still I'll sing in distant ages

In this fashion of my car.

Wonders of California.

The story of California's agricultural wealth, commercial possibilities and scenic grandeur are told not only accurately but interestingly in the handsome booklets issued by the Southern Pacific Company. They have been prepared for the prospective tourist, settler, and investor. Handbooks on "The Sacramento Valley," "The San Joaquin Valley," "The Coast Country," "Lake Tahoe and the High Sierra," and "California South of Tehachapi," may be obtained, postage paid, for ten cents. Other publications are: "The New Arizona," "The New Nevada," "Wayside Notes Along the Sunset Route," "Kings and Kern Canyons" and the "Giant Forest of California," and "Yosemite Valley and Mariposa Grove," which will be sent to any address on receipt of five cents. The descriptions have been written from notes and data gathered by local agents with an eye to fullness and accuracy, and are profusely illustrated from the best photographs, as well as carefully designed maps. Requests should be addressed to Chas. S. Fee, Passenger Traffic Manager, Southern Pacific, San Francisco, Cal.

General Kuropatkin has completed his book reviewing the Russo-Japanese war. The work is in several volumes and has been submitted to the General Staff. It may not be permitted general circulation.

Some years ago, while visiting the Spokanes, General Philip Sheridan related to the Indians, through an interpreter, the wonders of the railroad, and then waited to see what effect the revelation would have upon them.

"What do they say?" he asked the interpreter. "They say they don't believe it," was the answer.

Sheridan then described the steamboat, and the interpreter repeated this.

"What do they say to that?" the General again asked, seeing the Indians' faces all impassive.

"They say they don't believe that, either."

Then the General gave an account of the telephone, and told how a man at the end of a long wire had talked to the man at the other end of it. The interpreter remained silent.

"Well," said the General, "why don't you interpret that story to them?"

"Because I don't believe that story myself," answered the conscientious man.

The time-honored determination of the Banning Company, owners, to prevent landings on the Island of Santa Catalina unless conveyed from the mainland by their steamers, recently brought on an encounter that threw Avalon into a high state of excitement. The steamer San Diego a privately chartered vessel, anchored in the bay and prepared to land seventy-four passengers, mostly women and children. Superintendent Shaw of the Banning Company roped off the shore line, and, backed by a small army of employees, attempted to stand off the party. Practically all of the San Diego's passengers eluded the guards and got ashore in spite of the barbed-wire trocha, but the difficulty is not settled.

"Perhaps," said the clerk, "you'd like to look at goods a little more expensive than these."

"Not necessarily," replied the shopper, "but I would like to look at some of better quality."—Philadelphia Press.

Chartreuse vs.
Liqueur Peres Chartreux.

Translation from "Le Matin," Paris,
June 28, 1906.

"The trade-marks of the cordials and products of the Grande Chartreuse, of which the Chartreuse Fathers have been unjustly despoiled by the law of 1901, will be put up for sale at public auction before the court of Grenoble on Saturday, June 30, 1906.

We learn from an absolutely reliable source that the Chartreuse Fathers will not be parties, either directly or indirectly, to this sale, but on the contrary they positively refuse to give anybody authority to acquire these trade-marks, for which they maintain all their rights.

What matters to them anyhow, a bottle and a label apart from the product which has made for them a long standing reputation?

Everybody knows that the Chartreuse Fathers continue to manufacture the cordial, for which they alone hold the secret, at Tarragona, Spain.

The above translation will be of interest to many of our readers, who are doubtless familiar with the published reports of the action taken by the French Government a little more than two years ago, whereby the monks of La Grande Chartreuse, who for three hundred years or more have distilled that well-known liqueur—were ruthlessly dismissed from the country, the Government confiscating their bottles, labels, and trade-marks, for the purpose of carrying on the manufacture of what it has been pleased to call "Chartreuse."

Unfortunately, however, neither the state official liquidator, nor the state itself, nor anybody in the state could obtain the mighty secret for the preparation of this "Nectar of the gods" by any possible means, and the authorities soon grew very tired of a fruitless effort to produce and sell a satisfactory imitation of the celebrated cordial, which accounts for the final disposal of the trade-marks at public auction, as referred to by the "Paris Matin." According to reports published in later French papers, the monks did not even offer to bid at the sale.

These trade marks, which give the purchaser the privilege of the use of the name "Chartreuse" and enable him, under protest of the original owners, to put up something which masquerades under the guise of the genuine article, were sold by the French Government at so ridiculously low a price as to afford all the evidence necessary (if any evidence were needed) of the fact that the trade-marks themselves, without the great secret of manufacture, are practically worthless.

A continued use of the bottle and label by the purchaser, whoever he may be, does not by any means insure the contents as being genuine, or even remotely similar to the liqueur which for centuries has given reputation and renown to the monks who make it.

Meanwhile the monks of La Grande Chartreuse, having, perforce, bequeathed their bottles, labels, and trade-marks to France, immediately left their monastery among the rugged rocks of Grenoble, and taking their secret with them, established themselves permanently at Tarragona, Spain, where they continue to make and to sell to all civilized nations this most delectable essence of flowers, herbs, fruits and spices, to be known henceforth and forever as "Liqueur Peres Chartreux."

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

At the naval review, when the President arded the Mayflower, he was dripping with rain, t he stood throughout the ceremony with his k hat raised, not moving from the first step he d taken on the deck while his flag was run the masthead of the ship, and a 21-gun salute s fired. Surrounding the Mayflower when the resident came aboard was a fleet of sight-seeing ft. Most conspicuous was a large tug from ew York with a party of newspaper men and otographers aboard—evidently spelling remers. Across the wheelhouse had been placed arge muslin sign which read "Pres Bot." The resident's eye caught this sign at once and be pped his hands in enjoyment.

An office boy who was the greatest success a failure and the greatest failure as a success t was ever seen was on one occasion sent Richard Harding Davis's rooms to get some "py." Pretty soon was heard a clatter of t on the stairs and in burst the boy entirely c of breath. "What's the trouble? Wasn't he there?" was ed. "No, sir, he's out and de joint's all locked d. "Then why the dickens didn't you wait for as I told you?" "Wh-wh-why, dere wuz a note on the door d said, 'Return at once,' so I t'ought youse wited me back quick."

Almost telegraphic brevity distinguishes some o the most famous letters that have ever been witen. Thus, some person wrote to the first Ee of Wellington, threatening to publish cer letters of his, and he replied: Dear Julia—Publish and be damned. Yurs. Wellington. "ir Walter Scott said that the most pointed ar he knew was the answer of Lord Mac dald to the head of the Glengarry family: My Dear Glengarry—As soon as you can p'e yourself to be my chief, I shall be ready acknowledge you; in the meantime, I am Macdonald." he following is quoted as Francis Jeffrey's wted reply to a begging letter: Sir—I have received your letter of 6th in, soliciting a contribution in behalf of the fids of —. I have very great pleasure in subscribing (with this word the writer con rted to end the first page, and then continued on the other side) myself, Yours faithfully, "Francis Jeffrey."

he visiting clergyman, addressing the little fies at the children's service, became impres- sion. "Only think, children," he said, "in A ca there are ten million square miles of etory without a single Sunday school, where lit boys and girls can spend their Sunday alnoons. Now, what should we all try to sa up our money for?" be children (unanimously): "To go to A ca."

ark Twain was talking of war and of the aships and privations of sieges. A Frenchman," he said, "called one day on a woman who had two dogs. They were ug little brutes, and, when they came near ai the man pushed them out of the way with his foot. "I perceive, sir," said the woman coldly, th you are not very fond of dogs." he man started in surprise. "I not fond of dogs!" he exclaimed. "Why, mum, I ate more than twenty of them during the siege of Paris."

utcher Ludwig was continually being robbed of eat by a large black tomat belonging to a t door neighbor. Finally his temper got est of him, and he poisoned the cat. he cat's owner, the next morning, found his ai black cat lying dead before his door. He at once who had done the killing, and wi a low, bitter oath he took the dead cat up the tail and went indoors. tcher Ludwig had happened to advertise for he week a mark-down sale on sausage. Th night his shop was thronged with sausage bu sddenly, when the crowd was thickest, the ouged neighbor elbowed his way through the eople, and threw upon the chopping block the ad body of the huge black cat. here you are, Mr. Ludwig," he said. "T makes thirty-five. I'll bring the fifteen oth when you're not so busy."

res McNeil Whistler, the famous painter, ha a French poodle of which he was ex- antly fond. The poodle was seized with an ffection of the throat, and Whistler had th- idacity to send for the great throat special- ackenzie. Morell, when he saw that he had been in to treat a dog, didn't like it much.

but he said nothing. He prescribed, pockete l a big fee, and drove away. The next day he sent posthaste for Whistler; and Whistler, thinking he was summoned on some matter connected with his beloved dog, dropped his work and rushed like the wind to Mackenzie's. "How do you do, Mr. Whistler? I wanted to see you about having my front door painted."

Alexander Harrison, the well known painter of marine pieces, was once asked if he thought American art students did well to come abroad to study. He said that undoubtedly the at- mosphere was more artistic in Europe than in America, but that Paris, as a city to study and work in, was overrated. To illustrate his mean- ing, he said that a certain rich man's son, after three years in Paris, wrote home to his father in St. Joseph, Missouri: "Dear Father—I have made up my mind to set to work. Please let me know at your earliest convenience whether it was painting, architecture, or music I came to Paris to study."

When Guiteau shot President Garfield the X-ray had not been discovered. The surgeons probed again and again. Other experiments were made to find where the bullet lay, and among them some by means of Dr. Alexander Graham Bell's inductive balance, which had then just been invented. Says Dr. Bell: "My instrument consisted of a piece of ma- hogany board of about the size and shape of a flatiron. It had a handle upon the top, and its bottom was covered with a green cloth. In- side the board was an electric coil, so made that when it was moved over anything of a metallic substance it would buzz. The in- strument afterward proved to be of great value for this purpose in hospitals, although it failed in connection with President Garfield. We took the machine to the White House and tried it upon the President. To our surprise the machine began to buzz whenever it came near him. According to it, he was full of lead. A day or two later I came to the conclusion that there must have been something metallic about the bed upon which President Garfield was lying. I inquired, and learned that his mat- tress was resting on wire springs, and it was the steel wire that made the machine buzz."

There was a little Scotch boy who had the quality of astuteness highly developed. The boy's grandmother was packing his lunch for him to take to school one morning. Suddenly, looking up into the old lady's face, he said: "Grandmother, does yer specs magnify?" "A little, my child," she answered. "Aweel, then," said the boy, "I wad juist like it if ye wad tak' them aff when ye're packin' my loonch."

A well known comedian one day while ful- filling an engagement in Dublin was walking with his wife, a remarkably stout lady, when an Irishwoman with a basket brushed rudely against her. "You had better walk over me," said the comedian's wife, irritably. The Irish woman turned round, coolly sur- veyed her from head to foot, and then replied. "Faith, mum, it would be easier to walk over ye than round ye, annyway!"

A company was playing "She Stoops to Con- quer" in a small Western town last winter, when a man without any money, wishing to see the show, stepped up to the box office and said: "Pass me in, please." The box office man gave a loud, harsh laugh. "Pass you in, what for?" he asked. The applicant drew himself up and answered haughtily: "What for? Why, because I am Oliver Goldsmith, author of the play." "Oh, I beg your pardon, sir," replied the other in a shocked voice, as he hurriedly wrote out an order for a box.

Ben Butler was a terror and torment to the judges. On one occasion Judge Sanger, having been b- lled and badgered out of all patience, petulantly asked: "What does the counsel sup- pose I am on this bench for?" Scratching his head a minute, Butler replied: "Well, I confess your honor's got me there."

A certain man was recently very sad be- cause his wife had gone out of town on a visit, which she would not shorten in spite of his appeals to her to come home. He finally hit upon a plan to induce her to return. He sent her a copy of each of the local papers with one item clipped out, and when she wrote to find out what it was he had clipped out he refused to tell her. The scheme worked admirably! In less than a week she was home to find out what it was that had been going on that her husband didn't want her to know about!

A clergyman happened to tell his son one Saturday afternoon what lesson he would read in church the next morning. The boy got hold of his father's Bible, found the lesson's place, and glued together the connecting pages. In consequence the clergyman read to his flock the following day that "when Noah was 120 years old he took unto himself a wife, who was"—here he turned the page—"140 cubits long, 40 cubits wide, built of gopher wood, and covered with pitch in and out." After reading the passage, the clergyman read it again to verify it. Then, pushing back his spectacles, he looked gravely at the con- gregation and said: "My friends, this is the first time I eve read that in the Bible, but I accept it as evi- dence of the assertion that we are fearfully and wonderfully made."

You may consider yourself fairly well accom- plished if you can eat green corn without getting butter on your ears.—Topeka Capital.

As a prisoner was brought before Judge Sher- man for sentence the clerk happened to be absent. Judge Sherman asked the officer in charge of the prisoner what the offense was with which he was charged. "Bigotry, your Honor. He's been married to three women." "Why, officer, that's not bigotry," said the judge, "that's trigo- nometry."—Indianapolis Star.

If it should happen to fall into the hands of those who already are subscribers or read- ers, they are asked to hand it to any person who in their opinion may be interested in such a journal. There are many pressing topics in these stirring days. In this issue we discuss National politics, California politics, and the interesting campaigns now progress- ing in the various States. Likewise the questions so vital to San Francisco in her present needs—insur- ance, relief, rehabilitation, rebuilding, labor—all these and many kindred topics are now being dis- cussed in the Argonaut. Our regular readers know that this journal has not missed an issue, and that practically all of the time since the disaster it has been issued in its old form. Others may not know it, hence some of these issues are sent free to strangers.

"You entertain a great deal more than you did formerly, I notice." "Yes, indeed. This is the first really hospitable cook we ever had."—Life.

"It takes him a painfully long time to write a letter." "Yes, he's trying to use as many simplified words as possible."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"There's a colored man and his wife at the door looking for work." "But I only advertised for a laundress." "Yes, they are her."—Philadelphia Press.

Mrs. Style—"Mrs. Cashe has a great deal of embonpoint." Mrs. Parvenu—"Then if she has a good deal of it, I know she got it cheap."—Baltimore American.

"Let me see. What are Senator Smugg's initials?" "I have forgotten what they are, but I know that one of them is very likely to be 'Ex' in the near future."—Puck.

Wigg—"A bad memory gets a fellow into lots of trouble." Wagg—"Yes, it's always springing things on you that you thought you had forgotten."—Philadelphia Record.

Art student (engaging rooms)—"What is that?" Landlady—"That is a picture of our church done in wool by my daughter, sir. She's subject to art, too."—Punch.

"Very well, sir," cried Dr. Kwack, after his quarrel with the undertaker, "I'll make you sorry for this." "What are you going to do?" sneered the undertaker. "Retire from practice?"—Philadelphia Press.

"Perhaps," said the clerk, "you'd like to look at goods a little more expensive than these." "Not necessarily," replied the shopper, "but I would like to look at some of better quality."—Philadelphia Press.

The tenderfoot started slightly as he read at the foot of the menu of the Lone Wolf Hotel: "Guests, after picking teeth, must positively return bowie to belt or bootleg. Sticking bowie upright into table beside plate is strictly prohibited."—Boston Traveler.

Mrs. De Fashion—"You don't mean you're beginning to doubt the Bible?" Miss De Fashion (examining her fall gown)—"Well, ma, it's certainly hard to believe that Eve was compelled to wear clothes as a punishment."—Philadelphia Ledger.

"The road to knowledge, nowadays," said the first old schoolmaster, "is too swift and too easy. It's a regular railroad." "Yes," agreed the other old pedagogue, "and it's a railroad with fewer switches than are necessary."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

"I suppose you want me to look as pleasant as possible," said the customer. "Certainly, sir," replied the photographer. "And I'll have to ask you for a small deposit in advance." "What's that for?" "That's so I can look pleasant, too."—Milwaukee Sentinel.

McCall—"What sort of hybrid creature is that new butler of yours?" Nuritch—"Why, how do you mean?" McCall—"I called to see you the other day and when I asked him what time I might catch you at home he said: 'At haff pawst tin, sah.'"—Philadelphia Press.

"I'm glad to say," remarked Mrs. Strongminder in an insinuating tone, "that my husband is not a sporty man." Oh, replied Mrs. Kaffyppe, looking very sweet and innocent, "I'm surprised to hear you say that. I have always supposed that he must have married you on a bet."—Chicago Record.

The minister was shocked when the young lady declined an introduction to some of his parishioners. "Why, my dear young lady, did you ever think that perhaps you will have to mingle with these good people when you get to heaven?" "Well," she exclaimed, "that will be soon enough."—Life.

"That was a tender-hearted young lady who stopped and spoke to me after the services today," observed the rector. "She seemed to be filled with sympathy for the farmers, for she asked me to pray for rain." "Who? That Viberber girl?" asks the rector's wife. "If she isn't the hypocrite! Why, I saw her buying fancy silk hosiery at a bargain sale yesterday. And she wants you to pray for rain!"—Detroit Free Press.

The man who likes to follow the hounds was lauding the horse and ridiculing the automobile. "There is no sport in a cumbersome machine," he bantered. "Give me the blooded horse. Why, with a horse I can take the fence every time."

The motorist laughed. "Take the fence, eh? Why, that is nothing. With an automobile you can take the fence, the gate, the tree, the pump, and the barn all in two or three seconds."—Chicago Daily News.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Tale of a Stamp.

I'm a stamp, a postage stamp,
A two-center. Don't want to brag.
But I was never licked except once;
By a gentleman, too; he put me on a Good thing—it was an envelope—
Perfumed, pink, square, I've been stuck on That envelope ever since.
He dropped us, the envelope and me,
Through a slot in a dark box,
But we were rescued by a mail clerk,
More's the pity. He hit me an Awful smash with a hammer;
It left my face black and blue.
Then I went on a long journey for Two days and when we arrived
We died in the morning.

Thrill to Sorrow.

She sits today with downcast eyes
And there is sadness in her breast,
And now and then she deeply sighs,
Though she is fair and richly dressed.

She sits in sorrow, her refined
And still unwrinkled face is grave,
Though Time to her has been most kind—
Her Willie has begun to shave.
—Unidentified Exchange.

The Flat Hunter's Song.

Kathleen Mavourneen! the gray dawn is breaking,
The voice of the bunter is heard on the Hill.
Out in the Bronx and in Harlem it's making
A similar noise to a ten-dollar bill.
Oh, hast thou forgotten that we must endeavor
To locate a flat? Come, Mavourneen, let's start.
We may hunt four years and we may hunt forever.
Oh, when shall we find it, thou voice of my heart?

"Tobble De-Postrophe Hote."

I'm fond of the meals that are called "ally cart,"
They suit me in price to a T.
You order whatever's the wish of your heart
Whatever the price mark may be.
But backing the field at a dollar a shot
Is surely a different note;
And always in dining I'm anxious for (not)
The "tobble de-postrophe hote."

You've noted, yourself, as you've gadded about
And rubbed at people the while,
Folks order whatever they can't do without,
When old "ally cart" is the style.
But, give them a hint it's the other way 'round,
They'll stuff like the average goat.
The best appetizer that ever was found
Is the "tobble de-postrophe hote."
—Chicago News.

Hubbubs—"Are you ever bothered with tramps out here?" Subbubs—"No; I have a sign on gate reading: 'We are vegetarians, but our dog isn't.'"—Philadelphia Press.

MOTHERS BE SURE AND USE "MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for your children while teething.

"Uncle Henry Pinchpenny has given our Robbie a drum," remarked Mrs. Popley. "The ideal!" exclaimed her sister. "How did he ever come to do that?" "Oh, he's taken a sudden dislike to Mr. Popley and me."—Philadelphia Ledger.

Children cutting teeth, and suffering from the various disorders incident thereto, need Steedman's Soothing Powders.

"Yes," sighed Mrs. Lapsling, "Sophrony suffers terribly from neuralgia. The only relief she ever gets is when she has an epidemic inserted in her arm."—Chicago Tribune.

The Cuban Situation.

The Platt Amendment, under which the United States Government is justified in intervening in Cuba, reads as follows: "If the Government of Cuba consents that the United States may exercise the right to intervene for the preservation of Cuban independence, the maintenance of a government adequate for the protection of life, property, and individual liberty, and for discharge of the obligations with respect to Cuba imposed by the Treaty of Paris on the United States, now to be assumed and discharged by the Government of Cuba." As the President is the executive head of this Government, it is obvious that he is the sole judge of when and where his country should intervene. President Roosevelt has shown the utmost discretion in the management of this annoying Cuban problem. He has shown every disposition to bring about a peaceable adjustment of affairs with the Cuban Republic. He has sent to Havana Secretary Taft, whom both he and the American people have confidence, to represent this Government in the absence of Secretary Root. Secretary Taft has shown great patience and diplomacy in endeavoring to smooth out the Cuban troubles.

But he has not been met in a similar spirit by the Cubans. When President Palma and his Cabinet laid their resignations before the Cuban Congress, it was evidently with the ulterior design of embarrassing Secretary Taft. The Cuban Congress was under the thumb of President Palma, and would do whatever he bade. If the Palma government thus stepped down and out, this action would leave Secretary Taft in the embarrassing position of having no one to treat with. President Palma's government having ceased to exist, and the Liberal party out in the long grass not yet having constituted another government the friendly mediator from the great republic would find himself at a loss what to do. The situation would be not dissimilar to that of Bismarck after Sedan. The empire had fallen, the emperor was a prisoner, Paris was in revolt against even its own provisional government, and there was no head for the Germans to treat with. In a small way, the Cuban situation, as presented to Secretary Taft, has been not dissimilar to the French situation as presented to Chancellor Bismarck.

Such conduct on the part of the Palma government would almost inevitably incline a mediator to side with the insurrectionists. But Secretary Taft has had not a little experience with the crafty Latin mind in the Philippines; not only that, but the Latin mind as pitted against the Malay mind, and mixtures of the Latin and Malay as pitted against the Anglo-Saxon. Taft is wise, shrewd, and patient. He will doubtless do what is right.

But what is right? It would, indeed, be a difficult question to answer. If Tomas Estrada Palma and his fellow-revolutionaries had the right to take the field against Spain; if they had the right to remain in insurrection for many years; if they had the right to burn sugarcane fields, to blow up railway bridges, and to take potshots at peaceful citizens, have not General Guzman and General Pino Guerra the right to revolt against the government of Tomas Estrada Palma? It is so short a while since we encouraged the Panama rebels to throw off the yoke of Colombia that it is a little awkward for us to forbid the Cuban rebels to throw off the yoke of Palma. Furthermore, this country of ours is not so old but that we run up against a revolution of our own if we hark back about three generations.

The insurgents in the field have addressed a proclamation to the American people, some lines of which run thus:

We do not ask for sympathy, we ask only an open field, that we may settle with Cubans and for Cubans the issues that we have joined. Under the empty name of a republic the shackles of the overthrown Spanish dominion have again been imposed upon us. It has become necessary to resort to arms. By a vast majority, Cuba is with us. We will suffer again the hardships of campaigns rather than yield the fruits of hard-won liberties. The intervention of the United States we do not wish. This is our own Cuban question and we ourselves must settle it. The rights and the property of Americans will be respected by our forces. We ask the sympathy of those Americans who believe in the liberty of all peoples.

This statement is signed by General Guzman and the other officers of the insurgent army in Santa Clara province.

The insurgents seem to be well armed and well equipped. It is rumored that they are supplied with abundant money, and that the sinews of war are supposed to come from certain American syndicates which are interested in intervention and subsequent annexation. There are in Cuba many large sugar estates belonging to American individuals or corporations, the owners of which ardently desire annexation. Even if the present insurrectionary movement should fail, it is believed it will be again revived by the use of American money. It is always easy to get up a revolution in a Spanish-American country, with money—and often without.

It must not be supposed that we believe the Roosevelt administration is privy to these sinister dealings. We think that the President and his Cabinet are sincerely desirous of settling the Cuban dispute and leaving Cuba to herself as an independent republic. It is probably the desire of a majority of the Republican party as well. It is true that eight years ago the Argonaut stood alone among the Republican newspapers on the Pacific Coast, and almost alone among the Republican newspapers of the United States, in opposing island annexation. We got not a little abuse at that time for "lack of patriotism," which charge apparently meant lack of desire for Cuban and Philippine Islands. But with the passing of President McKinley the desire for further insular territory seems to have disappeared. It is the general belief of the Republican party that "we have got enough islands." We even observe that some of our esteemed contemporaries—which a few years ago were abusing the Argonaut for "lack of patriotism"—are now felicitating themselves and assuring their puzzled readers that they "opposed the Spanish War."

The Argonaut is, and always has been, so strongly opposed to these pestiferous black-and-tan islands that, rather than see Cuba annexed to the United States, we would prefer to see it sunk in the sea. So keenly are we impressed with the danger of tropical annexation that we believe now, as we believed eight years ago, that this island annexation business will so debase and dilute our system of government that it may eventually cause its ruin. So believing, we earnestly hope that President Roosevelt and his Cabinet may succeed in patching up this Cuban trouble, so that we may withdraw from the island and leave Cuba to govern herself.

But will it be possible? We very much fear that we may not be so fortunate. Even though the present trouble be patched up, it will break out again, and intervention will almost inevitably lead to annexation. There are even those who sincerely believe that Cuba is already ours. For that matter, the Argonaut believes that the Isle of Pines is beyond question ours, because it was not ceded in the treaty to Cuba. As for the rest of the territory conquered by the United States from Spain in 1898, its status is extremely doubtful. There can be no doubt, however, that Cuba was conquered by us from Spain and thus became territory of the United States; that by the Treaty of Paris Spain ceded to us her sovereignty over Cuba; that the territory of the United States, whether acquired by conquest or purchase, can not be ceded except by an act of Congress; that no act of Congress abrogating our sovereignty and ownership of Cuban territory is in existence; that these premises being admitted, Cuba is domestic territory of the United States.

This is by no means an absurd belief. The decisions of the United States Supreme Court concerning our island possessions in the East and West Indies bear out this contention.

Earthquake-Clause Litigation.

On September 28th there came up for the first time in the State courts of California the question whether the "earthquake clause" invalidated claims for fire losses in the recent San Francisco conflagration. This question will doubtless figure in the Federal District Courts, in the United States Supreme Court, and in the German tribunals. But as yet the first joinder of issues is in the Superior Court of the City and County of San Francisco.

The earthquake clause before the court was that in the policies of the Williamsburgh City Fire Insurance Company. The text is said to be copied from the clause used in the Norwich Union. It is not dissimilar to the clauses in the policies of what are known as the "crooked cockney companies." As there are some half a hundred suits against the Williamsburgh City, it was decided to make an agreed case and to try it before three Superior Judges sitting in bank, Hosmer, Seawell, and Troutt. When the case was called, however, two of the judges were unable to sit, and Judge Hosmer heard the case alone.

Attorney Van Ness, for the Williamsburgh Company, said that the directors of this and other earthquake-clause companies, earnestly desired to pay the claims of the San Francisco policy-holders, if they had the right to use the stockholders' money for that purpose. The attorney added that he had vainly tried to find some legal loophole through which the directors could recognize liability, but, after studying the matter profoundly for some weeks, Attorney Van Ness arrived at the conclusion that the directors of these various earthquake-clause companies could not pay these fire losses without becoming liable to the stockholders. Therefore, both the attorney and the directors regretfully concluded to contest those claims.

Attorney Redman, for the policy-holders, remarked that the Williamsburgh and other earthquake-clause companies are compromising for 50 per cent up, and stated that he did not believe Mr. Van Ness's benevolent directors would pay out fifty cents on the dollar when they did not owe it. Mr. Redman added that when President Driggs, of the Williamsburgh City Company, received telegrams from Governor Pardee and Mayor Schmitz asking what his company intended to do, he replied that his "heart beat strongly for San Francisco, but that he was running an insurance business and not a charitable organization, and that his company would not pay." It may be interjected here that before this affair is over we think President Driggs will be asking for charity at the hands of the outraged San Franciscans, instead of offering to extend it. We may add that this is not an obiter dictum of the court or a remark of counsel, but merely an Argonaut think.

"This company shall not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by invasion, insurrection, riot, civil war or commotion, or military or usurped power, or by order of any civil authority; or for loss or damage occasioned by or through any volcano, earthquake, or hurricane, or other eruption, convulsion, or disturbance."

To our thinking the meaning of this sentence is clear. It is divided into two propositions, major and minor, which are separated by a semicolon. The first proposition tells for what losses [fire understood] the company shall be liable, "directly or indirectly"; the second proposition tells for what other losses or damage, occasioned by certain specific causes, the company shall be liable. As the phrase, "directly or indirectly," is omitted from the second proposition, it is quite evident that it does not apply to that particular series of losses, in which is included "earthquake." Likewise, to our thinking, if "earthquake" is to be included in that particular series of losses for which the company is not liable "directly or indirectly," it would have been specifically included in the first proposition. As earthquakes without volcanoes are only "indirectly" a source of fires, the phrase "loss or damage" in the second proposition must mean pure earthquake damage.

What light do the dictionaries shed? The Century says of the semicolon: "It is used to mark a division of a sentence somewhat more independent than that marked by a comma." The Standard says: "It is a mark used in English to denote a separation in the relations of the thought, a degree greater than that expressed by the comma." This would seem to be explicit. The various phrases in the first half of the sentence, under the restriction "directly or indirectly," are pointed off by commas. So with the phrases in the second part of the sentence concerning "loss or damage occasioned by or through"—these various causes are pointed off by commas. But the second grand division of the sentence is separated from the first by a semicolon.

Let us take another definition of the use of the semicolon—that given in a foreign dictionary, the great encyclopedic French dictionary of Larousse. He says: "The point et virgule, the semicolon, is composed of a period and a comma, and is placed at the end of a proposition which is intrinsically complete in itself, but which has a logical connection with the clause which follows." Here again this definition seems to us to cover the case exactly. The first clause is "complete in itself," as Larousse says—that is, the one which refers to "loss caused directly or indirectly by" various causes. In short, as it is "complete in itself," to use the dictionary phrase, the secondary clause could be eliminated without affecting the first in the slightest degree, and with it would go the earthquake clause.

It is probable that before these lines are printed Judge Hosmer will have handed down his decision, and thus the Argonaut will not be expressing opinions on matters before the court. But we will say here, in a general way, as we have said before, that we have yet to see a single one of these earthquake clauses which seems to us to prove the contention of the defaulting companies—to wit, that they are not responsible for fire losses caused directly or indirectly by earthquake. All of these clauses seem to us to mean that the companies are not responsible for fire damage caused in certain ways, and that they are not responsible for earthquake damage at all. In short, it is indisputable that in the minds of the men who drew up these clauses the intent was to hold the company as non-labile for fire damage when caused by riot, insurrection, etc., and to hold the company as non-labile for earthquake damage under all circumstances. But that the intent in any of these clauses is to hold the company non-labile for fire damage when caused by earthquake damage, seems to us preposterous.

These earthquake clauses are nearly all based on the experience of insurance companies in tropical countries. In those countries fire following earthquake is rare. The houses are so built as to be largely non-combustible, and in many of them there are no fires for heating and only a petty brazier fire for cooking. Therefore, the losses of the insurance companies in such countries from fires due to earthquakes are practically nil. So in California. There have been earthquakes here from a time when the memory of man runneth not to the contrary, and yet never before 1906 was there a great fire resulting from an earthquake. Hence these companies have had no reason to insert clauses in their policies holding them non-labile for fire damage due to earthquake damage. Therefore they have never drawn up or incorporated any such clause in their policies. Doubtless they will in the future, but they have not got them there now. Yet they are now trying to evade their just liabilities from the San Francisco conflagration by reading into these earthquake clauses a meaning which never was dreamed of by the men who wrote them, by the men who have been using them, or by the unfortunate policy-holders who accepted them.

Our Labor Council Dictators.

"Government by injunction," which the labor leaders affect so much to fear, is evidently going to be replaced by "government by labor leaders." On September 28th the San Francisco Labor Council met and discussed the question of endorsing the Democratic candidate, Mr. Bell, for Governor. A heated debate ensued, from which it appeared that a number of members of the council were for Langdon, the Independent League nominee, and others for Austin Lewis, the Socialist nominee. Finally a resolution was adopted endorsing Bell, by 47 to 35. A motion to make Bell's endorsement unanimous was lost through the opposition of the Independent Leaguers and the Socialists. The above vote is significant—it shows that nearly half of the Labor Council itself is opposed to Bell.

The action of the council to which we referred as presaging a change of government in these United States was as follows: A resolution was passed ordering the executive committee to telegraph to Samuel Gompers to prevail on Wm. R. Hearst to order the withdrawal of Wm. H. Langdon, the Independence League candidate for Governor; second, ordering the executive committee of the Labor Council to call upon the California Democratic Campaign Committee and direct them to wire the State Democratic Committee of New York to tell Hearst to order Langdon to withdraw; third, ordering the executive committee to wire Hearst to direct Langdon to withdraw.

This series of resolutions is calculated almost to take one's breath away. The succession of lightning charges demanded by the Labor Council is phantasmagoric. It reminds us of the old scene in the magician's Mystere Grotto, or Grotto of Mystery, performed by Hassan and Abdallah, the three Arabian brothers, where Hassan takes a lighted candle and jumps down Ali's throat; Abdallah takes a lighted candle and jumps down Ali's throat; and Abdallah takes a lighted candle and jumps down his own throat. So the Labor Council has ordered the executive committee to order Gompers to order Hearst to order Langdon to withdraw. But suppose Gompers should forget it, suppose Hearst should not remember it, and suppose that even if they both did not forget it, Langdon should refuse? What then? As for Gompers, he will probably pass it up to Hearst. Hearst, however, is rich enough and adroit enough either to take himself or to dodge the issue. Furthermore, it is important to Hearst to keep up his Independence League organization in this State in order to help out his dental campaign, than it is to defeat Gillett. Therefore, it may be doubted whether Hearst will hark to the orders of the Labor Council. As for the Democratic Committee of New York, they are very far off. It is three thousand miles from San Francisco to New York, but it is a great deal farther from New York to San Francisco. The din and clamor of the campaigns out here when they reach New York are very much like the buzzing of insects on a summer noon. The State Democratic Committee of New York may not show much enthusiasm in endeavoring to elect Hearst as Governor of that State, but they certainly will not interfere in the politics of this one.

So in this direction our San Francisco Labor Council will accomplish nothing. But what a ludicrous exhibition of fantastic vanity in these labor leaders! Are they so full of self-conceit and steam beer that they cannot take themselves seriously? Do they think that these dates and these organizations whom they presume to order around will heed them? Why, they talk as if they were a Stuart Star Chamber, a Vehmgericht, a Venetian Council of Ten. When the three tailors of Tooley street met and indicted their celebrated nation beginning, "We, the people of England," they could scarcely have played a more fantastic trick than the San Francisco Labor Council is now playing orders to the imperial State of New York.

Independence, Continental and Insular.

Some eight years ago, immediately after Admiral Dewey had fired at Manila the shots that were heard round the world, this journal remarked that there would be in our American civilization a new element—the Colonial Governors and their suites. We saw the picture of the United States and its dependencies: Governor General of the Philippines, the Governor General of Porto Rico, and the Temporary Governor General of Cuba. Since then a new one has been created, a Governor General of the Canal Zone, and as we write today Secretary Taft is reported to have declared himself Military Governor General of Cuba. At that time, the Argonaut remarked that this picture of insular oligarchies could not fail to have a effect on the national character. We were laughed at for the prediction. Few or none would now say so. The latest and most striking instance of the truth was shown at the inauguration of James F. Smith as Governor General of the Philippines on September 20th. Mr. Smith is a Californian and was a lawyer in practice in San Francisco and a member of the National Militia. Doubtless he often attended the celebration of our national holiday in his military capacity, and the Declaration of Independence read. Probably while practicing in the California courts, he often made allusions made to the Constitution of the United States. Eight years ago Mr. Smith would have received ridicule or else with indignation the statement that he would publicly express doubt as to the desirability of national independence. Yet in his inaugural address Manila he thus spoke to the Filipinos: "I personally doubt that independence is the panacea for all the ills that people are heir to. Independence, without force or means to maintain it, is not worth having. Independence without good government is deceiving." The corollary of this is that good government may be possible without independence. Further, that it is better for the Filipinos to have good government and be dependent than to have a poor government and be independent. Suppose that a better government than our own existed, would General Smith carry his theory so far as to say that good government in the United States in subjection to such a power would be better than poor government in the United States with independence?

The Bee Must Choose Gompers.

Our esteemed contemporary, the Sacramento Bee, seems to be dissatisfied with the Argonaut because we speak well of Gillett. If that be the case, we fear that it will grow more displeased with us as the campaign progresses. For we hope to say still more in his favor. The only thing that restrains us is the space involved, for we have so many readers outside of California that the object to our complete absorption in a State campaign.

The Bee thus expresses its displeasure with the course followed by this journal:

The Argonaut, which is filling its columns with Gillett editorials, says:

When it comes to choosing Americans, the Argonaut will choose Theodore Roosevelt and the Bee can choose Samuel Gompers."

The Bee has not chosen Samuel Gompers, nor has the Argonaut chosen Theodore Roosevelt.

Theodore Roosevelt were to take sides in this State contest at all, it is very likely he would be against the bound thrall of railroad and political bossism. His influence in other States has been exercised against candidates in a similar situation to that occupied in California by James N. Gillett.

The Argonaut can not truthfully say it has chosen Theodore Roosevelt, for it has picked out William F. Herrin.

The Bee did not quote what we consider the best sentence of the Argonaut paragraph. That sentence

"Those of us who are Republicans and free American citizens, and who will not take orders from a paralyzed foreign labor leader, will vote for Gillett."

This remark in the Argonaut was drawn forth by the action of the Union Labor leaders in beginning a boycott against James N. Gillett because he had refused when in Congress to obey the orders of Samuel Gompers.

The Bee further remarked: "We believe Gompers stands for those principles to which all Americans subscribe, be they labor union men or not." The Argonaut replied: "Gompers is standing for the principle of the boycott. He menaces with his labor-union boycott those American Congressmen who do not vote the way he wants them to." We then went on to detail the interview last winter when Gompers and his associates went to the White House and insolently threatened President Roosevelt with the revenge of the labor unions if he did not carry out their orders. The President replied that all men in this country are equal before the law, and that he would execute the laws for all men, whether labor union men or non-union men, exactly alike. Gompers wants to make men unequal before the law.

He wants to make one kind of law for the labor unions, another kind for the farmers and merchants. His anti-injunction bill—which he tried to bulldoze Gillett and other Congressmen into supporting—provides that injunctions will run the same as of old in all litigation where labor disputes are concerned—there injunction shall not run. That is the kind of Republican government which Gompers and his gang stand for—the kind of law for the labor unions, another kind for the manufacturer, merchant, and farmer. When the President in good set English told Gompers and his gang that he would stand for no such crooked execution of the laws, he doubly endeared himself to all patriotic Americans. That is why we say the Argonaut chose Theodore Roosevelt. And when the Bee upholds the attempt of Gompers and his gang to boycott

James N. Gillett, that is why we say the Bee chose Gompers.

The Bee further remarks that the Argonaut "can not truthfully say it has chosen Theodore Roosevelt, for it has picked out William F. Herrin." William F. Herrin is not a candidate for anything that we know of. He is reported to be a Democrat, and if he were a candidate for office we presume that he would be on the Democratic ticket. In that event the Argonaut would oppose him. For other things being equal, we support Republican candidates.

We have not the pleasure of knowing Mr. Gillett, Mr. Langdon, or Mr. Bell. Doubtless all three are very worthy gentlemen. We know nothing against any of them. But we have worked in the ranks of the Republican party for many years, and we know the Republican party. We do not know Mr. Gillett, but we know the party he trains with. Therefore we shall work for his election. We also know the Democratic party, and although we do not know Mr. Bell, that is sufficient reason to oppose him.

Returning to the President, the Bee says: "If Roosevelt were to take sides in this State contest at all, it is very likely he would be against (Gillett) the bound thrall of railroad and political bossism."

We do not believe that Gillett is the thrall of any boss, railroad or political. During the long legislative contest over the election of United States Senator, some eight years ago, Gillett was in the Legislature. Rumor said at the time that Colonel Burns was the candidate of "the railroad" and "the machine." Yet through that long fight Gillett voted steadily for Bulla, who was not the candidate of "the railroad," and was not the candidate of "the machine." Bulla represented only himself and his personal following. This does not seem to us like the action of a "railroad thrall." What does the Bee think?

While we are not acquainted with Mr. Gillett, we have long been acquainted with George Knight, his political sponsor, who had more to do with Gillett's nomination than any man in the State. Now it is a notorious fact that from the first day when George Knight "came down from the tall timber" and began practicing law in San Francisco, he was a vigorous assailant of "the railroad." In fact, there were those among his political friends who ascribed his numerous political defeats to the revenge of railroad politicians for his assaults. It is only a couple of years since George Knight was defeated in an attempt to win the United States Senatorship, and the political quidnuncs ascribed it to "the railroad." If these facts be true—and can the Bee deny them?—why should "the railroad" try to nominate a man who steadily fought against its candidate for the Senate eight years ago? Why should it nominate a man who was "discovered" and groomed for the Governorship by George Knight, who had been an anti-railroad politician for many years?

To take another clause in the Bee's paragraph; it says that if President Roosevelt were to take sides in this State contest, he would "very likely" be against Gillett, as the President's influence in other States has been exerted against candidates in a similar situation.

The Bee, of course, is assuming this purely for purposes of argument, as it is not likely that President Roosevelt will take sides in the contest in California. But let us also assume, for the sake of argument, that the President will take sides in this contest. He did in Maine, when Gompers insultingly declared a boycott on Charles E. Littlefield, Representative in Congress, who had refused to obey the Gompers orders. The President at once requested Secretary Taft, of his Cabinet, Joseph Cannon, Speaker of the House, and several members of the House and Senate noted for their oratory, to repair to the disputed district and join issue with the Gompers forces. In this State, too, we find that Gompers has declared a labor union boycott on Gillett. We would be quite willing to accept the test proposed by the Bee. Suppose its hypothesis were to become fact. Suppose the President were to take sides in this State contest. Would he cast his influence in favor of James N. Gillett, the nominee of the Republican party? Or Theodore Bell, the nominee of the Democratic party? Or William H. Langdon, the nominee of Mr. Hearst's Independence League?

We pause for a reply.

Now if the Bee were to leave this matter of "taking sides in the California contest" to Gompers instead of to the President, we think its guess would be all right.

But if the Bee were to leave it to the President, we think it would have to guess again.

Again the Argonaut chooses Theodore Roosevelt. And again the Bee can choose Samuel Gompers.

Why Is Beveridge?

Recently the New York World has been running a series of prize questions, the first of which was: "How can you tell a man from Chicago?" Some acute person won ten dollars by the following answer: "You can't tell him anything." Another one of the prize questions was "Where is Jersey City?" and another "When was Philadelphia?" Considering the recent remarkable utterances of Senator Beveridge of Indiana on the Cuban entanglement, it has occurred to us that this series of prize questions might be extended to great men as well as great cities. Lecturing at Minneapolis on September 29th, Senator Beveridge said: "The American blood now to be given to bring civilization back to Cuba is the price the American people must pay for the folly of timid theorists and the baseness of scheming politicians who have cloaked their baseness in the robes of a pretended sanctity. This time the American occupation of Cuba will be permanent." Whom can Senator Beveridge mean? Who were the "timid theorists" and "scheming politicians" who with "pretended sanctity" refused five or six years ago to occupy Cuba permanently? Can it be possible that Senator Beveridge means President McKinley? Considering the mysterious thoughts underlying these Delphic utterances of the Senator from Indiana, we suggest that the New York World offer a prize of $100 for the best reply to the question, "Why is Beveridge?"

The Passing of Palma.

The popular estimate of Thomas Estrada Palma in these intervention times differs greatly from the estimate entertained of that gentleman in former intervention times. Then Mr. Palma was a persecuted patriot, sheltered under our starry banner on American soil, and thence safely bidding defiance to the hated red and yellow rag of Spain. Now Mr. Palma is merely a person who has been occupying the Cuban presidential chair, picked out, propped up, and padded for him by Uncle Sam, and who has not made good. Therefore, there is a certain impatience with Palma. Our populace and our yellow press are inclined to cry, "Away with him!" as did a certain other rabble two thousand years ago. Mr. Palma has endeavored to salve over the matter by stepping down and out. It was the only thing for him to do. But how different his feelings as he contrasts his situation with that of eight years ago, when all the yellow press were tooting their penny trumpets in praise of Palma. How bitterly must Mr. Palma say to himself: "In sooth, republics are ungrateful." And what does the ungrateful republic say? Little, save this:

"Back to the palm woods, Palma!"

"Twenty-three, Thomas!"

"Estrada, skidoo!"

For and Against Gompers.

In the State of Washington the Republicans have thrown down the gauntlet to Gompers by renominating Congressman Jones, although he is on the roll of representatives black-listed and boycotted by Gompers. We congratulate the Republicans of Washington—were they timid and time-serving they would seek for another nominee. This is what the Democrats have done in Connecticut, where Congressman Lilley was also on the Gompers black-list. So the Democrats put up a labor unionist, one Donohue. Thus we see that the Republicans are going to meet the Gompers boycott issue squarely. In Washington they defiantly renominated a boycotted Congressman. In California they have nominated for Governor James N. Gillett, another man who is on the Gompers black-list. The Democrats, on the other hand, will try to curry favor with the labor union men by endorsing their nominees.

Judge Hart's Nomination.

There has been on the part of certain newspapers—notably the San Francisco Examiner, supported by some of its interior imitators—an attempt to discredit the Santa Cruz Convention and its work by connecting with it extravagant stories of the coercion of certain counties through judicial and other candidates. For example, there has been published widely a cock-and-bull story to the effect that there was an attempt to coerce Judge Hart of Sacramento into an effort to swing the county delegation away from Pardee and to Gillett. In support of this story it has been declared that Judge Hart went before the Sacramentans and harangued them in heroic terms to stand by Pardee in deference to public honor and private respect. He is alleged to have upheld, with tears in his eyes, all the finer sentiments of manly integrity in a frantic and successful effort to hold the Sacramentans to their allegiance. Now it is not a pleasant task to puncture a beautiful fiction like this, but the plain truth is that while Judge Hart did in private conversation stand firmly for Pardee and in opposition to any suggestion that the Sacramento delegates should abandon him, there was no such meeting at Santa Cruz of the Sacramento delegation. Judge Hart made no speech, and none was needed. It is absolutely the truth that there was never a moment of wavering on the part of the Sacramento delegation, which was solid for Pardee and had no intention of abandoning him so long as he had a reasonable chance of success. Judge Hart's nomination to the Appellate Bench was from the beginning a matter of course; it was protested by no one, and in the event went to him by acclamation. So much for a piece of romantic fiction.

Gillett's Reply to Gompers.

The San Francisco Star reprints this paragraph from the Argonaut on the Gompers opposition to James N. Gillett: "Those who are not free American citizens, but serfs, slaves, helots, and cowards, will take orders from Gompers. Such men can vote against Gillett. Let us see which are the more numerous in California. If the free American citizens are in the majority, Gillett will be elected." The Star thus comments: "Samuel Gompers has said that Gillett either trimmed, or shirked, or was an open enemy when questions affecting the interest of labor were being considered or voted upon." Gillett did not trim or shirk. He met all questions squarely. He always does. His reply to Gompers was one of the few Congressmen's letters which did not squirm or wriggle. We are sorry to say that not a few of our Republican Congressmen stood so much in awe of this foreign labor leader that they tried to carry water on both shoulders. We hope that those who played so cowardly a role will get their just deserts, and we think they will.

Germans are now doing much of the business in Brazil that was formerly carried on by British manufacturers. This is due, primarily, to the fact that the German salesman is particularly well equipped in business training, languages, and adaptability, to secure the confidence of the Brazilians, and secondly, to the fact that German houses will modify their goods to meet the special Brazilian requirements. At the same time, German goods are not well thought of in Brazil and where the proper effort is made American goods will always sell in preference to German goods even at a considerably higher price. For example, nine-tenths of all the electrical machinery in Brazil is American.

An electric lamp inclosed in a pretty little cage formed of fine metallic chains almost touching each other, and held rigid by metallic rings above and below, is the very latest thing in lethal chambers. Its destined victim is the mosquito, explains the London News. By this invention—recently shown to the savants of the Paris Academy by Mr. Chaulin—the insect is pleasantly attracted to its doom. An unseen alternating electric current passing through the chains does its business as it endeavors to investigate the attractive luminous object inside.

The largest and costliest building thus far undertaken in New York, the city of immense structures, is the magnificent $10,000,000 Episcopal Cathedral of St. John the Divine, now being erected on Morningside Heights. This will be the greatest sacred edifice in America, and the fourth in importance in the world.

A tobacconist of High Wycombe, England, has been fined every week for nearly five years for opening his shop on Sundays. The fines began at fifteen shillings, but are now seven-and-sixpence.

THE HEARST DEMOCRATIC VICTORY.

In spite of the unanimous opposition of the New York press, and his former antagonism of Tammany Hall, William Randolph Hearst was nominated by the State Democratic convention in Buffalo for Governor of New York. Charles F. Murphy, whom Hearst had assailed in print many times during the past year, threw the whole strength of Tammany into the Hearst column, and made his nomination certain on the first ballot with many votes to spare.

One of the striking incidents of the convention was a speech by Bourke Cockran, who has not been a favorite with Mr. Hearst. When Mr. Cockran returned from a recent trip to the Philippines he delivered in San Francisco, by invitation, an address at a Roman Catholic Church charitable entertainment, in his happiest vein, and Mr. Hearst's Examiner reported the event with some show of completeness except that it said of the orator merely, Mr. Cockran also spoke. At Buffalo Mr. Cockran said that he nominated Hearst not because he approved the man or his doings, but because, in his view, the choice lay "between riot and rottenness." This is pronounced by the papers a peculiar apology and excuse.

The New York World said of Mr. Hearst's candidacy, two days before his nomination:

The Democratic party can not accept Mr. Hearst on local issues without stultifying itself. It can not nominate him for Governor without taking all his semi-socialistic platforms and speeches and principles; for if the Democrats were to nominate and elect him Governor of New York he would almost inevitably be the Democratic candidate for President in 1908. If they were to nominate him and he were defeated, but polled the second largest vote, they would leave him in full possession of all the party machinery in the State to use for his own political advancement.

In the same editorial, which was more than a column long—an unusual length for World editorials—the paper gave Mr. Hearst this commendation, in connection with his organization and leadership of the Independence League, which had already nominated him for Governor:

Mr. Hearst is well within his rights. He is under no compulsion to remain a Democrat, and the World confesses to no small measure of admiration for the ability, the audacity and energy he has displayed in organizing his new party. His following is a remarkable demonstration of power which even a more pretentious political leader might well envy. Moreover, Mr. Hearst need not apologize for his political independence. Teaching men not to be slaves of a party organization or a party label requires no apology.

The New York Herald affects to believe that Tammany's choice and support will turn many Democrats from their party:

From every county in the State this morning come tidings of Democratic revolt against the shameful bargain at Buffalo and resentment against its beneficiary. With the Democratic emblems disposed of in such an infamous manner and with such an anti-Democratic platform as that adopted at Buffalo, it becomes the plain duty of every honest Democrat to enter his protest in the most emphatic manner possible, and this is by casting his vote for Hughes.

With a few words the New York Tribune dismisses the result of the Buffalo convention. Two sentences from its editorial reflect its feeling:

Mr. Hearst's candidacy represents a dangerous force in politics. It marshals the forces of unrest, of class prejudice, of dissatisfaction.

The New York Sun, once a Democratic paper and edited by Charles Dana, now Republican in sympathy, had this bitter comment:

The Democracy has cut its cables and gone adrift. Its course is out to sea. In September, five years ago, the President of the United States was assassinated at Buffalo. At Buffalo William R. Hearst was nominated by the Democracy as its candidate for the Governorship of the State of New York. Let us accept the inevitable with grace and resignation and let us hope that the party of assassination and the torch has done to mankind the only service of which it was capable, and has extinguished itself forever.

The ante-convention campaign of Mr. Hearst attracted attention in all parts of the country, and many Democratic papers were outspoken in opposition to his ambition. This, from the Richmond (Va.) Times-Dispatch, is a representative paragraph:

The Democrats now have a splendid opportunity to be rid of Hearst forever, and for the sake of such a riddance they could well afford to lose the State in the next election. Let Mr. Hearst go his own way with his socialistic policies and endeavors. Let him run as the candidate of the socialist party for President in 1908 if he so desires. It would be the best thing that could happen to the Democratic party, provided the party will adhere strictly to its time-honored principles. To compromise with Hearst would be disgraceful and disastrous. The New York Democracy has a glorious opportunity to be rid of a nuisance. What will it do with it?

The North American Review had two articles Mr. Hearst, one by Arthur Brisbane (who is editor Hearst's New York Journal) and highly eulogistic tone, the other unsigned but severely critical. From Mr. Brisbane's eulogy is quoted the characteristic passage:

Every day Hearst is able to talk with 2,000,000 American families scattered everywhere in this country. His newspapers are published in Boston, New York, Chicago, San Francisco, Los Angeles. And they will soon be published in many cities. With this enormous circulation Hearst is able every day to spread the truth and reply to falsehood. The constant efforts that are made to misrepresent him fail, for his voice reaches further than the voice of any other man in the country. There has never before been assembled in this world an audience as that which Hearst commands, and therefore it is safe to say that there has never been a man possessing his peculiar influence and power for good.

He rails at trusts and tries to build one; he denounces political corruption while squandering money for delegates; he objects to bossism, yet aspires to autocracy; he beseeches favors from great political party, and then betrays it; he shamelessly flatters the very men whom he has denounced as political and social criminals; he abruptly ceases to attack one whom he branded a scoundrel in the hope of winning that one's evil influence to gratify his own ambition; he professes with his lips individualism and Americanism, while in his newspapers preaches confusion and communism.

The Hearst papers do not have room to quote that is said of their owner, but few of the laudatory articles are missed. Following is a selection which will give under a "four-time" head. It is credited to "Northcliffe's 'Mirror,' the second largest weekly circulation in England," and is certainly English:

What is it distinguishes Hearst from all other politicians of this age and every other age that has gone before? It is that Hearst does not believe any man, woman or child ought to be allowed to go hungry for no fault of their own. When he got to New York from the West he was made miserable by the sight of hungry and ragged people. He sent out and fed as many as he could. Then he saw this was like going for a hippopotamus with a blunt pin. So he went to the root of the matter. He saw that the causes of hunger and misery lay in the people being victimized by the vampire trusts. Hearst's work, therefore, and attacked the trusts. He became a newspaper proprietor on a vast scale. All his newspapers dealt daily the alteration of the social scheme so that no single man, woman or child need go hungry for no fault of their own. It is something new in politics. Isn't it a dream? You call it a wild dream. Even so, it is a noble dream.

Mr. Hearst's campaign will be full of high-colored effects. His papers devote considerable advertising space to announcements of his speeches, and address to the foreign population appear in the language of the people he wishes to reach.

The sudden rise to wealth of a railroad employe is described in a press dispatch from Escanaba, Mich. From a fireman on a railroad, receiving a salary of $30 a month, to the owner of a patent on a steam turbine engine, for which he received $975,000 from a transatlantic steamship company, is the record of James F. Devlin, employed by the Chicago & Northwestern Railroad and formerly running out of Escanaba. A $975,000 has been turned over to Mr. Devlin by the firm of Lawson, Walch & Lawson, of New York, who purchased the patent for the North German Lloyd Steamship Company. An agreement was also signed by Mr. Devlin by which he will receive $100 a day for fifty days to superintend the construction of the engine.

At the Government Printing Office the new efficiency system arranged by Public Printer Stillings has just into effect. This system is intended to provide a precise estimate as to what any certain piece of work will cost. Heretofore the basis of estimates has been largely theoretical. The employees were alarmed they learned that the dreaded efficiency system had just into effect, fearing that it meant more work. Mr. Stillings allayed their fears. The new system simply serves a record of what work each employee is able to do.

South Carolina's efforts to promote immigration from Europe have already borne substantial fruit in the form of the North German Lloyd company to operate an emigrant vessel directly from European ports to Charleston.

The students at the several colleges in Rome wear ecclesiastical garb, but each is different in cut and color. The Germans are the most conspicuous in long, gleaming-breasted, close-buttoned coats of brilliant scarlet.

FROM NEW YORK TO JERICHO.

Manhattan Automobile Enthusiasts at the Vanderbilt Cup Race Trials.

Six o'clock in the morning, on the Jericho turnpike, half a mile north of Westbury, Long Island. It sounds like an appointment of the old days, of pistols for two, coffee for one, or an assignment for members of a high-society's trust, but it is merely the time and place of the preliminary trial or elimination race in preparing for the international Vanderbilt cup event. The great race itself set for Saturday, October 6, but it is doubtful that it will present more picturesque features or afford more thrilling experiences than the try-out today. It was at least a great deal more than a promise of novelty, of pre-devil risk, and of exhausting variety in automobile routs.

W. K. Vanderbilt, Jr., instituted the contest and contributed the trophy which was first competed for a year ago. The course is named for him, and it is nearly thirty miles long, over stretches of hard roads, through country lanes and village streets, past rich men's villas and gardens and modest farm houses surrounded by smiling, well-tilled fields, with many curves and sudden turns, and with a grand-stand at the start and finish for the leaders of society and automobilists of luxurious incomes. To reach it from Manhattan, one takes the East Thirty-ninth street ferry and then the Long Island railroad to Mineola, Jericho, Westbury, or some other of the stations near the course. That is, if one is not the possessor of a motor-car, or able to hire one, or, better yet, the guest of an automobilist.

The sunrise hour set for the race, however, meant something more than a morning start. Few waited for dawn. The procession began in the early hours of the evening before. The ferry service was increased to ten-minute intervals, and every boat carried not only automobiles and their occupants, but hundreds of other would-be spectators of the race. After the theatres had released their crowds of play-goers, the rush increased. Many had sent their motor-cars across the ferry or over the Williamsburg bridge, and now hastened to the places where they waited. The roads and lanes of Long Island throbbed with the pulsations of bonnet engines, and the air was heavy with the fumes of gasoline. Red lights innumerable rushed away in the darkness ahead, eyes of dazzling brilliancy came swiftly on behind.

Every room in the Garden City hotel and other smaller inns in the Long Island towns had been engaged long before the day, and hundreds besieged the stopping-places asking vainly for any kind of accommodations. Halls and porches were soon filled to overflowing, and at the flood rose and spread over the outlying neighborhoods. Camping out became a necessity and was speedily adopted with every show of enjoyment. Some rested uneasily under robes and shawls in the seats of the automobiles; others gathered about camp-fires and sang; and talked and played cards. Well-filled hamper, meant to furnish breakfast cheer, were cleaned to the last crumb before daybreak, and then food and drink were hard to find and even more difficult to buy.

The rural population and the usual hangers-on of all public gatherings were largely in evidence. Refreshment booths, side-show tents, gambling devices, lighted by flaring torches, were numerous and surrounded by moving throngs that wore the night away more or less merrily and humoredly, and uncomplainingly endured the slight trouble that threatened to become a downpour. It is estimated that a hundred thousand people gathered along the course during the night and short hour of daylight before the race began.

Two hundred flagmen were stationed along the devious race track, eight tire-repair stations were fitted up at advantageous points, and seventeen telephone booths with reporters in charge were scattered along the thirty miles of road to give instant intelligence of the time and order of passing. Promptly at six o'clock the first of the racing cars dashed forward from the starting line and at intervals of one minute the other eleven followed, the starter counting for each one and giving the word sharply. Mr. Vanderbilt was early on the ground at the starting-point, and in charge of all arrangements. The greatest interest from the beginning attached to the appearance and mooted ability of Joe Tracy, the American champion driver; Herbert Le Blon, a Belgian with a famous record; Mongini, an Italian, who pluckily drove his car with an injured and bandaged hand; and Harding, an English driver, who had deserted the practice law to take up automobile racing.

The first round was made by the leading car in a little more than 32 minutes, but that time was reduced later on. The megaphone reports from the several contestants came in rapidly but in a confusing way, and only in changing order of the contestants as seen from any standpoint could a clear idea of the progress of the race be gained. Soon the number of cars was lessened.

One broke down and was towed to the garage, its driver in tears. Mongini lost control of his machine and it struck a telegraph pole and was wrecked, throwing out the driver and his assistant but not seriously injuring either. Tire troubles were frequent, and even the winner lost five minutes in refitting on the first round. Just one-half of the starters continued to the end.

The final result was the victory of Tracy, the American, in his American 90-horsepower Locomobile, making the ten laps, 297.1 miles, in 5 hours, 27 minutes, 45 seconds, an average of 54.36 miles an hour. He also made the fastest lap, 29.7 miles in 29 minutes 29 seconds, better than a mile-a-minute gait. Le Blon, in a 115-horsepower Thomas car, was second, 24 minutes behind Tracy. Harding won third place in a 50-horsepower Haynes; Lytle was fourth in a 120-horsepower Pope-Toledo, and Christie fifth in a 50-horsepower Christie. These are the five now qualified to race in the great event a fortnight hence.

Of the prominent people of society who were present one could easily make a list that would fill the space of this letter many times. Harry Payne Whitney was one whose appearance on the course was greeted with cheers and shouts of welcome. He sat in the Vanderbilt box directly behind the starting line, beside Mrs. E. R. Thomas and Mrs. W. K. Vanderbilt. John Farson, Jr., president of the A. A. A., Sidney B. Gorham, Elliott F. Shepard, and James F. Breeze, all enthusiastic automobilists, were interested spectators throughout the long, heavy-eyed forenoon. The contest was a greater event in nearly every particular than the race last year, although the time was not quite so fast on account of the condition of the course.

There is a touch of romance in the race, too, above its automobile interest. Tracy, the winner, was encouraged by the presence in the grand-stand of Miss Milicent Taylor, of Wichita, Kan., who had promised to name their wedding day if he won. It is not certain, however, that the happy event will take place before the race for the cup.

New York, September 22, 1906.

More than nine years have elapsed since Andree set out for his ill-fated expedition to the North Pole. The Geographical Society of Stockholm has decided to erect a memorial to him and his companions, Drs. Stindberg and Herr Fraenkel, which is to take the form of a bas-relief, erected in some conspicuous spot in the city of Stockholm. The work has been intrusted to the Swedish sculptor, Eric Lindberg, who has completed a design showing the balloon hovering over the Arctic ice regions. In one section of the design Sweden is represented by an allegorical figure watching with anxiety the balloon moving away towards the pole. The names of the occupants are carved underneath the sculpture, with the date, July 11, 1897.

Muzahan-ed-din, Shah of Persia, has made the startling announcement that he proposes to have a parliament in his country. It is not customary for rulers of despotic states to summon a parliament until after strong representations have been made to them by their subjects, backed up ordinarily by a show of force, but these preliminary conditions are not known to have existed in the Shah's case. Persia's population is from nine to nine and one-half millions. The country is divided into 33 provinces, which are administered by governors-general. The form of government has been similar to that of Turkey, all laws being based on the Koran, the Shah being regarded as vice-general of the prophet.

When the whole of the twenty-one new lines now proposed are complete, Londoners will be able to make journeys of from twenty to forty miles entirely by light railway and tramcar, traversing the metropolis from north to south and from east to west, without using either train, omnibus, or cab for assistance. The London Express makes this claim with satisfaction, and adds the statement that the total length of line that will ultimately become available to the Londoner with a desire for travel will be at least 400 miles.

The first of the tube tunnels of the Pennsylvania Railroad under the North River at New York was completed a few days ago and a party of railroad officials passed through it from the point of starting in Jersey City to the point where the tunnel terminates in Manhattan. The great tube was actually completed a full year ahead of the contract time, and the second tube, which is to parallel the first, will be completed within a month.

The head of the leading department store in Rio de Janeiro says that it was only after several years of effort that they succeeded in getting an American shoe manufacturer to make shoes in the way the Brazilians wanted them. Now they are selling hundreds of thousands of pairs of his shoes. They formerly sold only English shoes.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

A Rhyme of the Ruins.

Editor Argonaut:—In the Argonaut issued September 29, you have published "A Rhyme of the Ruins," by Mr. Lawrence W. Harris, and I am sure a great many of his friends regret he was not given the credit for its authorship. Mr. Harris is a director of "The Family," and wrote the poem for the "Opening Row" of that club when they took their new house last June. As it followed the lines of Kipling's "On the Road to Mandalay," it was done to sing to the music familiarly set for that verse, and was sung for the first time that night by Mr. John H. Noyes.

I trust this is of interest to you and that you may see fit to publish the fact in the next issue of your splendid paper.

Very truly yours, Roy M. Pike.

Earthquake Clause Insurance.

San Francisco, Sept. 24, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—C. F. Mullins, local manager of the Commercial Union Fire Ins. Co., the Commercial Union Assurance Co., the Palatine Ins. Co., and the Alliance Assurance Co. lately requested the Board of Fire Underwriters of San Francisco to allow the insurance companies having an earthquake clause, his own among the number, to write insurance at a specially low rate of 20 per cent below companies not hampered by such a clause. He made this request, he said, on account of loss of business.

Mr. Dornin of the Springfield said that as there had not been a destructive earthquake for forty years previous to that of 1906, the reduction should be not of 20 per cent but of 2.50 per cent.

In the first place, it is not believed by the policy-holders of the Mullins group of companies, that it is as much the earthquake clause that is causing their loss of business as it is their manipulation of the earthquake clause. Furthermore, although Mr. Dornin's suggestion is a good one, yet it is wrong, as it does not really indicate Mr. Mullins's position. The highest rate the Mullins group of insurance companies is paying on any fire, from whatever cause, that occurred in San Francisco during at least two days after the earthquake is, as I understand it, 75 per cent of the face value of the policy. Therefore Mr. Mullins, in asking for a 20 per cent reduction wishes to write a 75 per cent policy for an 80 per cent premium. A 75 cent policy at an 80 cent premium is of course much dearer than a dollar policy at a dollar premium. It looks at first to be 5 per cent dearer but it really is more. If one pays an 80 per cent premium for a 75 cent policy, it works out as follows:

X:80 equals 100:75 equals 106.6. Therefore, the rate would be really 26.6 per cent higher than in the dollar for dollar companies.

Possibly Mr. Mullins is charging this comparatively high rate in order to pay a better rate to his insurance solicitors, who will need to be picked men, especially suave, and to have lungs of leather. Insurance solicitors receive 15 per cent of the premium. Mr. Mullins's solicitors will, I suppose, receive 15 per cent plus the extra 26.6 per cent. It is quite interesting that Mr. Mullins did not notify his policy-holders of this reduction previous to the earthquake of April 18, 1906.

I remain,
Yours faithfully,
(Signed) Dr. Douglass W. Montgomery.

A partner of one of the most prominent of the retail houses in Rio de Janeiro ordered some food products from the United States, made by one of the best of our manufacturers, which spoiled on account of the damp climate. He said the goods sold splendidly, but as they were packed in pasteboard boxes instead of in tin, only a part of each shipment is fit to use. The reputation of the food as well as of the merchant suffers in consequence. The merchant wrote to the manufacturer offering to pay the additional expense of having the food put up in tin boxes but received the reply that the manufacturer did not care to make any change in the packing. Possibly this company is wondering why its sales are not increasing in Rio.

Another effect of the South American earthquake is shown in the news that the great straw fields of the Maiglar Celto district in Ecuador have been destroyed, and that, as a result, the future of the Panama hat industry is threatened. The inhabitants of the district, who have been deprived of employment, are in dire want. Thousands of persons, including many Indians, have been employed in hat making, and it is feared that the Indians may revert to pillage and violence in an effort to supply their wants.

In the course of time Liverpool must supersede London, points out a Manchester paper. Everything is against the latter, and its supremacy has only been retained by artificiality. If England had been discovered at the same time as America, Liverpool would inevitably have become the capital. Commercially it is slowly but surely ousting London. Winchester had to give way to London, and London will in course of time succumb to the great Lancashire seaport.

Twenty-eight new Rhodes scholars are expected to arrive in Oxford in October term. Last year's contingent numbered sixty-eight, but under the provisions of Mr. Rhodes's will none of the American States send candidates this year. The total number of Rhodes scholars in residence at Oxford next term will exceed 150.

RENEGADE AND NUN.

How a Sicilian Earthquake Reunited and Then Severed Them.

The night was stormy. The wind howled through the trees, and the tall pines bent before it. From time to time flashes of flame shot over the black bosom of the sky, followed by peals of thunder that seemed to shake the mountain. By the glare of the lightning there could be seen, at intervals, the Gothic towers of an ancient convent. The heaped-up thunder-clouds seemed like the battalions of an army assailing the venerable pile. The convent was that of Policastro, situated near the city of that name in Southern Italy.

In the darkness might be discerned the figure of a man leaning against a tree. Apparently unconscious of the rage of the storm, he remained there, his eyes fixed upon the convent towers. Upon his head he wore a turban, and a long, white mantle was thrown around him. Near by a beautiful Arabian horse pawed the ground. But what was his errand near the convent at that hour and on such a night? What could he have to do with the saintly women who there devoted themselves to God? But he is troubled—broken words escape from his lips. He speaks the Italian tongue, in the dialect of the Sicilian mountaineers. It is a renegade.

"She is there—my Gabriella! Ten years have passed since her inexorable father shut those gates upon her rather than allow her to become my bride. Ten years! But her face is before me still. It has ever shone before me like a star—in dungeon, in desert, in camp, on the field of battle. It was her image that inspired me in combats against the Christians; it was the thought of winning her one day that made me a Pacha. And now, O Gabriella mine, I am here, with a thousand good scimitars at my back to rescue you from your living tomb!"

The chronicles of the Kingdom of Sicily tell of the exploits of an audacious corsair, of Calabrian origin, who was the terror of the Italian seas. He was called Carlo, and was born in Policastro. Of humble birth, and left an orphan at an early age, an old priest took him to his home, and gave him instruction in both sacred and profane literature. But, when he arrived at manhood, Carlo fell desperately in love with the daughter of a powerful nobleman. From that moment he devoted all the forces of his soul to winning her. It was a senseless undertaking; for she was the daughter of an ancient house, and of plebeian birth. But love ever laughs at rank, and soon Gabriella loved Carlo. For a time their affection was not noticed.

But the servants found out the lover's secret; and from lip to lip it passed until it reached her father's ears. His rage was terrible. His daughter was forced to take the veil, and renounce the world for the cloister. Carlo was spirited away by night, and sold as a slave to the Algerian pirates who infested the coast. But the desire for revenge inspired him to abjure his faith, and to enroll himself in the Saracen forces.

Despite the storm and the darkness, a part of the Mussulman battalions had succeeded in climbing the heights of Policastro. Their captain, in his eagerness, had outstripped them, and was standing before the convent gates. From the plain below came the sound of neighing horses, of confused voices, of clashing arms, mingled with the noise of the elements.

But suddenly another clamor joins the grand chorus of man and nature. The bells of the churches in the valleys below peal forth the alarm. From peak to peak flash forth fires, from lip to lip goes the cry: "To arms! To arms! The Saracens are upon us!" The hardy mountaineers pour from out their humble dwellings; the troops from Policastro sally forth; the people are aroused.

As day breaks the tempest dies away. The rising sun sends his long shafts of orange over the Ionian seas. The clouds flee from his face; the flowers, but now terrified by the tempest, lift up their heads to greet him. Quitting his ocean bed, he clasps the palpitating earth in his gorgeous arms.

Naught is so beautiful as this favored land after a storm. But while the passions of nature are appeased, those of man are not. In the midst of the groves on the mountain side rush the furious combatants. The barbaric cries of the Saracens mingle with the shouts of the Sicilians. The Christian warriors force their way to the mountain top, and the tide of battle surges under the convent walls. But despite Sicilian valor, the Christian forces are slowly beaten back; soon the plateau at the top of the peak is cleared of them, and a Saracen squadron is drawn up before the great gates of the convent. At their head rides a tall and swarthy soldier, clad in rich vestments. It is the Renegade. A soldier advances to the gates, and stating the name and title of his leader, formally demands that Sister Gabriella be delivered up to him.

Sombre and pensive the Renegade sits upon his Arabian steed, waiting for the gates to open—waiting for his love to come forth from her living tomb. His eye wanders over the vast amphitheatre framed by the peaks around Policastro, from which floats the standard of the cross. Thoughts of his youth and of his abandoned faith come over him as he contemplates the smiling valley and the spires pointing heavenward.

Suddenly a strange sound strikes the Saracenic ear. It is the convent choir—the voices of the nuns, singing their matinal hymn. Even to these barbarous warriors the jangling clash of arms is not in accord with sweet voices, and they are involuntarily still.

But the Renegade fancies that he can distinguish the voice of Gabriella. For an instant soothed by the singing, his wrath returns. Indignant at his momentary weakness, he recovers himself and bids his soldiers force an entrance to the cloister.

Within the convent the nuns, like affrighted doves, have huddled together in the chapel, praying for divine help against the infidels. One of them has thrown herself upon her face before the gigantic cross, and is praying. It is Gabriella.

"Aid me, O Lord, against myself! For I have seen Carlo, and I fear. He wears the garb of the infidel, and he is lost. But what if he come to me—if I hear his voice at my side—if he extends his strong arm? I fear, Lord, I fear, for I love him still!"

A crash! The gates have fallen in. The chapel is filled with Saracens. In the van there hastens a tall warrior, who seeks for some one. His eye soon discovers the form of Gabriella, prone upon the chapel floor, clasping the base of the marble cross. The violence of her agitation has deprived her of animation; her face is colorless; she looks as one dead.

The Renegade approached and seized her. "At last, Gabriella, after all these years, do I hold you in my arms! Do you not know me? 'Tis Carlo, who has come to break your chains!"

Gabriella remained long silent. At last he heard her murmur:

"It is his voice! O aid me, heaven! I feel the flames of my fatal love reviving."

"What!" said the Renegade, bitterly, "do you repulse me? Think of what I have suffered for you. I have braved slavery and death. I have crossed ocean and desert. I have defied the wrath of God and man. And it is thus, thus that you reward me for my devotion!"

But she did not seem to hear him. She spoke as to herself:

"They told me that he was dead. And I—I took the irrevocable vow. Yet for his sake I would give my poor life a thousand times; but my soul!—alas!" She shuddered, and was silent.

The Renegade eagerly seized her hand.

"Then you love me still, Gabriella? Come—fly with me! Let us leave the cloister, where the very air is heavy, and not fit to give life to young and loving hearts. Come, Gabriella, quit your cage, and launch yourself out into the free air of life!"

"Alas, Carlo, pity me, but do not take advantage of my weakness—of my sacrilegious love for you. The band of God would lie heavy upon us were I to go. I dare not fly from here. For life and death I must remain. All that is mortal of me must repose under these stones beneath our feet."

"No, Gabriella! There is a God more terrible than yours—at whose voice the Asian mountains tremble; before whose face the African deserts shudder. Incense goes up to him from the Himalaya to the Atlantic shore, and his name is heard on the Euxine and Bosphorus. Allah-il-Allah!" He hurst into a boarse shout. "The cry of my tortured heart has reached him, and he has given you to me. Look! His crescent flag floats from the gates; his soldiers are around us. Come, my love! We will fly to the land of the rising sun, and there, O Occidental Peri, you shall be my sultana!"

While the hapless Gabriella, fascinated by her lover's glance, listened to him with a mixture of fear and love, a strange rumbling sound smote their ears. It seemed to come from the bowels of the earth. The horses of the Saracen warriors started with affright, and defying bit and spur, dashed down the mountain side. In their mad terror, they heeded not the precipices, and many a bold barbarian met his fate on the rocks below. An unseen power shook the mountain. The sky was blue and cloudless, and there was no wind, but the trees sighed and shook their limbs, while the birds darted forth from the branches, uttering cries of distress.

The subterranean mutterings grew louder, the earth shook, the stained-glass panels of the lofty windows flew in fragments, and clattered upon the stone floor; the paintings upon the wall were torn, and shook like leaves before the blast; the statues of saints tottered in their niches, and fell, with dull reverberations, to the stone; the towering dome trembled on its crumbling supports. A thick and stifling dust arose and obscured the already gloomy hall.

"See!" cried Gabriella, "'tis the hand of God! I while it is yet time, Carlo! Fly for your life! Let death suffice, O Lord!" she murmured.

But he encircled her with his strong arm, and led her slight form toward the entrance. He stood upon the threshold; his friends outside hastened toward him; step more, and they were without the doomed convent. But again the convulsed earth gave forth its rumbling; the threshold rose up under his feet—it hurled them into the chapel. The two lofty towers came thundering down before the door. The Renegade and the maiden were entombed alive.

Gabriella disengaged herself from the Renegade's grasp, and looking around upon the rocking walls, cried:

"An invisible Hand detains us, Carlo. It is vain struggle against our fate. My prison has become a sepulchre. But, oh, with you I fear neither death nor hell!" She threw herself upon his bosom. "May the hour of the divine vengeance be that of our spiritual nuptials!" she cried. "Fall upon our heads, O world! Engulf us, O earth! Naught can deprive us of love!"

As if in answer to her invocation a muffled sound was heard, like the tramp of a mighty army. The mountain again trembled to its base. The stone flooring of the chapel rose up as if struck by Titans from below. The stones heaved and rolled like the waves of the sea. The mighty columns supporting the roof shivered and wrote the walls approached and receded again. The groined floor burst in places, and the ghastly skeletons below rose to the surface, their hideous, grinning faces seeming to invite the lovers to a home with them.

Gabriella seemed inspired. Her long hair, freed from its confinement, flowed behind her; her eyes gleamed like those of a Sibyl.

"Embrace me, Carlo!" she cried wildly. "Kiss me—love defies death!"

Suddenly the earth seemed to disappear beneath their feet, as if the mountain had been swallowed up. A flash the immense building disappeared in the yawning gulf. The mountain had split in two, and one of the halves had doubled upon itself, the top falling into the gulf between. But the earth in its agony would not be still. Another effort, and the mountain rolled back again, forcing the convent to the top, as the ocean casts a shipwrecked mariner upon a rock.

And now the Sicilian sun shone upon a scene of desolation. The mountain was still, but its crest was split in twain, and upon the brink of the precipice thus formed stood a part of the ruined convent. The gigantic marble cross still stood erect, as if defying the efforts of the earthquake. At its base lay the lovers, the young head supported upon the Renegade's arm. He was injured, but she—more fortunate than her lover—was dead.

The legend adds that the Renegade never left the confines of the convent, but that he lived there to the end of his days. Silent and sombre, he ceaselessly sought for his loved one. Through the deserted cells he abandoned balls he pursued his way; over the treacherous stairs he climbed; in the sinuous labyrinths beneath the building he hid when men approached.

Soon the ivy, with pitying hand, covered the dismantled walls with its green mantle; the spider spun his web to the ceiling; the owl made his retreat in the silent vaults. But when the Renegade, pursued by the cries and shadows which the wind brought to his ears, sought a refuge in these obscure depths, even the owl would fly affrighted before him, so loaded was he with sin. The people believe too, that on the eve of the "Day of the Dead" the Renegade's form may be seen on one side of the abyss, Gabriella's on the other; that after vainly attempting to reach each other they disappear, the Renegade to hell, to suffer endless torment, the maiden to purgatory, to expiate her sin.

A curious feature is that Cymric settlers in the Welsh metropolis concentrate their enterprise on only two ideas. When a London Welshman is not a draper he is a milkman, with the result that practically all the dairies and dairies in London are owned or run by Welshmen. Incidentally it may be noted that there are some thirty places of worship in London where the services are conducted in the Welsh language.

The apartment-house trust is in evidence in New York City. In the Evening Mail is a five-page advertisement showing photo-engravings of sixty-eight apartment houses under the management of one enterprising firm.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

"The nomination of William H. Langdon as a candidate for Governor on the Hearst Independence League ticket did not come as an entirely unsolicited honor," declares a correspondent of the Sacramento Bee, who reviews the conditions of that time. "Early on Tuesday, Langdon sent to the newspapers a statement that he would be a candidate for the Gubernatorial nomination before the Democratic convention. That same evening—after there had been sufficient time to read and confer over the statement in the Examiner office—a message was sent out from Langdon's office asking that the announcement be withheld for a few days, the reason being given that Langdon wished to confer further regarding the matter. Then Langdon was taken up by the Hearst bunch."

CONFEDERATE WAR SECRETS.

Captain Headley Tells of Southern Plans to Capture Northern Cities.

It would seem that the final word on the Civil War will not be said until the last veteran of the great strife shall have reported at Fame's eternal camping-ground. The War Department records and the Confederate archives have been published; private soldier and commanding officer have had their say, and non-combatants have written of the war from every conceivable aspect. Now comes, forty-one years after Lee's surrender, a book by Captain John W. Headley, C. S. A., with revelations so astonishing that in the reading the years fold up and we are "Secesh" or "Yank," as our sympathies dictate.

Captain Headley's volume, "Confederate Operations in New York and Canada," is an account of the expeditions that were sent from the Confederate junta in Toronto to carry the war into the northern cities. With the assistance of "the Sons of Liberty," an organization of disaffected Northerners, said to have numbered 300,000, they proposed to release the 80,000 Southern soldiers in Federal prisons, and to attempt the capture of the largest cities. That failing, they proposed to apply the torch and to lay the country waste. It was also planned to gain the mastery of the Lakes. The treachery of one of their numbers prevented what would have been the darkest chapter in the chronicles of the war, if, indeed, it did not affect the ultimate outcome.

These daring plans took definite form in 1864, when the long-continued warfare, the drafts, and the political jealousies, had caused considerable feeling, in some quarters, inimical to the administration. As early as 1861, Fernando Wood, then Mayor of New York, recommended that New York secede, and "as a Free City, shed the only light and hope of a future reconstruction of our blessed Confederacy." And Colonel Thompson, head of the Confederate department in Canada, in 1864, speaks of papers in his possession that would, if known, "utterly ruin and destroy many prominent Northern men." Captain Headley writes of the plans for revolution in the fall of 1864:

The tangible prospects were best for an uprising at Chicago and New York. The forces of the "Sons of Liberty" were not only organized but arms had been distributed. It had been deemed surest to rely upon the attempt to organize a Northwestern Confederacy with Chicago as the capital.

The presidential election which was to be held on the 8th day of November was deemed an opportune time for the blow to be struck at Chicago and in New York. Colonel Thompson advised us that detachments under Captain Churchill in Cincinnati and Dr. Luke Blackburn in Boston would set fire to those cities on election day.

We were told that at least 20,000 men were enlisted in New York under a complete organization; that arms had been provided already for the forces in the city, and we could be expected to take military supervision of the forces at the vital moment. It was proposed by the New York managers to take possession of the city on the afternoon of election day. The United States Sub-Treasury was to be captured and all other property of the Government. And especially we were to release the prisoners at Fort Lafayette and unite them with our forces.

It was determined that a number of fires should be started in different parts of the city, which would bring the population to the streets and prevent any sort of resistance to our movement. To facilitate this part of the programme Mr. McMasters, editor of the Freeman's Journal, said a supply of Greek fire was being made and Captain Longmire was looking after that arrangement. He wanted the Confederates to put that part of the plan into execution, while the New York commanders of their forces would not only take possession of the city and all the approaches, but furnish the strength to support the military authorities. The city authorities were our friends. In parting, Mr. McMasters told us he would request Governor Seymour to send a confidential agent down to the city with whom he wished to confer. It was understood that Governor Seymour would not use the militia to suppress the insurrection in the city but would leave that duty to the authorities at Washington. Indeed, we were to have the support of the Governor's official neutrality.

But some few days before the election all the New York papers announced the arrival of 10,000 soldiers and of Maj.-Gen. Benjamin F. Butler, who not only assumed command but issued a proclamation in which it appeared that he proposed to deal with any disorders that might occur to disturb the public peace, and hinted that he had some information of disloyal movements.

The leaders in our conspiracy were at once demoralized by this sudden advent of General Butler and his troops. They felt that he must be aware of their purposes and many of them began to fear arrest, while others were defiant.

But it looked as if the troops had come to stay, and McMasters decided to withdraw from any further connection with the proposed revolution. Other leaders became discouraged, and the enterprise was abandoned for the time. The determined ones then announced their purpose to set fire to the city. Captain Headley continues:

It had been agreed that our fires would be started in the hotels, so as to do the greatest damage in the business district on Broadway. The eight members of our party had each taken a room at three or four hotels. In doing this we would buy a black glazed satchel for $1.00 and put an overcoat in it for baggage. The room at each hotel was used enough to show that it was being occupied. In leaving, of course the overcoat would be worn and the satchel left behind empty.

It was agreed that our operations should begin promptly at 8 o'clock p. m., so that the guests of hotels might all escape, as we did not want to destroy any lives.

At 6 o'clock promptly on the evening of November 25, 1864, our party met in our cottage headquarters, two failing to report. The bottles of Greek fire having been wrapped in paper were put in our coat pockets. Each man took ten bottles. It was agreed that after our operations were over we should secrete ourselves and meet here the next night at 6 o'clock to compare notes and agree on further plans. I had rooms at the Astor House, City Hotel, Everett House, and the United States Hotel. Colonel Martin occupied rooms at the Hoffman, Fifth Avenue, St. Denis, and two others. Lieutenant Ashbrook was at the St. Nicholas, La Farge, and several others. Altogether nineteen hotels were fired, namely Hoffman House, Fifth Avenue, St. Denis, St. James, La Farge, St. Nicholas, Metropolitan, Howard, Tammany, Brandreth's, Gramercy Park, Hanford, New England, Belmont, Lovejoy's, City Hotel, Astor, United States and Everett.

I reached the Astor House at 7:20 o'clock, got my key, and went to my room in the top story. It was the lower corner front room on Broadway. After lighting the gas jet I hung the bedclothes loosely on the headboard and piled the chairs, drawers of the bureau and washstand on the bed. Then stuffed some newspapers about among the mass and poured a bottle of turpentine over it all. I concluded to unlock my door and fix the key on the outside, as I might have to get out in a hurry, for I did not know whether the Greek fire would make a noise or not. I opened a bottle carefully and quickly and spilled it on the pile of rubbish. It blazed up instantly and the whole bed seemed to be in flames before I could get out. I locked the door and walked down the hall and stairway to the office, which was fairly crowded with people. I left the key at the office as usual and passed out.

Across at the City Hotel I proceeded in the same manner. Then in going down to the Everett House I looked over at my room in the Astor House. A bright light appeared within, but there were no indications below of any alarm. After getting through at the Everett House I started to the United States Hotel, when the fire bells began to ring up town. I got through at the United States Hotel without trouble, but in leaving my key the clerk, I thought, looked at me a little curiously. It occurred to me that it had been discovered that my satchel had no baggage in it and that perhaps the clerk had in mind to mention the fact.

As I came back to Broadway it seemed that a hundred bells were ringing, great crowds were gathering on the street, and there was general consternation. I concluded to go and see how the fires were doing. There was no panic at the Astor House, but to my surprise a great crowd was pouring out of Barnum's Museum nearly opposite the Astor. It was now a quarter after nine o'clock by the City Hall tower clock. Presently the alarm came from the City Hotel and the Everett. The surging crowds were frantic. But the greatest panic was at Barnum's Museum. People were coming out and down ladders from the second and third floor windows and the manager was crying out for help to get his animals out. It looked like people were getting hurt in running over each other in the stampede, and still I could not help some astonishment for I did not suppose there was a fire in the Museum.

In accordance with our plan I went down Broadway and turned across the North River wharf. The vessels and barges of every description were lying along close together and not more than twenty yards from the street. I picked dark spots to stand in and jerked a bottle in six different places. They were ablaze before I left. One had struck a barge of baled hay and made a big fire. There were wild scenes here the last time I looked back. I started straight for the City Hall.

There was still a crowd around the Astor House and everywhere, but I edged through and crossed over to the City Hall, where I caught a car just starting up town. I got off on Bowery street opposite the Metropolitan Hotel to go across and see how Ashbrook and Harrington had succeeded. After walking half a square I observed a man walking ahead of me and recognized him. It was Captain Kennedy. I closed up behind him and slapped him on the shoulder. He squatted and began to draw his pistol, but I laughed and he knew me. He laughed and said he ought to shoot me for giving him such a scare.

We soon related to each other our experience. Kennedy said that after he touched off his hotels he concluded to go down to Barnum's Museum and stay until something turned up, but had only been there a few minutes when alarms began to ring all over the city. He decided to go out and coming down the stairway it happened to be clear at a turn and the idea occurred to him that there would be fun to start a scare. He broke a bottle of Greek fire, he said, on the edge of a step like he would crack an egg. It blazed up and he got out to witness the result. He had been down there in the crowd ever since and the fires at the Astor House and the City Hotel had both been put out. But he had listened to the talk of the people and heard the opinion expressed generally that rebels were in the city to destroy it. He thought our presence must be known. Harrington had broken a bottle in the Metropolitan Theatre at 8 o'clock, just after he fired the Metropolitan Hotel adjoining; and Ashbrook had done likewise at Niblo's Garden Theatre adjoining the La Farge Hotel.

We went into the crowd on Broadway and stopped at those places to see what happened. There was the wildest excitement imaginable. There was all sorts of talk about banging the rebels to lamp posts or burning them at the stake. Still we discovered that all was surmise apparently. So far as we could learn the programme had been carried out, but it appeared that all had made a failure. It seemed to us that here was something wrong with our Greek fire.

All had observed that the fires had been put out in all the places as easily as any ordinary fire. We came to the conclusion that Longmire and his manufacturing chemist had put up a job on us after it was found that we could not be dissuaded from our purpose.

Through the betrayal of their cause by Godfrey Hymans, the government detectives learned who the conspirators were, but only Captain Kennedy was captured. Before he was hanged Kennedy made a confession in which he said: "In retaliation for Sheridan's atrocities in the Shenandoah Valley we desired to destroy property, not the lives of women and children, although that would, of course, have followed in its train." And Captain Headley justifies the attempt to burn New York by saying:

It is fair to all concerned to record the fact that ten days before this attempt of Confederates to burn New York City, General Sherman had burned the city of Atlanta, and the Northern papers and people of the war party were in great glee over the miseries of the Southern people. I heard them talk every day in New York, in restaurants, hotels, and on the streets.

Failure also attended the efforts of the "raiders" in Chicago and other cities. The release of 8000 prisoners at Camp Douglas seemed imminent when the Federal garrison was increased, and the Confederate leaders arrested. Nothing daunted, however, these daring spirits attempted another adventure, the rescue of seven Southern generals who were to be transferred from Johnson's Island to Fort Lafayette, New York:

They were Major Generals Edward Johnson and J. R. Trimble; Brigadier-Generals J. J. Archer, M. Jeff Thompson, J. R. Jones, W. N. R. Beall, and I. W. Frazier. Colonel Thompson sent for me on the morning of the 13th of December. He was anxious that these generals should escape or be released on the train en route. He thought that we, with Captain Beall and a few others, might rescue them if it could be done at all.

It was intended that we should board the train bearing the prisoners and capture it within a short distance of Buffalo, then we could derail the coaches and run the engine and express car within two miles of the city and derail them also.

Martin was to give the signal for our attempt on the guards. He intended to get hold of the officer in charge of the beginning and then try to make him surrender the others, while the rest of us would get the drop on the guards at each door. The generals were to be quickly armed, and after changing overcoats with passengers, the engineer would be taken in charge to run into the suburbs of Buffalo, where Martin would get off with the generals and force the engineer to run back into the country.

We reached the appointed place on the road and secreted our conveyances in a wood near by. Colonel Martin concluded to put an iron rail in a fence gap and cover it with snow to stop the train if it did not stop when signaled with a lantern; but before we got ready the train came and went by without any trouble, throwing the iron rail about fifty yards. But it was jarred, and stopped about two hundred yards distant, and one or two men started back with lanterns. We hurried back to the city and took the train for Suspension Bridge, where we were obliged to wait an hour for the train from New York on the Central Railroad.

Captain Beall, one of the would be rescuers, was arrested by the Federal authorities, and was later executed. Beall, it was, with Captain Cole who attempted to capture the gunboat

Michigan, on Lake Erie, two months before. Had they been successful it would have put cities and towns of New York, Ohio, Illinois, Michigan, and Wisconsin, that were upon shores of the Lakes at the mercy of this war, under Confederate command:

The plan provided that Beall with a force of twenty Confederates should take passage the steamer Philo Parsons at or below Detroit put the passengers and crew ashore, and steam ahead in the usual way as if going Sandusky until near the Michigan, when would turn and run alongside, board and capture the gunboat. The prisoners on John Island would then be released. Captain Beall meanwhile would perform his part and have messenger at Bass Island for Beall and Beall upon their arrival.

The acquaintance formed with Captain Beall of the Michigan, when Captain Cole made his initial tour around the Lakes, had cultivated until a congenial association had grown between them the best of friends. Cole had also gratified himself in the esteem and confidence of the other officers of the gunboat. He entertained them at sumptuous dinners at hotel and dispensed the choicest wines lavishly but discreet hospitality. Cole was an invited guest on the Michigan, and added engineer to his list of friends, with whom finally made safe and satisfactory terms, might be said with truth that Cole was a privileged character on the gunboat and was freely allowed to visit the prison on John Island and converse with the officers, among whom were Maj.-Gens. Edward Johnson, J. R. Trimble, Brig.-Gens. Jeff Thompson, Archer, Jones, Beall, and Frazier, Capt. Scales of the Thirtieth Mississippi, and Thompson of Morgan's command, Capt. Breckenridge, son of John C. Breckenridge of Kentucky, Colonel Lucius Davis, officiated in the John Brown war, and Col. Robert Cobb Kennedy of the First Louisiana Infantry. These gentlemen were let into the secret of the proposed capture of the Michigan and had all the arrangements perfected, a revolt in the prison at the critical moment aid of their rescuers, if the gunboat should be secured. A signal was to be fired from the gunboat by Cole and Beall which the prison would understand to mean that the vessel was in their possession.

Cole had established relations with the citizens of Sandusky who were members of the "Order of the Star," the successor of the "Order of Liberty." These were at his service in a social way. They frequently joined him in extending hospitality, and he never missed an opportunity to fete any of the officers of the gunboat when they appeared in Sandusky.

The time had now arrived for action. Cole arranged with the officers of the Michigan to be his guests, on their own gunboat, a special champagne dinner he was to give on the evening of the 19th of September. Meanwhile, he had arranged with the engineer to derange the machinery of the gunboat. His plan at his dinner was to drug the wine, the officers and put them to sleep. He, a Confederate companion, would then be on hand to await the arrival of Beall. A signal was to be sent up from the gunboat when Beall approached, besides the messenger to Middle Island.

There was a small arsenal on the gunboat where the arms, etc., of the men were kept. Cole and one friend proposed with two others each to take position at the door of the armory and hold the unarmed men there when Beall arrived on the Philo Parsons and boarded the gunboat. In this way it was expected to obtain possession without a shot or any loss of life.

It happened that some one in the company of Colonel Thompson had betrayed Cole. The officers were advised in time to arrest him promptly and put him in irons. The Michigan was put in order for battle with steam up for the pursuit of the Philo Parsons if she approached. It developed, however, that she did not work at this critical juncture, but Captain Carter never knew the cause. The end had been true to his bargain with Captain Beall.

Beall performed his task successfully, captured the Philo Parsons, and the Queen, with a large number of passengers and Union soldiers. His men, however, would join him in the proposed attack on the Michigan, and Beall scuttled both vessels.

Captain Headley tells also of the raising of the shooting of several citizens, and the appropriation of $200,000 from its banks. In 1864, Captain Headley and Colonel Johnson made an effort to capture Andrew Johnson, Vice-President elect, at Louisville. He had not neglected a trifling detail they would have little difficulty in carrying out their plan.

The book is solidly printed and contains numbers of original documents. It will undoubtedly receive attention and criticism, and stir up controversy.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

One of the features of the Fifteenth Universal Peace Congress, held in Milan, Italy, last month, was the address of ex-Senator Lloyd Chamberlain of Massachusetts, advocating the neutralization of all the great trans-oceanic trade routes.

Miss Constance Goddard DuBois has just completed for the University of California an important investigation of the ceremonies, myths and religion of the Indians of Southern California, in connection with the ethnological and archeological survey of the State.

Major-General Frederick D. Grant, commanding the Department of the East, in his annual report estimates that 90 per cent of the troubles that occurred in the army were due to the use of bad liquor. He believes that with the establishment of the canteen the influence of moralizing resorts would be greatly reduced.

Spencer F. Eddy, first secretary of the American embassy at St. Petersburg, has been transferred to a similar post in the American embassy in Berlin, succeeding H. Percival Dodge of Massachusetts, who has been appointed first secretary of the American embassy at Tokio. Mrs. Eddy was Lurline Spreckels, of San Francisco.

General James F. Smith, who was inaugurated Governor-General of the Philippines September 20th, is a Californian by birth, a lawyer by profession, and about forty-seven years of age. He went to the Philippines as colonel of the First California Volunteers, rose to be brigadier-general of volunteers and later was appointed a member of the Supreme Court of the Philippines.

Captain John J. Pershing's promotion to a brigadier-generalship is notable in army annals. He jumps 257 captains, 364 majors, 131 lieutenant-colonels, and 110 colonels, or 862 officers in all. He is a son-in-law of Senator Warren, chairman of the Senate Military Committee. Captain Pershing was for some time Governor of the Moro country in Mindanao, and was in the President's favor there. As a brigadier-general, Captain Pershing will bring young blood to the ranks of the general officers of the army.

E. H. Harriman, the railroad manager and financial power, is said to be the closest parallel to Napoleon Bonaparte that lives before the public eye today. In stature he is small. He is light and does not look strong. He generally wears loose-fitting clothes and carries his hands in his coat pockets. He is very quick of movement, also of mind, restless, full of energy, critical of detail, exacting, autocratic. He is, like James J. Hill, moody and not a particularly pleasant neighbor when the mood is that way.

German tourists in Denmark paid a visit to Charlottenburg with the object of seeing the summer palace of King Frederick. They met a gentleman walking alone of whom they inquired whether it would be possible for them to obtain access to the gardens. He replied pleasantly and for half an hour led the party about the grounds, pointing out their beauties and entertaining the strangers with lively conversation. At last he took his leave with the words, "If you care to see the stables, just say that you have the king's permission." It was the king himself, and the London Standard concludes its account of the incident with the statement that the monarch shook hands with each member of the party and bade them farewell.

Baron George James Playfair, commander of the Royal Victoria Order, hero of many wars, recently visited the Pacific Coast, en route to Honolulu and the Orient for a year of pleasure traveling. Baron Playfair at the present time commands the coast defenses of England, and is taking a vacation to regain his health. He joined the Queen's army in 1870. In 1877 he was sent to Turkey in command of a company and fought throughout the Turkish war. For his heroic work during the winter campaign in the Balkans, and for his bravery in leading the charge at Shipka Pass, he was awarded a medal by Queen Victoria. He served in India with distinction and from 1881 to 1884 was in command of the troops in Canada.

The German nation has recently voted on the question who are the twelve greatest men in the fatherland. The result contains surprises for people in other lands. The list begins, naturally, with the Emperor. The second choice is Gerhart Hauptmann, the dramatist. Robert Koch, the scientist, is third, and Ernest Haeckel and Wilhelm Conrad Roentgen, who have added to the scientific reputation of their country, are the fourth and fifth selections in the list. The sixth name is the present Chancellor of the Empire, Prince von Buelow. Seventh and eighth are Max Klinger, the painter and sculptor, and Richard Strauss, who has been selected to represent music. August Bebel, the Socialist, and Count Haeseler, who is high in the military affairs of the country, are the ninth and tenth.

The eleventh niche was awarded to Ernest von Behring, the physician and scientist, and Reinhold Begas, the sculptor, completes the list.

An interstate hunt club, with President Roosevelt, Vice-President Fairbanks, Grover Cleveland and William Jennings Bryan on its roll of honorary members, has been organized, partly with the aid of Chicagoans, and efforts are being made to find a suitable site for preserves and clubhouse. General J. C. S. Blackburn of Kentucky is president of the organization. Secretary of State Root, Secretary of War Taft, Secretary of the Treasury Shaw, Senator Morgan of Alabama and other men of national prominence are among the vice-presidents. The wild country through the Tennessee mountains has made a decided hit with the committee of investigation, but no decision has been reached.

Charles E. Magoon, at present Governor of the Panama Canal Zone, is to sail at once for the Philippines, where he will be installed as Vice-Governor-General. It is understood that within a short time he will be made the head of the Philippine government. The appointment of General Smith as Governor-General after Governor-General Ide's retirement may now seem superfluous, since General Smith's term will be for so short a period. Within six years, when Magoon attains it, the Governor-Generalship will have been held by five different men. Mr. Taft became the civil head of the Philippine government on July 4, 1901; he retired in 1904, and since then the islands have had Messrs. Wright, Ide and Smith as Governors-General in rapid succession.

Chas. H. Haswell, of New York, who is ninety-nine years old, voted the Democratic ticket in 1828, including Andrew Jackson for President, and has stuck to his party through thick and thin. When he was in New York lately Mr. Bryan shook hands and talked with Mr. Haswell, and afterwards pronounced him one of the most remarkable men he had ever met. To this lively nonagenarian the political history of New York State since Jackson's time is as well known as is the current situation to the average politician. As he is still active, mentally and physically, the present political scene interests him deeply, and he is speculating as to whom he is going to have a chance to support for President in 1908. He is the author of the "Civil Engineer's Pocket-Book," now in its 30th edition.

VANITY FAIR.

Whether the Americans are wholly responsible or not, the fact remains that prices in Paris have gone steadily up for the last century, and that today sums are paid which even recently would have astonished the leaders of fashion.

"Ten years ago," said a worldly American woman, "we considered fifteen dollars a good price to pay the Rue de la Paix milliners for our hats—twenty dollars was considered extreme. Today we pay forty dollars for something convenient, and we give as high as sixty dollars for a hat that is really smart."

"Steadily the taste for luxury has increased. The book wherein the lady-in-waiting to Marie Antoinette pasted samples of all this extravagant Queen's most extravagant gowns might today be used as a suggestion to the young American girl. This little volume, precious and melancholy, is stored away among the treasures of the National Archives in Paris. On the faded yellow of its pages there are pasted fragments of silk, taffetas, light brocades, plain grosgrain, and, as the summit of luxury, three bits of velvet, fragments of gowns worn on the grandest occasions.

A more recent example of regal modesty has come under notice in a letter addressed by the Empress Eugenie to one of her family. In it she says:

"They used to accuse me of extravagance! What did my expenses represent as compared to those of any bourgeoisie of today! During all the time I was Empress I had only three dresses that cost, each of them, as much as $200—one for my marriage, one for the Exposition of 1868, and one for the christening of the Prince Imperial!"

The very sorts of gowns worn and the material of which they are made have changed in the last generation. Worth, the great Paris dressmaker, established his reputation through the splendor of the stuffs he made use of during the Empire. Solid and grandiose, these long-enduring silks and satins, made on the hand-loom at Lyons, were of a substantiality inappropriate to the needs of today, for these needs have radically altered.

Doucet, whose sign has hung on the same spot in the Rue de la Paix for two generations, says: "Formerly, when my father started in the dressmaking business, the gown which had the greatest vogue was the house dress, the 'robe d'intérieur.' Now we never hear of it. The modern woman is seldom at home in the daytime, and the two great models we sell are the street dress and the evening dress. The short skirt which Americans have made the fashion, and which the modern woman considers indispensable, we call 'trotteuse.' Is not the name suggestive?"

Thus the well-wearing goods which lasted a lifetime have been replaced by a variety of light and vaporous materials: muslins, chiffons, crepes de Chine, silklike cloths. They must be renewed with every passing fashion, and their variety and flimsiness add enormously to the expense of the toilette.

"It is true that the English women smoke on the trains, but they do not demand separate smoking cars for themselves. They puff the weed alongside the men. Of course, only the upper class of women do this." S. Fay, general manager of the Great Central Railway of England, made this statement recently. He seemed surprised that the report had reached the United States to the effect that the London smart set had demanded separate smoking cars and denied it firmly. "The English railways can not afford to supply separate cars for the women," he said, "and the women do not ask for them. If they wish to smoke they travel in the ordinary smoking cars with the men."

Mr. Fay is traveling over the United States in a private car. His tour is one of pleasure though he is picking up American ideas of rail-roading. He says the English railroads are kept in better repair than those of the United States and Canada. "The English demand appearance and speed," he said, "and we have spent millions of dollars on roadbeds and station conveniences. There is such competition, especially in suburban traffic, that we have reached a high rate of speed. Our suburban service is much better than any in America."

Bachelors and men of all kinds and conditions all over Europe are inundating the mail with registered letters and money orders demanding tickets for the new marriage lottery, second of its kind, soon to be started in Milan. A committee of artists, men and women, are now engaged in selecting the victims—namely, thirty unmarried women of good reputation, faultless figures and beautiful faces, says a cable dispatch.

The largest dot of $200,000 will be attached to the finest looking among the thirty girls selected; lesser dots, from $100,000 to $5,000, will go with the other twenty-nine damsels. Anybody and everybody can buy tickets, as many as he likes, the more the merrier. And anybody has a chance to win—money at least. If the winner happens to be a married person, or a female, or an unreasonable being who refuses to marry the beauty selected for him by the committee—why, he may say so and divide the money consideration with the girl. The girls, on their part, have to sign papers agreeing not to sue the men who refuse them for breach of promise.

When the English monarch visits at any of his special friends' houses he generally distributes between $1,000 and $1,500 in tips, reports a London journal. When attending a private shooting King Edward generally presents each of the beaters a guinea, while every one of the keepers is given between one and ten guineas. When visiting at a foreign court, however, the tips distributed by the English sovereign never amount to less than $5,000.

Emperor William of Germany, while visiting in England, never spent less than $5,000 in tips, and on the occasion of Queen Victoria's funeral he is known to have doubled the usual amount of his tipping. The Czar of Russia on his last visit to England gave a check of $15,000 to the court's master of ceremonies for distribution among the servants.

The Wagnerian Cycle at Beyreuth has just come to an end and was pronounced a great success by press correspondents. The Crown Prince of Germany came incognito, and in order to hide his identity took rooms at the house of a veterinarian who never found out who his guest really was until he received a letter of thanks for his attentions bearing the imperial coat-of-arms. Other prominent people who attended some of the performances were Prince Eitel of Germany, Prince Ferdinand of Bulgaria, the Grand Duke of Hesse, the Countess of Castellene, and Adelina Patti who sang and was much applauded.

The performances at Beyreuth this year were singularly noted because of the absolute absence of the American contingent, which usually flocks to the place during the summer. It is said there that since Mr. and Mrs. Longworth visited Beyreuth and received scant courtesies from Mme. Wagner because of her personal resentment against the unauthorized performance of Parsifal in New York, American visitors to Europe have boycotted the Beyreuth celebrations.

Margherita, the queen mother of Italy, has expressed her intention of touring the cathedral towns of England in a motor car. She has also in contemplation a motor trip through the United States. Her majesty is perhaps the most ardent of all royal motorists. She pursues the recreation in spite of many adventures and several narrow escapes from serious injury. She has a passion for long-distance trips, but does not care for fast going.

Her cars are most luxurious. The interiors are fitted with tables for six persons, armchairs and folding seats, and are lighted electrically. She has in her favorite car a silver image of the patron saint of automobiles, St. Christopher. The image is surmounted by the royal arms, and has a gold border with the inscription, composed by the queen herself, "St. Christopher preserve us from the perils of the way and protect us in the incidents of the journey."

During her recent 3,000-mile tour through Europe, traveling incognito, the queen had to be preceded everywhere by a police pilot car, so great was the popular dislike to the motor. She was held up in Switzerland, and fines were frequently exacted from her. Near the French frontier the country people halted her with missiles. In August last year her majesty was thrown violently out of her car while returning from Great St. Bernard, but she escaped injury and showed great courage.

"I was somewhat interested in the report of Admiral Evans, in which he criticises some of the people of Portland because American sailors were shut out of certain places in that city on account of the uniform they wore," writes a correspondent of the New York World. "I do not see that Admiral Evans has any license to complain of the people of Portland for doing what he and all the commissioned officers of the navy do right along.

"The commissioned officers of the navy look upon the non-commissioned officers and sailors as so many inferior beings, useful perhaps in doing the work necessary for the proper handling of the vessels, but otherwise beneath notice. Suppose Admiral Evans and thirty or forty of his officers took a notion to dine at one of the hotels in Portland, and after they were seated a number of sailors from his ships who were on shore leave took a notion to dine at the same hotel and started to put their notion into practice. I wonder what would happen? Would the sailors be allowed to enter the dining-room and take their seats at the tables, wherever there happened to be a vacant chair, at which the officers were seated? Not much! Those sailors would be quickly told that their custom was not wanted. Suppose some society dame of Portland had invited Admiral Evans and his officers to a hall at her home, with the request that they come in full uniform; at the same time, suppose she wanted to do a novel thing and invited a number of the common sailors to come, also in full uniform. If the officers heard of the invitation to the sailors would they go and mix with them? To ask that question is to answer it.

"I do not think that American sailors ought to be excluded from any public place on account of their uniform, but the officers have no ground for complaint if the public puts upon the navy uniform the same value that the officers put upon it. By making a bridgeless gulf between the commissioned officer and the common sailor the United States government has put the badge of inferiority upon the uniform of the common sailor, and the people who object to him in his uniform are simply giving him the same rating that the government gives him."

Under our present system our men emigrate but leave our delicately nurtured women at home observes a contributor to the English journal Boy and Girl. Families of grown-up, unmarried daughters, discontented and restless, are far too numerous among us, and all the while, in far-off places of the empire, there are men by the thousands hungering for the sight of an English lass. We do not exaggerate. The flag of Britain in too many parts of the earth is flying over a generation of bachelors.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Dramatic Notes.

Al Hayman, the New York theatrical manager, as in San Francisco last week. He has booked large number of shows for the Coast, and is looking over the field. He predicts a great future for theatres in this city.

It is reported with some degree of authority at David Belasco will star Nellie Stewart, the Australian actress, next season in the play he originally intended for Mrs. Leslie Carter. The debut of Nellie Stewart in America was a four-weeks' engagement at the Majestic Theatre in San Francisco in "Sweet Nell of Old Drury," only in the present year.

Henry Miller has definitely announced that he will star jointly with Margaret Anglin in "The Great Divide."

Of Annie Russell as Puck in the production "A Midsummer Night's Dream" at the new Astor Theatre, one critic says she "catches the spirit of the elf-like little sprite and plays in a gleeful, mischievous, eerie fashion, dancing, singing and flying through the air in the most approved fairy style." The spectacular effects are said to be very good in this production, but little praise is given the actors.

Wilton Lackaye has added another to his long list of successful character roles in that of Jean Valjean in "The Law and the Man," a dramatic version of Victor Hugo's masterpiece, "Les Misérables," and the first successful one.

"Zira," in which Margaret Anglin won success last season, is now being given by a stock company in Chicago at popular prices.

That the lesson of the Iroquois theatre fire has not yet been wholly forgotten was illustrated in New York when 1500 people were turned away from the new Astor Theatre because the fire department had not been compensated with. It was, of course, a matter of sympathy to the people who had procured seats for the opening performance, in which Annie Russell was to appear in "A Midsummer Night's Dream," and it was also a cause of embarrassment to Miss Russell and her company. After several days' delay the deficiencies were supplied and the theatre opened.

Norbrook Blinn is given credit for intelligent effort in Stanley Dark's play, "Man and His Ape," recently produced in New York, but the piece is not a success.

Marion Grey Fiske is now engaged with M. Fiske in rehearsing the Manhattan Theatre company in "New York Idea," in which Mrs. Fiske will be seen this season. Mrs. Fiske will appear in the play at Milwaukee.

Sarah Bernhardt says Patti is foolish to retire; she can sing at all. "This retiring business does me tired," she said. "Mme. Patti is not unless she is seventy, and I do not think she is at old yet." (She was born in 1843.) "I do not mean to retire even when I am seventy years old if I am still able to act. There is no reason why I should. I am stronger today than I ever was, and I have five new plays to bring out this season."

George Greenleaf, leading man at the Burbank Theatre in Los Angeles, was married September 20 to Mrs. Lucy Banning, formerly Mrs. Mel Bradbury.

Ida Crabtree has reached her fifty-ninth birthday, but is still as jolly as of old, determined to enjoy every minute of her life. Miss Crabtree is one of the heaviest taxpayers in Boston, one piece of her real estate alone being valued at $855,000. She also owns a fine stock farm at Arlington, N. J., and has just blossomed out as owner of fast horses. It is hinted that her arguments induced Richard Mansfield to advance his forthcoming retirement. She advises him to "have some fun with your money before you're too old to enjoy it."

Janor Duse, the famous Italian actress, has positively vetoed a plan to celebrate her jubilee at a done in England and France for Ellen Terry and Bernhardt.

Edwin Tree, whose production of "A Winter's Tale," is the first important one of London's theatrical season, says he likes to present Shakespeare's plays for a variety of reasons. "But I need mention only one reason," he adds whimsically. "At rehearsals, you know, there are no interruptions from the author."

Edwin Stevens, with a new monologue, was in the vaudeville bill at the Colonial Theatre, New York, last week.

A endowed theatre (with no orchestra) is one of the latest evidences of art interest in Chicago. In the first two months of the new season eight plays will be presented—four short and four long ones. Two will be American plays, two English, two French, one German and one Spanish. Four will be modern and four costume plays. The prospective patrons are anxious to see what effect it will have upon players to come on without music. There is also anxiety about how to fill the intermissions, although this time will probably be employed in visiting by the audience.

A cable dispatch from London, printed in New York, states that the will of John Lawrence Toole, the comedian, disposes of an estate valued at $400,000.

The cost of theatrical productions is often very large, remarks a writer in the Providence Journal, but the manager's risk is largely self-imposed. Audiences long ago ceased to be dulled to a bad play by gaudy scenery. Some of the most prosperous recent events in the theatres have been those that cost comparatively little to stage. Conspicuous cases in point are David Warfield's "The Music Master," Arnold Daly's "Candida," Maude Adams' "Peter Pan," Cyril Scott's "The Prince Chap," Robert Loraine's "Man and Superman." A score more might be named almost off hand. Of course, a play, which after all is only an imitation of actual happenings, presupposes scenic environment sufficient to carry out its illusion—only Ben Greet and a few other cranks will urge to the contrary. But if substantial art is there to build upon, consistency, not mechanical extravagance, is all that is required of its settings.

Musical Notes.

Mme. Melba, who is coming to this country in January to be the prima donna of the Hammerstein grand opera company in New York, has been spending the summer very quietly at her country place a few miles out of London. She is busy preparing for the marriage of her son, George Armstrong, to one of the belles of the past season in London.

Leoncavallo, the Italian composer, has left Milan, with his La Scala orchestra for the United States. There are seventy-five musicians in the orchestra, and they will make fifty appearances in the United States.

Joseph Cawthorn and the Sousa Opera Company, in John Philip Sousa's new military comic opera, "The Free Lance," have made a hit in Chicago.

Lhevinne, the pianist, will appear in London next week and in New York a month later. His appearance in London is awaited with interest, as following his successful debut there three years ago, when he met with an accident while cycling, the morning after his concert, and was forced to abandon his tour.

A few years ago a small hut popular comic opera company headed by the comedian, Ed Andrews, played a circuit regularly in the Northwest, and suddenly the name, which had become well known, disappeared from public view. It is now learned, from a Portland paper, that the company, or several members of it, are engaged in fruit-growing in Oregon, not merely contented but prosperous.

Adelaide Norwood-Brandt, the American dramatic soprano who will sing the title role in Puccini's "Madam Butterfly," returned to America a few days ago, after two years abroad. She was for four years with the Savage Grand Opera Company before she went to Berlin for special study under Lilli Lehmann. Elza Szamosy and Louise Janssen, who are to alternate with Norwood, together with Conductors Walter Rothwell and Alfred Feith and the rest of the "Madam Butterfly" company, have arrived in New York, and the first performance of the much talked about Japanese opera will be given October 15th in Washington.

Chicago alone among American cities has created and sustains an orchestra standing on an equal artistic footing with the finest in the world. Last season, though the first after the incalculable loss by the death of Mr. Thomas, was also the first of the fifteen seasons to end without any deficit and every debt paid out of the orchestra's own earnings. Mr. Stock, the successor of Theodore Thomas in the direction of the orchestra, is only 34 years of age, but he has played with the organization for eleven years, and before that had been a musician of recognized ability in Cologne, where he was born.

The rehearsals of the new DeKoven operetta, "The Student King," have been completed, and Mme. Lina Abarbanell will soon be heard in the leading part of Princess Elsa. It will be played a month in Boston and then go to New York.

Despite his seventy-one years, Camille Saint-Saens, the French composer, is as active as a youth. A few weeks ago he was one of the stars at the Mozart Festival in Salzburg, where he received an overwhelming ovation. Thence he was called to Paris to preside over the production of his new opera. The other day, his latest piece of chamber music, the second concerto for violoncello from his pen, was given in London. The composer played it with the violoncellist, Mr. Hollman, who will accompany M. Saint-Saens on his American tour. He will make his first appearance in this country with Walter Damrosch and the New York Symphony Orchestra at their first concerts in Carnegie Hall, November 3d and 4th.

Victor Herber's latest work is in the music of the new operetta, "The Red Mill," produced last week in New York. Henry Blossom wrote the book of the piece, and Montgomery and Stone, who made a reputation in the "Wizard of Oz," have been fitted with congenial roles and lead the company of fun-makers.

From a letter in the New York Musical Leader on the Salzburg Festival is taken this paragraph: "Wagner alone at Bayreuth; Mozart unalloyed at Salzburg, and Wagner and Mozart combined at Munich, have furnished music lovers, indigenous and itinerant, with six weeks of opera in its best and most legitimate form. By which is meant, opera from the standpoint of reverence for the music and the man who made it, rather than for the artists who are used as a medium of expression. To ask in Bayreuth who is to sing Tristan is to be guilty of high treason against Tristan itself; to weigh the artist in the balance with the music is an unpardonable offense and contrary to all Bayreuth traditions. This is the attitude expected of visitors at Bayreuth, but not all of them can suppress or even dissimulate a lack of interest in the individual artists. From this point of view, then, Bayreuth was distinctly disappointing, while Salzburg with its Mozart Festival and "all-star" casts, goes on record as the most successful operatic enterprise of the season." At Salzburg, Lilli Lehmann, Francesco D'Andrade, Mme. Gadski, and Geraldine Farrar were the leading principals. Richard Strauss conducted the four Mozart concerts.

The Orpheum.

Bresina, the celebrated European music hall artist, will make her first appearance in San Francisco at the Orpheum this Sunday afternoon. She is said to be beautiful and graceful, and her voice is well trained. James Thornton, than whom a better known and more popular monologist never appeared in this city, will receive a warm reception. He is the man who wrote "My Sweetheart's the Man in the Moon" and many other songs. The four Bards, who created a sensation on their last visit with the Orpheum Road Show, will return crowned with new gymnastic laurels. Willie Eckstein, a phenomenal piano player, who has been praised by Paderewski, Rosenthal, Carreno and other celebrities, will be heard in classic and popular compositions. Carter De Haven and Flora Parker will vary their singing and dancing novelty, and the Zazell and Vernon company of pantomimists will present "Elopement" for the last times. The "Three Roses," with their dainty musical offering, Adamini and Taylor, "The Wandering Minstrels," and Orpheum motion pictures, showing the latest novelties, will complete a varied programme. There is amusement of all kinds to be found on the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located.

The postal officials of Oakland for some time have been carefully collecting census data with a view to closely approximating the population of the city. They secured information from the Contra Costa Water Company, the Oakland Health Office, the School Department and from the letter carriers. As a result of the data gathered and on a conservative estimate the figure is placed at 225,000. This estimate will be made the basis for an increased carrier service.

Rufus P. Jennings, chairman of the California Promotion Committee, had an interview in New York recently with D. O. Mills, who said in reference to the rebuilding of the Mills building in San Francisco that it was his intention to rebuild it as soon as the conditions of the labor and material markets should reach a permanent basis.

THE ORIGINAL VIENNA CAFE AND BAKERY'S BRANCH.

The original Vienna Cafe and Bakery at 1014 and 1016 Van Ness Avenue, which opened on Post Street above Van Ness Avenue immediately after the fire, has now opened a more commodious cafe on the Avenue, under the personal direction of Mr. Galindo and the management of E. B. Sparks, a New Haven (Conn.) caterer, but serving no meals, but lunches, sandwiches, oysters, candies, creams, ices of all flavors, and Vienna Bakery delicacies. The cafe is elegantly furnished, and will prove to be very attractive to Van Ness shoppers.

A pair of properly fitted glasses will chase away that headache.

LITERARY NOTES.

A Romance by "Q."

A brave romance, nobly told, is "Sir Joseph Constantine," by A. T. Quiller-Couch. Sir Joseph is an impoverished English country gentleman who has served his country well as a diplomat at the Italian courts, but who suddenly abandons his brilliant career and retires with his son into his Cornwall estate. Sir Joseph, proud of his descent from the Byzantine emperors, comports himself like a king in exile. He learns that the deposed King of Corsica has been traveling in England and was even now in the debtor's prison at London. Thither journeys Sir Joseph, and Theodore the First, for a consideration, abdicates in favor of the young scion of the house of Constantine. But Corsica's new monarch is too busy with his studies at Oxford to bother about his Italian subjects, until one day comes a strange company of Trappist monks to Sir Joseph, bearing a message from the deposed Queen of Corsica, for whom he had had a tender regard in other years. A lady and a queen in peril? "We will invade Corsica, and at once," said Sir Joseph. Volunteers for the adventure are not many, but the following knights set out on their errand of chivalry: Sir Joseph; Prosper, his son; Billy Priske, the housekeeper; Phineas Fett, a village ne'er-do-well; Mr. Badcock, a town clerk, and an Oxford scholar.

It is the dramatic history of this gallant company, their adventures at home and abroad, and particularly in the island of Corsica, beginning with the year 1756, that is told in the memoirs of Sir Joseph Constantine.

Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; price, $1.50.

Moon-Face and Other Stories.

Jack London has selected the best of the stories he has contributed to the magazines for his new book, "Moon-Face and Other Stories." The most striking tale in the volume, the title story, appeared originally in the Argonaut. "Moon-Face" was also chosen to represent Jack London in "Argonaut Stories," the book of classic tales from these pages that gave promise of great popularity when its entire edition was consumed in the April fire.

There are two new stories in "Moon-Face," "Local Color," a clever characterization, is, we fancy, a reminiscence of the author's "Jobo" days; "Planchette," the only weak tale in the book, asks too much of the reader's credulity. "The Leopard Man's Story," with its gruesome climax; "Amateur Night," with its flavor of the old San Francisco; "The Minions of Midas," the grim story of secret assassination; "The Shadow and the Flash," the pseudo-scientific tale of invisible rivals; and "All Gold Canyon," will be remembered by many readers who will be glad to have them in book-form.

Published by the Macmillan Company, New York; $1.50.

The Cities of Northern Italy.

The late Grant Allen's last literary labor, a historical and artistic guide to Milan, Verona, Padua, Bologna, and Ravenna, was completed by his friend, George C. Williamson, and is now published in two volumes under the title, "Cities of Northern Italy." The work is intended for the traveler to whom a journey to Italy is not a mere pleasure trip, but a sincere means of culture, a pilgrimage to the greatest schoolmistress of the world, who "in painting, in architecture, in sculpture, in glass, in design, as well as in language, music, and costume, has been teaching the world ever since she had an existence." We are pleased and flattered that these scholarly English authors and travelers credit American tourists, especially, with an "honest and reverent desire to learn from the Old World whatever of value it has to teach them." Our compatriots are so often lampooned and lambasted in books of travel that it was high time for some one to remark their "rare and praiseworthy" conduct abroad!

An admirable plan is followed in "Cities of Northern Italy." The prospective traveler is reminded at the outset that the northern cities of Italy, historically considered, represent separate powers, all quite distinct from one another, and widely differing in customs, dialect, art, and government. These towns have been ruled by members of different families, who spent great sums for the erection of fine buildings and tombs, for the foundation of libraries, and the encouragement of art. So the individuality of each city is marked. The travelers' inquiry, why a town ever gathered at that particular spot is answered; then, why that town grew to social and political importance; thirdly, why and how it advanced in art and education. There is rather too much description of ecclesiastical art and architecture for a book intended for lay readers. Many beautiful photogravures illustrate the work.

Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston; $3.00.

New Publications.

A very amusing story of the trials and triumphs of a young housekeeper, "The Distractions of Martha," has been written by Marian Harland. The tragical note is supplied by Martha's experiences with the servant girl, in all her variety. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; price, $1.25.

"At the Sign of the Sphinx," by Carolyn Wells, is a second series of ingenious charades. Miss Wells's clever talent for word-juggling and jingling is given full play in these riddles. The book, however, is only for those who find pleasure in the mental gymnastics of the puzzle column of the juvenile weekly. Published by Duffield & Co., New York; $1.00.

Eva March Tappan has selected the romantic figures and incidents in our history for her new book for boys, "American Hero Stories." Beginning with Columbus and ending with Lincoln, the stories are arranged in chronological order, with a thread of continuity running through them, and the young reader is thus carried along with increasing interest. A number of illustrations from historical paintings are given. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., New York; $1.00.

Nine of Robert Louis Stevenson's essays have been selected and edited by William Lyon Phelps, Ph.D., of Yale, for use in school and college courses. Professor Phelps's notes and comments are pertinent and interesting and do not intrude on the text, so that this little volume will be welcomed by the reader who wishes a pocket edition of Stevenson's masterpieces in style. A useful bibliography and a brief biography are included. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; 75 cents net.

Edith Nicholl Ellison, whose family were neighbors of Tennyson on the Isle of Wight for many years, has written "A Child's Recollection of Tennyson." The poet's sons, Hallam and Lionel, were her constant playmates, and she recalls many charming memories of the beautiful Tennyson home at Farringford. Mrs. Tennyson's illness and the poet laureate's frequent gloomy spells did not make for merriment, but the great man could unbend at times. The rare devotion of parents and children is told with a pretty touch. Published by E. P. Dutton & Co., New York; $1.00 net.

Rev. Francis N. Peloubet's "Studies in the Book of Job" is a scholarly attempt to impress on the ordinary reader Tennyson's conviction that it is "the greatest poem in all literature." Dr. Peloubet's volume is intended for advanced classes, as well as for individual use. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $1.00.

"A Borrowed Sister," by Eliza Orme White, is a brightly written story for girls. Katherine Pyle has illustrated the tale. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., New York; $1.00.

The first volume of Dr. Charles A. Briggs's critical commentary on "The Book of Psalms" has appeared. The work is the fruit of forty years of constant study. Dr. Briggs acknowledges the invaluable services of his daughter, Emilie Grace Briggs, in the preparation of the book, and her name appears as joint author. The work is one of the scholarly International Critical Commentary Series. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $3.00.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

"Campfires in the Canadian Rockies," by William T. Hornaday, will soon come from the publishers.

A new edition with considerable new material will soon appear of "The Compromises of Life," by Colonel Henry Watterson. One of the new papers is "Go South, Young Man," which since its original delivery as a speech has become a watchword with people on the southern side of Mason and Dixon's line.

The biography of Charles Godfrey Leland ("Hans Breitmann"), from the pen of his niece, Elizabeth Robins Pennell, to be brought out soon, will be rich in literary and local reminiscences. Mr. Leland was a great traveler and spent a large part of his life in France, Germany, and England.

Fogazzaro's two novels, known in Italian under the names of "Piccolo Mondo Antico" and "Piccolo Mondo Moderno," will soon be published in translation and called in English "The Patriot" and "The Man of the World."

A very curious book is "The Seven Follies of Science," by John Phinn. It is a popular account of the most famous scientific impossibilities and the attempts which have been made to solve them. It deals with squaring a circle, the duplication of the cube, the trisection of an angle, perpetual motion, the transmutation of metals, the fixation of mercury, the universal medicine and the elixir of life. To these Mr. Phinn has added other "follies" and a "budget" of paradoxes, illusions and marvels.

Barrett Wendell's study of "The National Ideals of America" is announced for early publication.

Sir Theodore Martin, author of the "Bon Gaultier" ballads, is ninety years old, but enjoys remarkably vigorous health and takes daily rambles near his beautiful home on the outskirts of Llangollen, Wales. His intellect is as keen as ever and on Sundays he reads the lessons in church. Sir Theodore is a playgoer and a critic of contemporary verse and fiction.

A new book by H. G. Wells will be among the fall events in the book world. As indicated by the title, "In the Days of the Comet," the author has not departed from the style which made "The War of the Gods" notable. His new romance deals with the coming of Utopia.

Putnam's Monthly was first issued in 1853 and was discontinued four years later, though it had already won a reputation for literary excellence. It is now revived, and with it is incorporated The Critic. In the first number is presented the last poem of Richard Henry Stoddard, never before printed. Stoddard was connected with the magazine in the early days, and contributed much verse to its pages.

Most people are of the opinion that English authors in the old days received small, if any, pecuniary returns for their works. It is a matter of interest, though of little significance under the changed conditions, to know that Charles Dickens received from Harper's $1000 for "A Tale of Two Cities," $1250 for "Great Expectations" and $1000 for "Our Mutual Friend." Thackeray was paid $480 for "The Virginians," Trollope received $700 for "Sir Henry Hotspur," and George Eliot received $1200 for "Middlemarch," and for "Daniel Deronda" $1700. When Macaulay's "Life and Letters" was published in 1876 $1000 was paid for the use of advance sheets for the American edition.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Talleyrand at his dinner parties in serving guests his manners to his guests' rank this way: To a prince of royal blood: "May I have the honor of offering your royal highness a little beef?" To a duke: "Monseigneur, permit me to offer you some beef?" To a marquis: "Marquis, may I cut you a little beef?" To a viscount: "Viscount, have some beef?" To a baron: "Baron, some beef?" To an untitled gentleman: "Some beef?" To his secretary: "Beef?" When there was present a person even inferior to the secretary, to him Talleyrand did not say much as a word. He simply looked at the man, and pointed the carving knife at the beef interrogatively.

Henry Ward Beecher once said, apropos of a letter-writer: "I receive hundreds a month, but one which came the other day beat anything I had ever read before. The application was from a woman, and it ran something like this: 'Please send me fifty dollars by return of post, otherwise I shall be forced to part with my honor.' I just wrote back: 'My Dear Madam—I am in receipt of your letter of the 15th inst., and in reply would state that if you can't put a greater value on your honor than fifty dollars it doesn't seem to me to be of much consequence whether you part with it or not.'"

Henry Watterson says that the oddest and most humorous transposition of the types that ever came within his observation was in a New York paper which used to print its shipping news on the same page with the obituaries. One morning a long list of respectable names were set forth under the marine head, 'Passed Through the Gate Yesterday.'"

Pessimists I will not endure," the Kaiser has said in Breslau. "Let him who is not suited to seek, if he will, a better country." Perhaps the Kaiser has recently seen (says the New York Evening Post) Alexander Moskowski's bitter little story of the man who fell from the moon, and, after traveling all over the world in search of the best country, returned to Germany for permanent residence. When asked why, he replied: "My reasons are quite simple. I have observed in various countries how the state's money is thrown away and what a part protection, corruption, dissipation, folly, and waste have each played in its expenditure. The extreme of each of these facts I found in Germany. So I said to myself, 'A nation which can stand all that without jumping the track must be the best.' Therefore I want to come a German."

A Neapolitan widow, whose husband had been dead some years, was persuaded to go to a spiritualists' seance, and there the spirit of her dead husband appeared and spoke with her. "My dear Agostino," said the widow to the spirit, "are you happy now?" "I am very happy," Agostino answered. "Happier than you were, on earth with me?" said the widow. "Yes," replied the shade; "I am far, far happier now than I was on earth with you."

The widow was silent a moment. Then she said: "Tell me, Agostino; what is it like in heaven?" "Heaven?" said Agostino. "I am not in heaven."

Attorney John M. Thurston, of Nebraska who was representing the defense in a recent trial in one of the State courts, arose the other day to reply to arguments of counsel for the government on a point of law. In deliberate and impressive manner the attorney began a forceful presentation to the court. Before he had fairly launched his counter attack, however, he was interrupted by the presiding justice, who said that he was about to decide the case in favor of Senator Thurston. "In that case," remarked Mr. Thurston, resuming his seat at once, "I will make no appeal to the court for fear of changing your opinion."

Travelers' tales which often add charm to the conversation of an agreeable person frequently become a bore more tiresome than ever, a fact that was amusingly illustrated by an occurrence in a Baltimore clubhouse not long ago. "Where I stood, gentlemen," the long-winded narrator was saying, after droning on for an hour with reference to his trip to Switzerland—"there I stood, with the abyss yawning in front of me." "ardon me," hastily interjected one of the unfortunate men who had been obliged to listen to the story, "but was that abyss yawning before you got there?"

W. H. Avery and Henry J. Crocker have recently returned from a trip to Japan, and they vie with each other telling stories on the other man (says the San Francisco Chronicle).

Avery has a good one on Crocker. They were going along one of the streets in Yokobama, and noticed straw in the streets. Crocker, who is a student of the customs of the country in which he traveled, had ascertained that straw is scattered on the street in case of sickness to diminish the noise.

"Mister," said a small tourist, who had wandered away from mother, "what's this hay doing out here?"

"My son," said Crocker with a smile, "the stork has just brought a baby to the woman who lives here."

The small one surveyed Crocker with wide eyes and said: "Gee, it must have come well packed."

Capt. Spencer of the Salvation Army, asked a cockney convict what he did for a living when he left prison. "Well, in spring I does a bit o' pea-picking, and in the autumn I does a bit o' 'op picking." "Yes," said the captain, "and what do you do in the winter?" "Well, mister, I may as well be honest with yer. In the winter I does a bit o' pocket picking!" Capt. Spencer next asked, "And what happens then?" The convict replied, "Why, I comes 'ere to prison and does a bit o' oakum-picking!"

A silly little lady had a husband, a lover of gaiety, who was inclined to neglect his wife. This lady, while spending the winter in Devonshire, said one day at the country postoffice:

"Dear me, what a silly mistake you postoffice people have made."

"How, madam?" asked the clerk.

"Why," she explained, with a titter, "here I have just gotten a letter from my husband, who is working hard in London, and the envelope is postmarked Monte Carlo."

A schoolteacher says this sweeping answer was made by a pupil in a history lesson:

"How many wars," she asked this pupil, "did England fight with Spain?"

"Six," the pupil answered.

"Six," said the teacher. "Enumerate them, please."

"One, two, three, four, five, six," said the little girl.

The bill of $25,000 that Dr. Frank Billings presented to the Marshall Field estate for seven days' treatment of the dead millionaire comes to more than $3,500 a day. At that rate Dr. Billings' income would be a million and a quarter a year.

A patient of a certain famous eye specialist, coming to pay his bill, growled.

"Doctor, it seems to me that $500 is a big charge for that operation of mine. It didn't take you over half a minute."

"My dear sir," the other answered, "in learning to perform that operation in half a minute I have spoiled over eleven pecks of such eyes as yours."

There was a poor lady who hastened to the nursery, saying to her little daughter:

"Minnie, what do you mean by shouting and screaming? Play quietly, like Tommy. See, he doesn't make a sound."

"Of course he doesn't," said the little girl. "That is our game. He is papa coming home late, and I am you."

A police captain was about to raid a gambling den. At midnight, taking his place at the head of a squad of stalwart men, he looked them over closely, and then said to his lieutenant: "Is everything ready for this raid?" "Yes, sir," replied the lieutenant, saluting. "Our arms are in first-rate order, here are the reporters, there are the flashlight camera men, and I notified the proprietor of the place this afternoon."

On a Western railroad there is a brakeman who has lost the forefinger of his right hand. The wonderful works of nature along the road keep the brakeman busy answering the passengers' questions.

One day, after the brakeman had been pointing out the window and explaining the scenery, one of the passengers whispered to the conductor, "Conductor, can you tell me how that brakeman lost his finger? He seems to be a very nice fellow. It seems a pity he should be crippled."

"That's just it, ma'am. He is a good fellow,

He is so obliging that he just wore his finger off pointing out the scenery along the line."

One night Paganini was going to the Paris Opera House, where he was to astonish everybody by playing on one string. Being late he took a cab, and when he arrived at his destination the cabby wanted 10 francs. "What," he exclaimed, "you are crazy; I have only had you five minutes." "I know it is much," said the other, "but for you who make a fortune by playing on one string it must be 10 francs." "Well," said Paganini, handing him the right fare, "when you can make your cab go on one wheel come to me and I will give you 10 francs."

Crossing from Folkestone to Boulogne on a sea that was more rough than pleasant were two well-known members of the legal profession, a judge and a barrister. The latter was suffering silently but sorely when the judge happened to drop against him as he leaned disconsolately over the taffrail.

"H'm. You don't seem quite at home here," remarked his lordship. "Can I do anything for you?"

"Yes," gasped the seasick lawyer, "I wish you would overrule this motion."

A Washington dispatch says that marines have been deserting from the barracks on Mare Island, California, at a rate which made it necessary for Brigadier-General G. F. Elliott commanding the marine corps, to detail a second lieutenant and several experienced enlisted men as a squad whose sole duty it is to search San Francisco for deserters from the marine corps. The marines are said to have deserted to earn high wages in the work of cleaning up and rebuilding in the burned district, and it is reported that the city police render no assistance in the work of arresting the deserters.

PERSONAL

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

It is announced that the wedding of Miss Abba Church and Mr. Edgar Rickard will take place in Oakland on Wednesday, October 24th. Miss Elizabeth McNear, the bride's cousin, will be the maid of honor, and Mr. Stanley Easton the best man.

It is announced that the marriage of Mrs. Elue Gardiner Hodgson and Mr. Walter Quick will be celebrated Wednesday, October 24th, at the home of the bride's parents, Major and Mrs. Bigelow, in Minneapolis, Minnesota. Mr. Quick and his bride will live in this city.

The wedding of Miss Mabel Stockton of San Diego to Lieutenant Ernest F. Eckhardt, U. S. N., took place on September 19th in St. Margaret's Church, Washington, D. C. Mrs. Thomas Hagner, wife of Paymaster Hagner, U. S. N., was matron of honor, and Dr. John Flint, U. S. N., the best man. Lieutenant and Mrs. Eckhardt will reside temporarily at Norfolk, Virginia.

The wedding of Miss Charlotte Williams, daughter of Mr. James Williams, of Portland, to Mr. Reginald Norris, took place at Martinez on Tuesday afternoon of last week. The ceremony was performed by the Rev. Mr. Gough of the Methodist Church. Mr. and Mrs. Norris are making their home in this city.

The marriage of Miss Evelyn Ratcliff, daughter of the Rev. Walter Ratcliff, to Dr. William F. Bade, took place on Wednesday evening of last week, at St. Mark's Church, Berkeley. The ceremony was performed by the bride's father, assisted by the Rev. E. L. Parsons, rector of St. Mark's, and the Rev. J. K. McLean. Miss Ethel Ratcliff was the maid of honor and Mr. Duncan McDuffie was the best man.

Mrs. J. Downey Harvey was the hostess at a luncheon on Tuesday of last week at her home on Webster street in honor of Mrs. William H. Younger, at which fifteen guests were present.

The San Rafael Improvement Club, which numbers among its members, Mrs. John F. Boyd, Mrs. George Davis Boyd, Mrs. Arthur W. Foster, Mrs. Frank Johnson, Mrs. Alexander Lilley, Mrs. Vincent Neale, and Mrs. George M. Pinckard, gave a fancy fair and garden party in the Coleman tract last Saturday afternoon and evening. There were a number of booths with attendants in costume, a vaudeville performance every hour during the afternoon and evening and music all the time. Among those who assisted the club were Miss Maye Colburn, Miss Helen De Young, Miss Cora Smedberg and Miss Von Schroeder.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a resume of movements to and from this city and Coast and of the whereabouts of absent Californians.

Mrs. W. Mayo Newhall, Miss Margaret Newhall, Miss Marion Newhall and Miss Elizabeth Newhall, who will spend the year abroad, were, when last heard from, in England.

Mr. and Mrs. John Hays Hammond have given up their plans of going abroad this fall and are still at their country place, at Gloucester, Massachusetts.

Mrs. Frederick Sharon went down on Friday of last week to Del Monte for a brief stay.

Mrs. N. L. Nokes, her daughter, Mrs. John Burke Murphy, and little Miss Virginia Murphy, will leave about October 15th for Fort Monroe, Virginia, where Lieutenant Murphy, U. S. A., is taking a course in the Artillery School.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Kohl, after a short stay in town, returned to their Tahoe villa on Saturday last.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles H. Spear, of Berkeley, who have been spending a few days at Lake Tahoe, have returned.

Mrs. A. J. Bryant is the guest of Mrs. Emma Butler at the latter's home in Santa Barbara.

Mrs. James Cunningham and Miss Sara Cunningham, who have spent several weeks here this summer, left last week for Lake Geneva, Wisconsin, where they are to remain until the late fall.

Mr. Charles Dilke, of England, has been spending a brief time as the guest of Mr. and Mrs. William Brown at their country place at Grass Valley.

Mrs. William Geer Hitchcock and her family arrived recently from New York and will spend the winter at San Mateo as the guest of her brother, Mr. Frank Drum, who has taken the Bower place there.

Mrs. Charles Lyman and her son will arrive from Europe and will join Captain Lyman and Mrs. Lyman's mother, Mrs. Jeremiah Clarke, who are now making their home in Berkeley.

Mrs. Charles M. Keeney, accompanied by her daughter, Miss Innes Keeney, and by Miss Augusta Foute, left last week, where Miss Keeney and Miss Foute will enter Mrs. Scoville's school for a year before coming out.

Mrs. Ynez Shorth White went down early in the week to Fresno, where she will be the guest of friends.

Miss Blanche Bigelow of Boston, who has been visiting her uncle and aunt, Admiral and Mrs. Joseph F. Trille, at their cottage at Monterey, has returned to her Eastern home.

Mrs. Arthur F. Allen has arrived from Manila and was the guest of Mr. Allen's mother, Mrs. I. P. Allen, here, leaving last week, however, for a visit to her parents in Chicago.

Mr. and Mrs. Sterling Postley, who are now in Paris, after a stay in Geneva, expect to return to San Francisco this fall.

Miss Jane Rawlings of Oakland has been spending a fortnight at the Rawlings country home near Los Gatos.

Mr. Paul Jones has returned from a brief Eastern trip.

Mrs. Obed Harvey and Miss Genevieve Harvey, of Galt, have recently spent several days in San Francisco.

Mr. and Mrs. Sylvanus Cobb Farnham (formerly Miss Evelyn Clifford) have been spending their honeymoon at Del Monte.

Miss Molly Dutton has returned from a visit to friends in San Luis Obispo.

Mr. Edward Greer of St. Louis has been spending several weeks here as the guest of his brother and sister-in-law, Mr. and Mrs. Robert Greer.

Mr. and Mrs. William Bissell closed their chalet on Lake Tahoe on Saturday last and returned to San Francisco the following day.

Mrs. Charles S. Fee, with her son and daughters, who have been sojourning at Tahoe Tavern for two weeks, returned last Saturday.

Mrs. W. C. Peyton, who has been visiting in Delaware through the summer, has returned to San Francisco.

General Shafter has come from his home near Bakersfield and is spending a few days in town.

Mr. and Mrs. Robert Greer will close their Sausalito home this week and will come to town to remain until January, at the home of Dr. and Mrs. Ellinwood on Pacific avenue.

Mr. Ernest Herzberg of London, the brother-in-law of Mrs. Mack, of this city, is registered at the St. Francis.

Among those who arrived at the Hotel del Coronado from San Francisco the past week were: Mr. and Mrs. Harry J. Lask, Mr. and Mrs. J. A. White, Mr. and Mrs. A. H. Moffitt, Mr. and Mrs. C. H. Schieck, Miss S. B. Jenkins, Miss Edith Duesberg, Mr. William F. Kett and Mr. W. C. McClosky.

Among the arrivals at Byron Hot Springs for the past week were: Mrs. Louie Taussig accompanied by her nephew, Dr. E. Taussig of Rome; Dr. J. F. Summers, Mr. Byron Jackson, Byron Jackson, Jr., Dr. Clarence L. Heller, Dr. A. O. Lindstrom, Miss Lindstrom, Mr. and Mrs. F. J. Tyson and family, Mr. and Mrs. W. G. Hopkins, Dr. and Mrs. C. G. Kenyon and Dr. and Mrs. J. Wallace DeWitt.

Large contractors say there is a decided increase of excavating and cleaning up in the old business district of the city. They now have the facilities for the removing of 5,000 cubic yards a day. The total outgo of debris up to this time has not exceeded 625,000 cubic yards, which is considerably less than one-tenth of the estimated total amount of debris to be removed. The price charged for hauling away common debris at the present time is usually about $2.25 a wagon load, but sometimes reaches $3 a load. Contractors load scows daily and the scows are towed to the dumping grounds every night. The Secretary of War has granted five permits to dump debris into the bay. But only in specified areas near the entrance. The specific area is the southeast corner of a circle drawn around the Mile Rock lighthouse. The penalty for dumping anywhere else is a fine of $2,500 and imprisonment from two to five years.

The officials of the United Railroads have been trying for some time to devise a way to get the cars over the steep hills of the city by means of electricity, and have at last given the idea up, and have decided to go back to the cable cars on the worst hills. The lines that will be used for cable cars are in fair condition, and will not be rehabilitated, but will be put in commission with the necessary repairs, and the old cable cars will again come into service.

A handsome new apartment house has been completed at the corner of Octavia street and Hickory avenue, the property of Dr. Daniel T. Callahan of this city, and it has been built entirely by day's labor since the fire. The house is a three-story frame building and contains twenty-four housekeeping apartments of three and four rooms and bath. The building cost $35,000, exceeding the architects' estimates, made before April 18th, by $10,000.

James J. Hill, the railroad magnate of the Northwest, has three sons in the same business. James N., the eldest is vice-president of the Northern Pacific; Louis W. is first vice-president of the Great Northern, and Walter H., is right-of-way agent for a new line between Sioux City and Omaha. It is generally understood that Louis will be his father's successor in the railroad world.

The home of Lieutenant Claude Brigham, U. S. A., and Mrs. Brigham (nee Dorr) has been brightened by the advent of a daughter.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Alfred Poett, at Santa Barbara, has been brightened by the advent of a son.

The Anglo-Californian Bank, Ltd. has erected a building at 1020 Van Ness Avenue to be devoted exclusively to its own occupancy. In addition to the banking department they have opened safe deposit vaults with boxes from $4.00 a year up, and special storage rooms for trunks, books, etc. This uptown branch of the Anglo-Californian Bank is established to meet the needs of its depositors, who are now largely located on Van Ness Avenue and westward.

ROYAL Baking Powder

ABSOLUTELY PURE

Healthful cream of tartar, derived solely from grapes, refined to absolute purity, is the active principle of every pound of Royal Baking Powder.

Hence it is that Royal Baking Powder renders the food remarkable both for its fine flavor and healthfulness.

No alum, no phosphate—which are the principal elements of the so-called cheap baking powders and which are derived from bones, rock and sulphuric acid.

Captain Robert L. Hamilton, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., has been ordered to report to Brigadier-General Theodore J. Wint, U. S. A., president of an army retiring board, at Omaha, Nebraska, for re-examination by that board. Extension of leave for two months on account of sickness has been granted Captain Hamilton.

Captain Frederick E. Johnston, Paymaster, U. S. A., has been ordered to report to the chief paymaster of the Department of Luzon for duty, with station at Manila.

Captain Lawrence D. Cabell, U. S. A., assistant to the superintendent of transport service in that port, has been ordered to join the expedition to Cuba.

Paymaster Gray Skipwith, U. S. N., who is well known on this coast, has been detached from the naval training station, Newport, Rhode Island, and ordered to the Milwaukee when that vessel is placed in commission.

Lieutenant Joseph W. Beacham, Jr., Signal Corps, U. S. A., Benicia Barracks, has been granted leave of absence for one month, to take effect about October 15th, with permission to apply for one month's extension.

Lieutenant Edmund L. Bull, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., Fort McDowell, is detailed for duty in connection with "The Progressive Military Map of the United States," and is ordered to proceed to Yuma, Arizona, relieving Lieutenant Solomon B. West, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., who will return to his station at Fort McDowell.

Contract Surgeon Rodney D. Smith, U. S. A., now in Oakland, has been ordered to report to the chief surgeon of the department for duty in his office until the sailing of the next transport for Manila.

Company B, Hospital Corps, U. S. A., commanded by Captain A. E. Truby, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., assisted by Captain R. W. Patterson, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., left on Monday morning last for Newport News, Virginia, en route to Havana, Cuba, in response to orders received on the Saturday evening before.

Mrs. Eliza Baker Grayson, wife of George W. Grayson, the pioneer mining and cattle man died September 26, after a month's illness, at the residence of Senator W. C. Ralston, her son-in-law, at Fruitvale. Mrs. Grayson crossed the plains from Missouri with her husband in 1857. They settled in Tehama County, where she shared in the vicissitudes of the early days. In 1869 the family came to Oakland. The Graysons went to San Francisco two years ago, but after the fire made their home with the Ralstons. Mrs. Grayson was 70 years old, a native of Kentucky. There survive her husband and two daughters, Mrs. H. G. Hinckley and Mrs. W. C. Ralston.

Charles S. Aiken has resigned the editorship of the Sunset Magazine to assume a position with "Ridgways," the new venture of Everybody's Magazine. "Ridgways" will be a weekly review and will be published simultaneously in twelve cities of this country. Mr. Aiken held the editorship of Sunset for six years. It is said that he will be succeeded by Mrs. Edward Emerson, the wife of Colonel Edward Emerson, the Rough Rider and war correspondent. As Miss Maizie Griswold, Mrs. Emerson has written much for local magazines. She has been a generous contributor to Sunset for four years.

Arrangements have been made for the purchase of the Mrs. E. B. Crocker mansion in Los Angeles, by the local lodge of Elks. The price paid for the building and lot was $65,000, and the Elks will spend another $35,000 in fixtures, furniture and general renovation of the building. The local lodge entertains more visitors than any other lodge in the country.

Many of the office-holders of the city were at the ferry station Monday to say goodbye to Mayor Eugene Schmitz and Mrs. Schmitz, who were starting for New York and Europe, to be absent two months. Supervisor James Gallagher will be Acting Mayor for the next sixty days.

Judge W. W. Morrow, of the United States Circuit Court, has been compelled to take a vacation on account of the serious condition of his eyes. His physician says that three months of complete rest will be required to restore good sight to the affected eye.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Lawyer—"Well, what was done in the interim?" Witness—"I don't know, sir. I didn't go into the interim. I stayed in the anteroom."—Puck.

Tommy—"Pop, does a diplomat have to know much?" Tommy's Pop—"Well, he has to know enough not to know too much."—Philadelphia Record.

"Who'd have thought we'd live to see our boy in the Legislature?" said the old man. "Nobody," said the old lady, "but—the Lord's will be done!"—Atlanta Constitution.

Kate—"Is it true that Grace and Jack had a quarrel last night?" Nell—"No, a falling out. The hammock rope broke and let them down together."—Somerville Journal.

Little Elmer (who has an inquiring mind)—"Papa, what is meant by 'honor among thieves?'" Professor Broadhead—"Oh, just about the same as 'senatorial courtesy,' my son."—Puck.

New Office Boy—"Your wife wants you at the 'phone, sir." Mr. Mermordub—"Boy, how many times must I tell you to get the name and number of the person who calls up?"—Puck.

"My wife was arrested yesterday." "You surprise me. What was the trouble?" "She got off a trolley car the right way and a policeman thought she was a man in disguise."—Puck.

"You haven't any confidence in either candidate?" "On the contrary, I have confidence in both. I believe all the bad things they say about each other are absolutely true."—Washington Star.

A tourist who returned this week from Colorado was asked if the outing was expensive. The tourist replied: "I have lost everything but honor, and I believe even that is plugged."—Kansas City Star.

Fisherman (beginner)—"Don't you think, Peter, I've improved a good deal since I began?" Peter (anxious to pay a compliment)—"You have, sorr. But sure it was aisy for you to improve, sorr!"—Punch.

"By the way, sir," asked the waiter, "how would you like to have your steak?" "Very much, indeed," replied the mild man, who had been patiently waiting for twenty minutes.—Philadelphia Press.

"Your friend Bardlet left some verses with me to-day that were quite amusing," said the editor. "Indeed!" replied Dubbley: "I didn't think he was a humorous poet." "Neither does he."—Philadelphia Press.

The Kentucky man who reported having seen a whistling rat with yellow body and blue feet will greatly relieve the feelings of a number of men if he will state whether it also had a green tail.—Washington Post.

"Why is a great man more appreciated after he is dead?" "He is not more appreciated," answered Senator Sorghum. "He is more freely complimented because he is less feared by envious rivals."—Washington Star.

Sunday School Teacher—"What is conscience?" A dead silence. Sunday School Teacher—"What do we call the thing that tells us when we do wrong?" Little Ethel—"Grandma."—Philadelphia Record.

Easy on the Hammock—Mamma—"I hope you were not sitting in the hammock with Jack last night, Lulu?" Lulu—"No, mamma. I didn't think it was strong enough for both of us to sit in. Jack sat in the hammock, and I sat in Jack's lap."—Yonkers Statesman.

Mrs. Housekeep—"If you do a little work for me now, I'll give you a good dinner after a while." Weary Willie—"You'll git off cheaper, lady, if ye gimme de dinner now an' furgit de work. Work always gives me a fierce appetite."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Tourist—"Wasn't there a great battle fought about here?" Village dame—"Ah, I do mind it when I were a gell, I do. They was— Tourist—"But, my good woman, that was nearly six hundred years ago!" Village dame (unabashed)—"Dear, dear! How time do fly!"—Pur. h.

Reporter—"Senator, if it isn't a secret, I should like to know something about the speech you are going to make tomorrow. How will you stand on government ownership?" Statesman—"Briefly, but with emphasis, young man. I shall jump on it with both feet."—Chicago Tribune.

Tommy had been sent to the attic as a punishment for misconduct. After the lapse of two or three hours his mother went up and tapped at the door. "Tommy, dear," she said, "your papa says you may come down now if you will apologize and promise to behave better." "You tell paw," answered a muffled voice on the inside, "there ain't nothing to arbitrate."—Chicago Tribune.

Sunday School Teacher—"Who was it that the whale swallowed?" Tommy—"Why-er-er—" Sunday School Teacher—"Come, now, that's an easy question." Tommy—"Oh, it ain't the question that bothers me, but the answer."—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

Chinese Labor on the Canal.

On the labor question the Canal Commission has boxed itself into a blind alley. It threatens now to be blocked at both ends. There is apparently no way out. The Canal Commission has announced that labor from the United States will not be used; that the eight-hour law will not be enforced; that Jamaican labor can not be made feasible, and that adequate labor from other parts of the Occidental world can not be procured. The Canal Commission has advertised for bids to furnish Chinese coolies in blocks of thousands and has practically announced to the world that the canal can not be built except by Chinese labor.

It would have been far wiser for the Canal Commission before so far committing itself, to be sure that it would be permitted to procure the Chinese labor. It would have been far wiser first to consult Peking. The Chinese government has practically refused to allow any coolies to leave China until it is thoroughly informed as to the conditions of their transportation, their employment, the wages they are to be paid, the hours they are to be worked, the manner in which they are to be fed and lodged, the provision for their medical attendance, the temporary burial and return to China of the dead, and a host of other conditions, questions concerning which it will be extremely embarrassing for the Canal Commission to answer. It is easy to see the ulterior motive. The Chinese government is endeavoring to force our government to modify the exclusion laws. Rigid exclusion, no coolies; modified exclusion, some coolies; removal of exclusion, unlimited coolies. The Chinese diplomats are placing our government in a hole. In one part of this country we rigidly exclude Chinese workers from United States territory; in another part we find their presence absolutely essential on United States territory for the completion of a great public work. It will be interesting to see how the Administration and the Canal Commission get out of the impasse into which the Asiatic diplomats have led them.

Organized Labor and Candidate Gillett.

The Oakland Tribune rebukes the Argonaut for its attitude toward Samuel Gompers. The Tribune fears the Argonaut will "array organized labor against the Republican ticket." The Tribune is mistaken. It is not the Argonaut, but Gompers, who is trying to array organized labor against the Republican ticket. The way to stop him is not by turning the other cheek to be smitten, but by hitting him good and hard on the jaw.

Of course, we speak metaphorically. Not for worlds would we approve a breach of the peace upon the person of the august Gompers.

Correspondingly, let not the Tribune misunderstand us, if, in the ardor of our defense, we shall seem unduly heated in our tone toward our contemporary. We realize fully that the Tribune entertains friendly, if anxious, sentiments toward the Argonaut, and that its monitor tone means merely neighborly concern over the antics of a well-meaning but feather-headed contemporary which has got off the Republican reservation, has put on vermilion war-paint, and is ghost-dancing all by itself.

Well, we admit it. The Argonaut does not always adhere to the strict text of the Republican campaign book. Then, again, it usually says what it thinks. We are Republican, but we are independent Republican, and don't you forget it. There are no strings on the Argonaut. We report to no State Central Committee, to no Campaign Committee, to no machine. We have taken no retainer from anybody, and we intend to indulge in the luxury of saying exactly what we think. Therefore, the party nominee, Mr. Gillett, the party's campaign committee, and "the machine" are not responsible for what we say. And if any of the foregoing consider it unwise to resent the insolent dictation of Gompers in ordering the workmen of California to vote against Gillett, they are at perfect liberty to do so. They can eat all of the crow they like, fried, boiled, baked, plain, or with trimmings. As for us, we do not like crow.

Only once in its lifetime did the Argonaut have any dealings with the Republican Campaign Committee which were based on money. We say "based on money," for they concerned the silver question, but the only money put up we paid ourselves. At the time the Argonaut was twenty years of age. Now it is thirty. It is older and wiser, and will not repeat its experience. The incident took place at the time when William McKinley was the nominee for President, running on a gold standard platform. Yet when he was nominated all California was for free silver. Every Republican politician in the State was shouting "sixteen to one," when not one in sixteen of them knew what it meant. But for that matter, the head of the ticket had been so recently converted from the free-silver heresy that the California politicians might readily be pardoned for not knowing he had flopped.

The Argonaut did not believe in the "sixteen to one" silver folly and said so. It was engaged, in its small way, in endeavoring to convince California, a gold State, that it was foolish to follow this lead of Nevada and other silver States—foolish for practical reasons, if not for higher ones. A committee of Eastern Congressmen—who were visiting California, accredited from the party wise men in the East—suggested that the Argonaut should start a systematic State propaganda in favor of the gold standard, saying that they would see that the California Campaign Committee would pay the cost of printing. We were weak enough to accept this suggestion. Now we are wiser. We would not do it again. The Argonaut took up the task. We printed and circulated many thousands of sound-money booklets and other gold-standard literature to the voters of California. We covered the ground as thoroughly as we could with our resources. It may not be egotistic to say that we think we did some little toward stamping out the silver heresy which then completely pervaded this golden State.

This was mainly preliminary work. It was early in the campaign when the Eastern committee of which we speak had come to spy out the land. At the expiration of a few weeks we sent in to the State Campaign Committee a memorandum of our outlay for actual cost of paper and printing. Fools and blind! So little had we learned of "practical politics" in our peaceful life of twenty years that we did not know to what danger we exposed ourselves. We did not then know the graft and chicane which lurk around political headquarters. Not only were we not reimbursed for cash outlay, but we were informed by blustering red-nosed politicians that the bill was a "hold-up." Probably they pocketed the money themselves.

The Argonaut said nothing and withdrew its bill. It took great pleasure, however, in at once organizing a Non-Partisan Sound Money League. It takes still more pleasure in saying that nine-tenths of the money raised that year to elect McKinley did not go through the hands or stick to the fingers of the greedy gang that was then hanging round the Republican headquarters.

But it was a lesson in "practical politics," our first and our last. Therefore it is that we say the Argonaut has no strings on it. Therefore it is that we say we are free to express ourselves as we please. As in past years we have expressed ourselves freely on many burning questions that have terrified the campaign committees, so this year we shall express ourselves as we please on the question of labor union threats. If the Argonaut were in close touch with the State Central Committee, or "the machine," or "the railroad," we would never dare to talk this way. We would be scared and choked into silence. But as the Argonaut is entirely free, we propose to indulge in the luxury of talking about these two-edged issues in this campaign in our own way.

Our friend, the Oakland Tribune, says that the Argonaut is "trying to make this campaign a class fight." We do not think so. The fight is between the Democratic and the Republican parties—and some side shows, but we won't count them. Now there are Republican farmers and Democratic farmers; there are Republican mechanics and Democratic mechanics; there are Republican millionaires and Democratic millionaires. But there is no Republican "class" and no Democratic "class"—there are no class distinctions as between these two great parties. Along comes Gompers. He tells the workmen that certain Congressmen refuse to pass certain laws which he, Gompers, claims are "necessary to labor." In short, he demands special laws for labor. These laws which Gompers demands can be applied only to members of labor unions, and to no other class of workmen, and to no other class of American citizens at all. Therefore it is not the Argonaut that is making this a class fight. It is Gompers.

The Tribune says that the Argonaut "will array organized labor against the Republican party." Again we deny our friend's accusation. It is the labor leaders and not the labor union members, that we are arraying against the Republican ticket. There is a great difference. In the recent fight made against Littlefield in Maine, the Tribune must have observed that Gompers failed to accomplish his object. Littlefield's majority was reduced, but not by Gompers, for the other Republican Congressmen, against whom Gompers waged no fight, polled the same reduced vote as Littlefield. It was the stringent Sturgis law strengthening the Prohibition issue that lowered the Republican plurality in Maine. The fight of "organized labor" against the Republican candidates consists of stump speeches and hot air—the votes don't materialize. It is evident that it is the labor leaders whom Gompers is arraying against the Republican ticket, and not the rank and file of the labor union men. And if Gompers continues to issue orders to labor union men in California to boycott James N. Gillett, and if all the Republican press like the Argonaut were to denounce him for doing so, it is our belief that the free American workmen in the labor unions, whether Republican or Democratic, would revolt from this insufferable dictation of this foreign labor leader. The foreign labor union men will very likely follow their foreign leaders, take orders, and vote against Gillett.

The Tribune says that Gompers "has the right to express his opinion of any candidate, and nothing is gained by disputing this right." The Argonaut has not disputed this right. He has a perfect right to his opinion, but he has no right to drag into a clear-cut political issue between two American political parties a purely class distinction like a labor union boycott. He has no right to issue orders to American workmen to boycott the candidates of the Republican party, and he has no right to assess labor unions for funds to be used to defeat Republican candidates. Gompers ordered a campaign subscription to be raised by the labor unions under the American Federation of Labor. He levied on Chicago alone for a quarter of a million. This money was intended to defeat Congressman Cannon, Congressman Sherman, Congressman Gillett, and numerous other Republican Congressmen. Does the Tribune believe there are no Republican workmen in the labor unions? That would be incredible. Yet Gompers would take the money of the labor unions—including the money of the Republican members of these unions—and use it to compass the defeat of Republican candidates like Gillett. Does the Tribune believe such conduct to be right? Or is it wrong? And if it is wrong, is the Argonaut wrong for saying so? This is exactly what was done by the corrupt directors of the New York and Mutual Life Insurance Companies when they took the money of their policy-holders, Republicans as well as Democrats, and donated it to the Republican campaign fund. These crooked directors were unanimously condemned by the American people. In what did their action differ in the slightest degree from that of Gompers when he takes the money of Republican working men and uses it to defeat Republican candidates?

The Tribune says: "The Republican party is the friend, not the enemy, of the laboring man." Very true, and under its administration of this country's affairs, the laboring man has enjoyed material conditions and wages unknown in the history of the world. It is Gompers and his kind who are the enemies of the laboring man, when he urges them to attack and to boycott Republican candidates.

The Tribune further says: "It is not the true policy of any of Mr. Gillett's friends to place him in a false position by making appeals which can be logically construed as hostile to the interests and aims of the working class." Hostility to class legislation is not hostility to the interests of labor. The Argonaut is opposed to Gompers's anti-injunction bill, which is a measure intended to give labor unions an opportunity to attack persons and destroy property with impunity. So is the Constitution of the United States opposed to it, for Gompers's bill makes one kind of law for labor litigation and another kind of law for all other kinds of litigation. Opposing such class legislation as that does not mean that the Argonaut is hostile to the interests of labor. We are glad that Mr. Gillett opposed such an un-American bill, and we hope that all honest men will vote for him because he did so, regardless whether they work with their brains or their hands.

But if this naturalized foreign labor leader, from a distance of three thousand miles, shall issue orders to the workmen of California to boycott Gillett, and if these orders shall be so slavishly obeyed that Gillett is defeated, at least his defeat will be an honorable one. He will have refused to wear the Gompers collar; he will have spurned the Gompers mandate.

At least we hope he will.

Whoso casts aside his shield that he may flee the more lightly from the battlefield, returns perhaps with safety, but not with honor. Whoso falls in the forefront of battle, yet loses not his shield. For his comrades bear thence his body on his shield—gashed, perhaps—stark, and bloody, and grim, yet not dishonored. So therefore spoke the Spartan mother: "Go forth, my son, go forth, and return with your shield or upon it!"

And so we say, Go forth, Gillett! Your shield is Honor. You at least have not yet parleyed or paltered with the enemy when he threatened, wheedled, or cajoled. Your shield is bright and stainless; your courage high; behind you sounds the steady tramp of marching legions. Heed not the whispers of false counselors. He who tries to make friends of the enemy makes enemies of his friends. Remember that battles are won by fighting. Go forth to battle, then, and fight. And fight so that you may return bearing your shield or upon it.

International Motor Car Races.

On October 4th the newspapers throughout the United States printed a dispatch from Paris stating that "The French automobile manufacturers are seriously alarmed over the invasion of their field by American automobile manufacturers. Not only have Americans ceased to purchase French cars, but other Europeans in France are purchasing American-made cars. This shows the rapid strides made by the American automobile manufacturers."

Two days after the publication of this dispatch the International Automobile Road Race for the W. K. Vanderbilt cup took place over the Long Island turnpikes, about twenty miles from New York City. Fresh from reading the dispatches about the conquering march of the American automobile manufacturers through Europe, we naturally expected to see an American car head the procession on Long Island. It is true that at the last international automobile race no American car was entered, and that at the preceding ones no American car finished. Still, considering the "great strides of the American automobile manufacturers," we had hopes. But how great was our disappointment on October 6th to read that the winner was Wagner in a French car, the second was Lancia in an Italian car, the third was Duray in a French car, the fourth was Clement in a French car, and the fifth was Jenatz in a German car. Among the cars which "also ran" was an American automobile which was withdrawn in the ninth round.

The distance was 297.1 miles, which Wagner, the driver of the winning Darracq car, made in 291 minutes, 10 2-5 seconds, more than a mile a minute for the entire distance.

A vast amount of explaining has broken out among the American automobile men. They say that "Americans are comparative novices at the racing game." Why are they? The International Cup Races have been open to them as to the rest of the world. They also say: "The American manufacturers of automobiles have been so busy making machines to sell that they have given little attention to racing." This is absurd; the amount of advertising from winning a great race is worth hundreds of thousands of dollars in the way of selling machines, and there are no manufacturers too busy to make more money. The American manufacturers might well own up—their machines are distinctly inferior to those of the best French make in speed, practicability and endurance. The International Cup Races for the past few years show what estimate is put upon American automobiles by American automobile manufacturers—in a race they won't back them with their money.] go back a few years and to summarize: In the French races they did not enter at all; in the German races they entered and did not start; in the United States races they started but did not finish.

A fortnight ago, as our readers may remember, we printed some verses under this heading, with a few notes as to their first appearance. The verses had been sent in anonymously, therefore these particulars were partly inaccurate, which inaccuracies were corrected in the following note:

Editor Argonaut:—In the Argonaut issued September 29, we have published "A Rhyme of the Ruins," by Mr. Lawrence Harris, and I am sure a great many of his friends regret he has not given the credit for its authorship. Mr. Harris is a director of "The Family," and wrote the poem for the "Opening Reception" of that club when they took their new house last June. A friend of the lines of Kipling's "On the Road to Mandalay," was done to sing to the music familiarly set for that verse, was sung for the first time that night by Mr. John H. Noyes.

I trust this is of interest to you and that you may see fit to publish the fact in the next issue of your splendid paper.

Very truly yours,

Roy M. Pike

We duly printed this correction, and the day that appeared in print we received a note from the person who had sent us the manuscript of the poem. It will be found printed below. To refresh the memory of those who may not recently have read Kipling's "Mandalay"—the lines of which Mr. Pike says "A Rhyme of the Ruins" follows—we reprint that poem.

MANDALAY.

By the old Moulmein Pagoda, lookin' eastward to the sea,
There's a Burma girl a-settin', an' I know she thinks of me;
For the wind is in the palm trees, an' the temple-bells they say 'Come you back, you British soldier; come you back to Mandalay!'

Come you back to Mandalay,

Where the old Flotilla lay;

Can't you 'ear their paddles chunkin' from Rangoon to Mandalay,

On the road to Mandalay,

Where the flyin'-fishes play,

An' the dawn comes up like thunder outer China 'crost the I

'Er petticoat was yellar, an' 'er little cap was green,

An' 'er name was Supi-yaw-lat—jes' the same as Theeb's

Queen;

An' I seed 'er first a-smokin' of a whackin' white cheroot,

An' a wastin' Christian kisses on an' 'eathen idol's foot.

Bloomin' idol made of mud—

What they called the great Gawd Budd;

Plucky lot she cared for idols when I kissed 'er where she

On the road to Mandalay,

Where the flyin'-fishes play,

An' the dawn comes up like thunder outer China 'crost the I

When the mist was on the rice-fields, an' the sun was droppin'

slow,

She'd git her little banjo an' she'd sing "Kulla-le-lo!"

With 'er arm upon my shoulder, an' 'er cheek agin my cheek,

We useter watch the steamers an' the hathis pilin' teak.

Elephants a-pilin' teak

In the sludgy, squidgy creek,

Where the silence 'ung that 'eavy you was 'arf afraid to speak,

On the road to Mandalay,

Where the flyin'-fishes play,

An' the dawn comes up like thunder outer China 'crost the I

But that's all shove be'ind me—long ago an' fur away,

An' there ain't no 'buses runnin' from the Bank to Mandalay,

An' I'm learnin' 'ere in London what the ten-year soldier

"If you've 'eard the East a-callin', you won't never 'eed no else."

No! you won't 'eed nothin' else

But them spicy, garlic smells,

An' the sunshine, an' the palm-trees, an' the tinkly temple-bells,

On the road to Mandalay,

Where the flyin'-fishes play,

An' the dawn comes up like thunder outer China 'crost the I

I am sick of wastin' leather on these gritty pavin'-stones,

An' the blasted English drizzle wakes the fever in my bone,

Though I walks with fifty 'ousemaids outer Chelsea to the S. Sid.

An' they talks a lot of lovin', but wot do they understand?

Beefy face an' grubby 'and—

Law! wot do they understand?

I've a nealer, sweeter maiden in a cleaner, greener land!

On the road to Mandalay,

Where the flyin'-fishes play,

An' the dawn comes up like thunder outer China 'crost the I rip me somewhere East of Suez, where the best is like the worst, There there aren't no Ten Commandments, an' a man can raise a thirst;

Or the temple-bells are callin', an' it's there that I would be—
The old Moulmein Pagoda, lookin' lazy at the sea—

On the road to Mandalay,
Where the old Flotilla lay,

With our sick beneath the awnin's when we went to Mandalay!
On the road to Mandalay,

Where the flyin'-fishes play,
As the dawn comes up like thunder outer China 'cross the Bay!

Herewith we also reproduce the version of the "Hymne of the Ruins" sent to us by our anonymous correspondent:

A RHYME OF THE RUINS.

P me somewhere west of East street, where there's nothing left but dust.

All the boys are all a-hustling and everything's gone bust;
Were the buildings standing there sort of blink and blindly stare
A the damndest finest ruins ever gazed on anywhere.

By ruins, brick and wall, through the night I've heard you call,
So of sorry for each other, 'cause you had to burn and fall;

For the Ferry to Van Ness you're a god-forsaken mess,
B the damndest finest ruins, nothing more and nothing less.

A the Rubes they come a-rubbing and hunting souvenirs,
A the fools they try to tell us it'll take a hundred years

Bore we're even started, and why don't we come to live
A build our homes in Oakland, on the land they've got to give?

Go to give! Why on my soul, I would rather bore a hole
A live right in those ashes than to go to Oakland mole;

A if they'd give the pick of their buildings fine and slick,
A nose damndest finest ruins, I would rather be a brick.

From the note which follows and which reached us at the "Rhyme of the Ruins" had been printed, it is apparent that the writer had made certain changes in

V. Harris's lines. But he will tell his own story:

Dear Mr. Hart:—I am the guilty anonymous who sent you "A Rhyme of the Ruins," which you were good enough to publish in our issue of September 29th. I did not send my own name, because I did not want to strain my credit with the Argonaut. I did not send the author's name, because I did not know it. And, no, may I annoy you with a little literary tweedle-dum and wille-dee?

You have made a mistake, so slight, that in a layman it would be negligible, but in an expert like yourself it may even be called errors. The verses you published were never read at either the Coos or Bohemian Club. The verses there read were the original; the verses you published are the revised version—not revised, but improved. I say it modestly, but firmly. The original was handed to me by a friend. It was printed on a card, without author's, or publisher's, name. He said he had bought it in California street.

My wife—pardon me for mentioning it—is a poet. She is only a minor poet, now; in three hundred years, she will be a major poet in two thousand years, a brigadier. I took it home and read it over. She said: "That sounds like the real thing. But there are to be something the matter with it."

You don't object to the 'damndest,' do you, dear?" I replied.
No, I do not think it is that."

I'm so glad, for on the way home, I read it to a number of friends, and every one of them seemed to think that word was the gh-water mark of the poem."

No. He seems to have all the necessary sounds and ideas, but some of them have been taken out too soon. He hasn't the corn-popper long enough."

So we looked it over. The first line was perfect. I read the first line:

A the boys are all a-bustling and everything's gone bust."

There are too many busses on that line," said my wife.

We changed "a-bustling" to "a-hustling."

The next line read:

A where the buildings that are standing, sort of blink and blindly stare."

That needs a little more heat and shaking," said she.

We gave them to it, and this is what came out:

Where the buildings standing there, sort of blink and blindly stare."

The next four lines were perfect; the following three we had to alter some; the next two could not be improved. The fifth line, the second stanza read:

Go to give—why believe me! on my soul, I would rather bore hole."

That sounds like a horse with five legs, trotting with three of them and loping with the other two," said my wife.

We cut off one of the hinges, and put the others all on one gait.

"Go to give! Why on my soul, I would rather bore a hole."

I had the next to the last line:

An if they'd all give me my pick of their buildings fine and slick."

More feet than shoes," said she, and she changed it to read:

An if they'd give the pick of their buildings fine and slick."

When we read it all over and it satisfied us. We read it to a number of laymen. They said it was much improved, but still clung to the idea that we hadn't touched the marrow—which, they asserted, lay in the word "damndest."

Then my wife said: "Let us try it on Mr. Hart. If he prints it, it is good. If he doesn't, it is better."

So we tried it on you. You printed it. Thank you.

Now, Mr. Hart, speaking candidly, between poet and poet, whose poem is it now? Eight lines by the original author; eight lines jacked into shape by my wife. Whose poem is it?

I asked this question of a neighbor, and he said it wasn't anybody's; that it isn't a poem at all; that if I wanted to see what a real poem is, I should read Jeremiah Lynch's in the last Argonaut.

But, joking aside, don't you think the original author should be subjected to a horizontal cut?

I would like to know who the author is. I want to thank him personally. His lines (amended and improved) have become permanent members of my mental entourage. I wake at 1:30 a. m. and sit up in bed. "What is it, dear?" says my wife.

And I reply:

"The damndest finest ruins, nothing more and nothing less."

The original said "or."

Yes, Mr. Hart, though I know him not—neither his name nor his place—nevertheless you are easily within the truth in referring to me as A Friend of the Author.

Concerning the inaccuracies as to when and where the poem was first read, we are not responsible for them and the author's name we did not know. As to the unauthorized revision of another person's work, that is a moot point. There is a celebrated case where the purchaser of a picture by a famous artist disliked a

artist in Class B. This fact he kept a profound secret.

But when the Class A artist saw his picture years afterwards he was aggrieved and used language to and of Macaenas.

In the case of these verses the revisionist probably acquired the same rights as does a cattle man when he finds a maverick astray. He brands it. If he finds a branded steer astray, then he brands it over the other fellow's brand. That apparently is what the present reviser has done. As the poem was purchased "on California street, printed on a card with no author's or publisher's name," it was in a way a poetic estray, which fact gave a certain warrant to any punctilious

Doctor Syntax to revise it.

The present writer, in the course of a long and checked editorial experience, has had occasion more than once to revise verses written by his friends. It is a painful subject into which he would rather not enter.

He is now convinced that it would have been better to print them as they were, with what he believed to be their imperfections on their heads. Experience has shown him that it is infinitely wiser to reject a poem brutally than to revise it tenderly. And the writer speaks as an expert—not as an expert in poetry, but as an expert in getting himself disliked for revising and refusing poems.

He has been reading MS. poems for many years, and it is his belief that, from the purely financial standpoint, the poetry side of the publishing business might in the colloquial of the day be thus briefly put: "Dead stock. Nawthin doin'."

Many poets—and eke poetesses—have consulted the writer over their communings with the muse. As for the poetesses, dissuasive counsel has always been useless. It may be possible successfully to struggle with a sitting hen—not so with a poetess. It is to be noted, however, that marriage usually cures the most aggravated cases. As for the young men, whenever the writer has been asked for counsel by a young poet who seemed otherwise well-meaning, although temporarily suffering from the poetic itch, we have always assured him that loyalty to the muse meant beggary, and we have generally advised him to go into something palpable or potable, like the grocery or liquor business.

Sometimes our advice has been received with contumely, but when heeded it was always good. We can point with pride to some prosperous grocers today who but for our advice would have been penniless poets or starveling penny-a-liners. This long experience as a poetry pound-keeper, so to speak, should warrant us in expressing judgment on the estray poem sent in to us now. Unfortunately, this is not true. Mayor Schmitz is in the habit of saying that with him "History began on April 18th, 1906." To this we may add that poetry stopped with us on the same date. Into all of the reasons for this we will not enter. There are, however, some obvious ones. At the left of our desk in the old Argonaut office there stood for many years a tall revolving book case. On the second shelf reposed three well worn volumes. De Mille's "Rhetoric," Tom Hood's "Rhymester," and Roget's "Thesaurus." Out of these battered volumes we could in a few minutes conjure up vast quantities of poetic lore. We could talk glibly of trochees and spondees, of iambics, anapests, and dactyls; having memorized Coleridge's lines "Trochee trips from long to short," we could easily cope with any young and timid poet. Of course in aggravated cases, where the poets were old and hardened, sterner measures were necessary. Still, casually questioning "whether the rhythmical ictus accorded with the syllable stress" would often knock out even a poetess of passion, with which tribe at times the Pacific Coast has been infested.

But now these old books of ours are gone, and they form part of those same ashes into which our poet wishes to "bore a hole." We could get others of course.

In fact, we have done so. But the new Thesaurus is spick and span and has sharp corners, while the old one was so worn by the attrition of years that it was shabby and comfortable. Query—Can one's wits be worn by mental as one's books are by material attrition?

Then these old books of ours were filled with the pencilings of years—multitudinous memoranda—allusions to look up—books to read—all sorts of ideas jotted down while "hunting for things." These are gone with the old books, and the new books can never be more than apologetic replicas of the old.

But we wander from our text. We are asked: What do we think of "A Rhyme of the Ruins"? Is it a poem? The question would be difficult to answer. It is probably the first time that anything in the nature of a poem was sold on the streets of San Francisco, and possessed so much intrinsic momentum that it sold without the name of the author or the name of the publisher. As to the metrical form, it is perhaps a trifle rough and ragged, but so are the ruins. They are not nearly so symmetrical as San Francisco used to be.

Before the disaster, doubtless Mr. Harris might have written prim, precise verses which would have attracted not the least attention.

Does this piece betoken the possession by the writer of any poetical genius? Is it probable that he will ever again produce anything in the line of poetry or verse which will command attention? These questions also it is impossible to answer. In our old library stood a book entitled, "Single Famous Poems"; the verses of which it was made up were many of them legitimately entitled to be called poems, and in almost every case the writer had produced no other notable piece. For that matter, when the literary baggage of the nineteenth century shall be handed down the ages, it is our opinion that most of it will be thrown into the rubbish heap. If three or four of Tennyson's little lyrics shall be read five hundred years from now, and one or two of Scott's short ballads instead of his long novels, both will be doing better than most of the writers of antiquity.

What is a poem? The question is difficult to answer.
Some very roughly cast pieces of verse are poems, and some very finished versification is not poetry at all.

Probably the more artificial the form the more difficult the attainment of poetry. Nearly all of the French metrical forms—such as the rondeau, the rondel, the triolet, the villanelle, and the like—are so artificial that they will soon be forgotten. Only the sonnet seems to endure, and that is more because great poets have written in that form than because the sonnet form is really poetic. It seems odd when thinking of sonnets to think first of R. W. Gilder of the Century, but his sonnet on the sonnet, "What is a sonnet?" is an incomparable bit and it sticks in the memory. Of the Shakespearean sonnets it would seem that their interest lies principally in who really wrote them, to whom they were written, and what they meant, rather than whether they are poetry or not. Their Elizabethan euphuisms do not appeal to all of us. There are other things in Shakespeare which impress us more than the sonnets. Take the invocation of Macbeth, "Sleep no more"; whenever you read it you hear the knocking at the gate;

you see the awakened porter with the mists of drunkenness clinging around him; you hear the alarum as the gowned Macbeth dashes into the courtyard. The lines from the Tempest:

"We are such stuff
As dreams are made of, and our little life
Is rounded with a sleep."

or Ariel's song,

"Full fathom five thy father lies"

—these to many seem more like poetry than the more artificial sonnets. But of the sonnets by the great ones of the elder time what finer one can there be found than that by Milton on Shakespeare:

What needs my Shakespeare for his honored bones
The labor of an age in piled stones,
Or that his hallowed reliques should be hid
Under a star-y-pointed pyramid?

Or take another by the same stern old Puritan:

"Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughtered saints, whose bones Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold."

In the line of requiems what could be finer than Ben Jonson's incomparable epitaph on the Countess of Pembroke,

"Underneath this sable hearse?"

It is true that there are highly artificial poems which still endure. Gray wrote only two which still stand in the books today, and of these only one is remembered, "The curfew tolls the knell of parting day." The writer knows that by heart from beginning to end, but admires it only as a highly polished and extremely artificial piece of verse.

Tennyson's songs fairly sing. In one can almost hear the bugle. And so with his little stories in verse, such as "Maud Clare," "Lady Clara Vere de Vere," and "The Sisters," through which runs the weird refrain,

"The splendor falls on castle walls,"

"The wind was blowing in turret and tree."

There are minor poets, too, like Walter Thornbury, who possess the power of materializing pictures. When one reads his ballad,

"Into the Devil's Tavern three stalwart troopers strode," one may almost see the soldiers of the Stuart King. And so with the poem beginning,

"Versailles! up the chestnut alley," in which one may see the Pompadour followed by her sycophantic suite. Nowadays it is not the fashion to read Byron and it is the fashion to depreciate him. But few can forget his lines, beginning

"Fare thee well and if forever."

His fame seems to be growing larger in the larger world, if it is temporarily obscured in English-speaking countries. Byron is translated into many languages, and a poet who can stand translation can stand anything. On the continent he is the best-known English writer next to Shakespeare. Among contemporaneous poets Andrew Lang has written much—too much. But forgetting his countless poemlets one always remembers his fine invocation to Homer which is prefixed to the Odyssey translation made by himself and Professor Butcher, which ends with the lines,

"They hear like ocean on a western beach
The surge and thunder of the Odyssey."

We come last to the consideration of poems which tell of events or movements which strongly stir men's souls. Of this nature is Stedman's fine poem beginning, "John Brown in Kansas settled, like a steadfast Yankee farmer."

One can scarcely read it without seeing Brown bound in the Virginia court room. Another is Tom Taylor's poem apostrophizing Punch, which had lampooned and satirized Abraham Lincoln throughout his four troubled years. But when his life came to a bloody end at the hand of the assassin, Punch printed a picture representing Columbia mourning at his bier and underneath were the fine lines beginning,

"You lay a wreath on murdered Lincoln's bier."

It is probable that in this class we must rank Mr. Harris's "Rhyme of the Ruins." Out of the gloomy Middle Ages, when all men feared that the world was coming to an end and gathered round the monasteries seeking celestial protection, there came the monkish poem, "Dies Irae! Dies Illa!" Even those of us who, as Ben Jonson said of Shakespeare, know little Latin and less Greek, can understand the sombre meaning of this monkish rune. It is a poem born of the gloom and terror of the medieval time. So is the "Marseillaise," which as some one said—was it Carlyle?—came from the "bursting heart of Rouget de l'Isle." Only in times of stress and strain could such a rhyme have been produced, and the probable reason for the vitality of this "Rhyme of the Ruins," is that it dumbly expressed the indomitable feeling of San Franciscans—the feeling that, although the earth should shudder and the heavens fall—although fire and water and all the elements should beleague their beloved city, that her devoted people would allow naught to prevail against her.

And now the last question: "Is the word 'damned' proper, or is it the high-water mark of the poem?" While we neither think that it is the "high-water mark" of the poem, nor that some other adjective might not have served, still we consider this one not easily replaced. Were it eliminated or changed it would weaken the effect. As to whether the use of the word is "wrong" or not, we must admit that the army swore terribly in Flanders, and that Uncle Toby also swore sometimes. Still, the Recording Angel dropped a tear on the record and blotted it out. So with the wicked word in the "Rhyme of the Ruins." Who can ever forget the polychromatic clouds of smoke that rose from the burning city, now white, now pink, now red, now orange, now black? Let us hope that these same clouds may have so smeared and smudged St. Peter's record—where the wicked word doubtless still stands—that the good saint may not see it, and may let the poet pass freely from The City That Was to the foot of the Great White Throne.

Strategy of the Crooked Cockneys' Counsel.

The strategy employed by the counsel of the crooked cockney companies has been Napoleonic in its directness. That great commander made it a rule to concentrate his army, hurl his entire force upon the enemy, and break them in two; then, after having marched through them he returned and thrashed them backwards. The policy of the attorney for the cockneys has been similarly simple. After a careful investigation extending over many weeks the cockneys' counsel were forced to the conclusion that their earthquake-clause clients had not a legal leg to stand upon. They saw plainly that none of the earthquake clauses would hold water. They saw that it was utterly impossible, even if the earthquake clauses held water, to prove anything under them. Their experience with juries convinced them that a local venire would require absolutely convincing proof before they would bring in a verdict for the companies; their good sense told them that it was not only impossible to bring in any convincing proof, but any proof at all. The cockneys' attorneys saw at once that the weak point of their clients' case—the burden of proof being on them—was that they had to prove that each particular fire was caused by earthquake; however strongly the cockneys' counsel, the cockneys' clients, and even the jurymen might believe that a particular fire in a particular house was due to a particular cause, earthquake, it would be impossible to prove that fact.

So reasoning, when the anxious and crooked clients asked their counsel what they should do, they replied briskly, "Do nothing. Let them wait. After they have got tired waiting, let them wait some more. Then deny all liability."

It was an inspiration. The crooked cockney companies kept the community waiting for many weeks. After the poor policy-holders had worn themselves to skin and bone on the hard benches in the crooked companies' anterooms, they were surprised one morning to read a long proclamation from counsel, announcing that the crooked cockney companies absolutely denied all liability; that they would not pay; that they would not pay nothing; that they would never pay nothing; that they would never pay not nothing at all never. After this had sunk into the souls and seared itself on the brains of the policy-holders of the crooked cockney companies the cockneys' counsel began swiftly to hound and compromise. To a ruined man who expected to get nothing at all, half a dollar looked bigger than a hundred cents. In the policy-holders' dazed comatose condition following the sweeping denial of all liability the cockneys' attorneys compromised galore. Even now many dazed policy-holders ignorant of the fact that this move of the crooked cockney companies and of their clever counsel was merely a magnificent bluff. The companies had no case at all. They proclaimed loudly that the policy-holders had no case at all. In the general terror which they began making very favorable compromises. Finally they will thus save several millions.

A Salt-Water Fire System.

On October 6th the Merchants' Association sent a communication to the Board of Supervisors recommending the installation of a high pressure salt-water system for fire protection in the business district of San Francisco. The Association also recommended that the question of issuing bonds for that purpose be submitted to a vote of the people according to the provisions of the charter. The Association divides the city into districts. The downtown district, No. 1, being the most congested values, covers about a thousand acres and lies generally east of Sixth street and Taylor street. It recommends two pumping stations, one at the foot of Telegraph Hill and one at the base of Rincon Hill, each having a capacity of seventy-five hundred gallons per minute; also the construction of distributing and auxiliary reservoirs on the hills, as well as underground cisterns in the streets holding one hundred thousand gallons each. There would then be three distinct sources of salt-water supply, the distributing reservoirs on the hills, the cisterns under the streets, and the pumping system. District No. 2 is to have mains connected by fire boats at the foot of Brannan street, as well as to be connected with the mains from No. 1 pumping station. District No. 3 is to have a pumping station on the bay shore at the foot of Polk street, this district also to be connected with the mains of District No. 1. The fire boats are also to be utilized as accessories to the pumping stations.

With this new system there would be no possibility of the city being entirely deprived of water in the case of a conflagration. There would be, first, the ordinary fresh-water system; second, the storage salt-water reservoirs on the hills; third, the storage salt-water cisterns under the streets; fourth, the direct pumping station on the bay shore; and fifth, the fire boats pumping directly into the mains.

It seems incredible, but the total amount of bond suggested by the Association is only $500,000, and the statement is made that in Philadelphia a similar installation at once reduced the insurance rates twenty cents on the hundred dollars. A competent engineer, Edwin Duryea, estimates the annual cost of one of San Francisco pumping stations at only $35,000. He estimates the total initial cost of the pumping stations, fire boat, and mains for the three districts of San Francisco at $1,700,000, and the annual interest charge, operation and maintenance at $211,000.

These figures seem to be almost beyond belief. But even if both the Merchants' Association and Edwin Duryea should have underestimated them, the city would well afford to pay much more. Through lack of foresight the primary loss in San Francisco in the recent conflagration has been estimated at from seven hundred to nine hundred millions of dollars. What it would have cost with the consequential damages no one can estimate. What has been lost in business and what will be lost in business by San Francisco during the crippled months and years will also be up in the hundreds of millions. The Argonaut has always been in favor of a salt-water fire protection system, and immediately after the conflagration in Baltimore we warned the municipal council of San Francisco of her danger and suggested the simplest remedy. We sincerely hope that they may heed the suggestions of the Merchants' Association and take the necessary steps for placing the matter before the people. If that be done there will be no doubt that ever as to how the people will vote.

CAPTAIN ZEBULON PIKE'S MOUNTAIN.

Centenary of the Peak's Discovery Celebrated—Honors Won by the Explorer a Hundred Years Ago.

A centennial celebration of more than local interest and significance was held at Colorado Springs during the closing week of September. The celebration was in honor of Captain Zebulon M. Pike, the early explorer of the then dim and distant Rocky Mountain region, whose name and achievement in its discovery is perpetuated in "Pike's Peak."

Pike's Peak is Colorado's best known landmark, and Colorado Springs lies near its base. The United States Government was fittingly a party to this centennial celebration, since Captain Zebulon Pike and nearly all the members of his expedition belonged to the United States Army. Other participants in the celebration were representatives of many Indian tribes, the once populous and warlike peoples of the great plateau, the Pawnees, Apaches, Comanches and Cheyennes, whom Captain Pike met on his tour through the beautiful and rugged wildernesses a century ago. The Daughters of the American Revolution, the National Society of Colonial Dames of America, and local societies of pioneers aided in planning and carrying out the memorial assemblage. Vice-President Fairbanks reviewed the great parade and made an address. Many other addresses were made, describing the work of the explorer.

At the unveiling of the great granite monument a thousand voices sang an "Ode to Colorado," written by Charles J. Pike, grand-nephew of the explorer. What undoubtedly was the highest official military salute ever fired was the brigadier-general's salute of eleven guns, fired on the summit of the peak, nearly three miles above sea level, in the morning. Two inscriptions on the monument read as follows:

Zebulon Montgomery Pike, born at Lamberton, now Trenton, N. J., January 5, 1779, died April 27, 1813, in an attack on the Indians, later Toronto, Canada, aged 34 years; buried at Madison Heights, N. Y.

General Pike enlisted as a cadet in his father's regiment in 1797; became ensign in Second Infantry March 3, 1799; first lieutenant April 24, 1800; captain August 12, 1805; major May 1808; lieutenant-colonel July 6, 1812; brigadier-general March 2, 1813.

Pike first saw the Rocky Mountains in Colorado in November, 1806, but the time of the celebration was fixed a little earlier to avoid the approaching winter. The work done by this brilliant young soldier is worthy of the highest honor. He was in his twenties, a boy in years, when he made his two great journeys. He was only 34 when he was killed in battle, leading a charge against the British in the war of 1812.

Pike's great opportunity came to him in 1805. The Louisiana territory included in the Louisiana Purchase had been bought with the people's money, and the whole country was eager to know more about its new domain. Lewis and Clarke were sent by the President to traverse the great unknown in the Northwest. Pike was dispatched by the general in command of the army, first up the Mississippi to near its sources, and then up the Missouri and to the mountains in the heart of the continent.

Few trappers and traders lived along the Mississippi but they knew little except their own business. There were eighteen houses in Prairie du Chien, and it was the only settlement anywhere near the river north of St. Louis. Pike's map, at the site of Dubuque, bears the legend, "Mr. Dubuque's house." Along the mighty Mississippi, through this wilderness, Pike and his twenty men paddled in their keel boat, seventy feet long, provided for only four months, though they were to make a survey of the river to its source." He brought back to the Indians the first news of their Great Father, made treaties with them in the name of the Government and was lost to sight for nine months. All his work above the falls of St. Anthony, where Minneapolis stands, was done in the dead of a Minnesota winter, with no food but game, amid incredible hardships and with a larger part of his force left behind in camp disabled.

Pike made a treaty with the Sioux by which the Government came into possession of about 100,000 acres of land along the river from the mouth of the St. Croix to five miles above St. Anthony Falls. He naively reported that the treaty cost him $200 in presents, including whiskey and tobacco and the private bribery of two high-priced chiefs.

Pike succeeded so well in this undertaking, which occupied the period from August, 1805, to April, 1806, that he was dispatched at once on another trip to find the headwaters of the Arkansas and the Red Rivers. Captain Pike's little band was composed of one lieutenant, three non-commissioned officers, sixteen privates and an interpreter on this second trip of exploration. The expedition started from St. Louis on July 15, 1806. Pushed forward by boat and on horseback, Pike and a detachment of his men followed the Arkansas River into Colorado, wandered through it in a zigzag course and were toiling over the high plateau on Nov. 15, 1806, when he saw what looked like a small blue cloud on his right, and he thought it might be a mountain. A half hour later Pike's Peak appeared in full view, with many other summits, and his small party gave three cheers for the "Mexican Mountains." Pike wrote correctly that they are a part of the great mountain system that divides the waters of the Atlantic from those of the Pacific.

In January, 1807, Pike and his little party were near perishing hundreds of miles from succor among the Rockies. One day he heard a soldier remark, so that all might hear: "It is more than human nature can bear to march three days without food through snow three feet deep, and to carry loads only fit for horses."

Pike waited till camp was pitched and then he called the men together and thanked them for their obedience, perseverance and contempt of every danger. "But, Brown," he went on, "you have presumed today to use seditious and mutinous language. This time I will pardon you, for I attribute your conduct rather to your distress than to an inclination to sow discontent. But I warn you that if you ever repeat such language you will be punished by instant death."

Pike's soldiers knew that he was always ready to do more and suffer more than any man under his command. They fully respected him; he kindled their enthusiasm, and this is among the reasons why one of Pike's biographers was able to write the honest truth that "considering his small force and inadequate means no other man ever contributed to the geographical knowledge of the United States an amount comparable to that which the world owes to the heroic efforts and indomitable perseverance of Pike."

From Colorado he traveled south, recrossing the divide in search of the Rio Grande river, which he found and crossed. He was captured by the Spanish and kept in prison at Santa Fe for a time, but released and sent across the border when his captors were fully assured that he meant them no harm. Four years after came the war of 1812, in which he lost his life in the service of his country.

Judge Beatty on Registration.

Supreme Court of California Justices Chambers

W. H. Beatty
Chief Justice

San Francisco, Cal., Oct. 3, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—Your comment in the Argonaut of September 29th upon the opinion I am reported to have expressed upon the question of the legal residence of persons whose homes were destroyed by the fire following the late earthquake, makes me regret that I did not correct, at the time of its publication, the extremely inaccurate version of what I actually said to a Chronicle reporter.

The substance of what I said was that a man is presumed to be a resident at his actual place of domicile, but that the presumption is not conclusive, residence being largely a question of intention. To illustrate my meaning I instanced my own case. I had lived with my family in San Rafael for more than a month after the fire, but all the time with the intention of returning to my home in San Francisco as soon as it could be made habitable. Under those circumstances I said it could not be considered that I had ceased for a moment to be a resident at 2409 Octavia street. But with respect to those who had been living in rented houses and flats destroyed by the fire, and who had been forced to find homes in other places, the question would be more complicated. They could not well say that they were all the time intending to return to homes that had been destroyed, and which they could have no assurance of regaining even if they should be rebuilt. I thought, however, that in any such case, the "refugee" could safely claim for the purpose of registration to be a resident at the place where he was actually living.

You will see that this extremely conservative opinion was very different from that reported. Respectfully, W. H. Beatty.

The United States Coast Geodetic Survey has a station at Lighthouse point, near Santa Cruz, Cal., and is obtaining information in regard to the earthquake of April 18th. Every afternoon, between the hours of 2 and 5 o'clock, at intervals of two minutes, heliographic signals are flashed to another station, located on the summit of Loma Prieta, a distance of eighteen miles. The work is being carried on to ascertain if there has been any change in the position of the territory since the earthquake, owing to the fault and opening along the ridge of the Santa Cruz mountains.

A boom due to the building of the Panama Canal has struck Mobile, and store rents have increased from 30 to 40 per cent, while house rents have risen to such an extent that clerks are leaving the city in schools, upon finding themselves unable to pay the increased demands.

A royal decree has been published in Madrid revising the legal formalities to be observed in civil marriages in Spain. The obligation to declare their religion hitherto imposed upon the parties to such marriages is suppressed.

At a recent election in Seattle a proposition that the city own and operate the street railways was defeated by a vote of 5762 for, to 7198 against.

THE HEARST ISSUE AND PROSPECTS.

Democratic and Republican Opinions Collated.

From the mass of exchanges received by the Argonaut, papers all along lines from Boston, Mass., to Portland, Ore., and from Duluth, Minn., to New Orleans, it would be hard to pick at random one which does not devote space to William Randolph Hearst, or to Hearstism, so called. The following, from the Public Ledger, of Philadelphia, presents in small compass the thoughts that are amplified and emphasized or noted and contradicted by editorial writers almost without exception:

Hearst and Hearstism in New York are now a sufficiently striking and important phenomenon to require deep attention from all citizens of the Republic. There are reports of a revulsion in the Democratic party from Hearst, and of bolting politicians. McClellan, the Mayor, will have none of Hearst and of the despicable Tammany Murphy who joined hands with Hearst and made his capture of the party possible. Jerome and others will no doubt take the stump for Hughes, the Republican nominee, and very many sensible men who have been lifelong Democrats will either work against Hearst or abstain from voting, or vote for the Republican. But will the desertions from the Democratic party equal the accessions to the Hearst standard from the Republican side? That is the question. . . . From the first days of the "American experiment" all writers on democracy have predicted that the day would come when the ignorant, shiftless and thoughtless would discover that they were in the majority, and that vile demagogues would arise to appeal in a loud voice to "envy, hatred and malice." That is the basis of the Hearst appeal.

The New York Evening Journal, one of Mr. Hearst's papers, had a half-column editorial in black-faced type on the evening following the New York Democratic convention, from which these lines are taken:

William Randolph Hearst is honored by the confidence and friendship of four millions of American voters, who read his newspapers daily. This confidence has been expressed in tens of thousands of personal private letters; it has been expressed at the polls in hundreds of thousands of votes. Those that have privately expressed to Mr. Hearst their confidence in his purposes will find that his object in accepting a nomination for office is to be of use to his country, and thus to justify that confidence, and to justify, as fully as his powers will allow, the kind things that have been said of him by millions of friends whom he can not personally know. . . . The people are to witness and to take part in a clear, clean-cut election contest—government by the people on one side, with W. R. Hearst as the nominee, and government by the corporations on the other side, with Mr. Hughes, the distinguished corporation lawyer, as the nominee. The result is most important to the people. Fortunately the people have the result in their own hands. They will decide it.

As an expression of Southern Democratic opinion this paragraph is clipped from an editorial in the New Orleans Picayune:

Much depends on the outcome of the gubernatorial election in the Empire State. If Hearst should be chosen Governor it will show that the masses of the people have advanced in radical political views up to the Hearst standard, and then he will become a formidable factor in the Presidential campaign in 1908. Mr. Bryan is conservatism itself in comparison with Hearst. There is reason to believe that radicalism in politics has made progress among the people at large far beyond what the leaders suspect. If so, there may be a clamorous demand for Hearst. Such a demonstration, if it could be carried to the extent of a Presidential nomination for Hearst, would mean calamity not only for the Democratic party, but for the Republic.

Mr. Bryan's paper, The Commoner, endorses the action of the New York Democratic convention in a brief article, ending with this statement:

The Democrats of New York who have no axe to grind, and who are interested solely in the public welfare should give their support to the Democratic State ticket, headed by William R. Hearst.

The Oakland (Cal.) Tribune sums up an editorial view in this sentence:

Hearst has behind him the real voting masses of the party, and his candidacy will have the effect of bringing about a new alignment that will more nearly define the line between opposing policies and principles than has heretofore been drawn.

A New York correspondent of the Philadelphia Ledger gives these figures and points out their significance:

In 1904 Higgins, Rep., polled 813,264 votes in New York State. Herrick, Dem., polled 732,704. Roosevelt had 859,533 votes and Parker 683,981. New York City gave Hearst, in 1905, for Mayor, 225,165 votes; McClellan, 228,651, and Ivins, Rep., 137,049. There is no telling what the defection from Hearst may amount to when election day arrives. In the McClellan vote last fall should be included many Republicans who went over direct to McClellan to save the city from Hearst. A good part of Hearst's strength, it is claimed by those on the inside in politics, came from Republicans of a commercial variety. It is openly asserted in New York City that the State leaders made a deal with Hearst, he giving them votes for members of the Legislature and they trading for votes for Governor. Hearst's Independence party affords a chance for Odell, Quigg and their followers in New York City and State to help Hearst and try to down Roosevelt.

THE MYSTERIOUS SCOUT.

Written for the Argonaut by Major N. C. Kouns, Late of the Confederate Army.

One of the strangest characters that I met during the five years I fought under the Confederate flag, said the Major, was a person who was known throughout the South as "Tucker, the Scout." My acquaintance with this singular being began with a terrible incident. Soon after the fall of Vicksburg, I was in Canton with considerable time on my hands, awaiting orders from Richmond. One day I was strolling through the military prison, supposing that among these "boys in blue" there might be some one from Missouri whom I knew. I was chatting pleasantly with one of the prisoners when I noticed a young man had entered the long room, and was standing about half way down the length of it laughing and talking with a Yankee. Their conversation soon became so animated as to attract our attention, and mine was especially drawn to this youth. He was clad in a neat and beautiful suit of gray cloth; he wore a fine black felt hat, in which a single long black feather was fastened in front by a bright steel buckle, and drooped back over the crown and rim of the hat. He was small but compactly built, and in every pose and movement as graceful and as bright as Apollo. There was such a jaunty, trim appearance about him that one could scarcely see him without desiring to look at him again, and the second glance revealed a face of remarkable beauty, in which, however, there was at once perceived something unnatural, fascinating, unearthly almost. The short-cut hair was black as jet and curled up everywhere close to the scalp. The brow was low, but broad and beautifully moulded. The eyes were large, black and soft—almost melting in their dewy splendor. The face was beardless, delicate, and the cheeks, which were absolutely rosy (not many cheeks are so), glided off softly into a prominent chin, perfectly formed but of unusual length. His nose was high, straight and pointed, with thin, wide nostrils, and the mouth was small, but full and red, especially the short, plump upper lip. Altogether he was one of the most strikingly handsome young men I ever saw. These were the first words I heard the boy speak, and they were spoken clearly, incisively, in a peculiar, ringing, silvery, bantering tone:

"Oh, yes. Of course the Yanks and all other men are brave enough when there is a crowd of them together, but when it comes to personal courage we Southerners defy God's earth to match us. Now, I don't doubt that you're a pretty good soldier for a Yankee, but you haven't got true 'grit.' You can't sight down the barrel of my revolver without flinching, but Southern gentlemen can meet death, single-handed, with a smile. You can't face it even as a test. Try it, if you dare!"

And with a light, mocking laugh he extended his arm. The Yankee looked startled for a moment, but he shut one eye and calmly sighted down the barrel of the pistol with the other.

"You had better dodge," said the young man, with a tantalizing laugh. "I am going to fire at the word 'three.' Dodge! Dodge! 'One!' 'Two!' "

The Yankee never flinched. "Three!"

At the word the long, delicate finger pressed down upon the trigger, a loud report rang through the room, and the poor Yankee dropped dead in his tracks, a bullet having crashed through the right eye into his brain.

A thrill of horror ran through every one at the sight of this cowardly, cold-blooded, inhuman murder, while the young man stood looking down upon his victim, his beautiful face still wreathed with that mocking, wicked smile, and his parted lips flecked with a light froth, like foam. It was only for an instant. I sprang forward and seized his delicate throat with a grasp that forced skin, nerve and muscle against the very bone with one hand, and with the other clutched the pistol, saying: "Give it up, you murderer!" He gave up the weapon at once, standing passively and offering not the slightest resistance. Upon seeing this, I released his throat. He gulped, as I had choked him pretty hard, and then said, mildly and pleasantly, and with a beaming smile: "Major, it is rather rough to choke a man so for a mere accident like that."

"Accident!" I cried, astounded.

"Certainly," he said, with his wicked smile. "Every one saw that I was in perfect good humor, and was only joking the Yank. I hope no one doubts that the pistol was discharged by accident."

I was simply dumbfounded by the calm assurance with which he spoke. But I called the sergeant of the guard, and upon his coming up I said:

"Take this man into custody and report the fact. I charge him with the willful murder of a prisoner, and will appear to testify to the same whenever desired to do so."

"And your testimony will show, I think, that the occurrence was altogether accidental," said the young man very quietly.

The sergeant carried him off. The Yankees with whom I had been conversing were greatly grieved at the sad fate of their fellow-prisoner, but they really supposed that his death was accidental. They thought it uncharitable to suppose that such a nice young fellow could have committed an act so abominable as this was, if it was intentionally done. As I passed through the guard room, on leaving the prison, I said:

"Sergeant, who is the young man that shot the prisoner?"

"They call him 'Tucker, the Scout,'" answered the sergeant.

Before I had been long at my boarding house I received a request from General "Red" Jackson to come round to his headquarters. After the usual preliminaries the General said:

"I understand you were present when Tucker shot a prisoner this evening. I am informed, also, that you are a lawyer."

I said that his information was correct. At his request I narrated the circumstances just as they had occurred.

"It was murder," said the General, decisively. "I know it. But the fact puts me in an awkward position. Tucker's services as a scout have been almost invaluable to me, but he is not a soldier. He has steadily refused to enlist, and being a refugee from Missouri it is contrary to Confederate law to conscript him. They say he has killed twenty-three Yankees with his own hand, three of whom were prisoners whom he murdered in cold blood. He is not a soldier, and can not be court-martialed. The soldiers condemn his conduct, but sympathize strongly with the man, especially because they understand that his family were terribly wronged by the Yankees in Missouri, and also because they do not think he is entirely sane. And now General McPherson has sent in a demand by a flag of truce for Tucker, and I shall deliver him to the Federals for punishment."

In about forty hours a squad came in from the Yankee outpost at Big Black with a requisition for Tucker, and he was at once delivered up to the Yankees and carried away by them. I think this was on Friday morning, and on the following Sunday night, while I sat smoking my pipe and sighing for the return of my Richmond messenger, there was a knock at the outer door of my room, which opened upon a small yard. I opened the door, and the lithe form and handsome face of "Tucker, the Scout" presented themselves in the doorway. I was, of course, a good deal surprised at this unexpected apparition, but mastering my astonishment I invited him to come in and be seated.

"I am in trouble," he said, "and want to talk to you a little."

"Well, what is the matter?"

"I have had a pretty narrow escape, and this thing of being handed over to the Yankees is more than I can stand. I want your advice."

"Tell me first how you got back to this place again."

"Perhaps I had better not. You seem to have some prejudices against murder—even the murder of a Yankee or of a Dutchman."

He said this with a light, mocking laugh that actually made my blood run cold.

"Yes, I loathe crime. But, nevertheless, tell me how you got back."

"When they took me before General McPherson, in the camp near Vicksburg, he indulged in what I suppose to be the usual cant and hypocrisy about my 'wickedness' until I interrupted him by asking him whether he drew any extra pay for lecturing prisoners. He offered me advantages in one way and another if I would take the oath of allegiance to the gridiron flag, with a purpose to keep it, join the Yankees, and scout for him along the Yazoo. On my refusal he ordered me to be executed at sun up. They put me under close guard in a tent. One Yankee stood outside with his gun, and a big, fat Dutchman stayed in the tent with me. When he got sleepy he made me lie down beside him and put one bracelet of a pair of handcuffs on his own left wrist and the other on my right one. He then took a big butcher knife and stuck the point of it in the ground beside him, the handle sticking up. He assured me that the knife was for my special benefit, and that if I moved hand or foot during the night he would rip me all to pieces with the knife. He made fitters of the King's English in this talk and repeated the threats over and over again until I thought the brute would never go to sleep. He went to sleep, however, at last, and as soon as he snored fully and regularly I laid my thumb down straight in the palm of my hand, drew my fingers close up together that way," said Tucker, stretching out his long slender hand in the position described by him, "and slipped my hand through the iron ring without the slightest difficulty. I then lightly and quickly put one hand over the Dutchman's mouth and glued my fingers to it, at the same instant that I seized his butcher knife with the other hand, and with one strong, quick blow plunged the full length of blade into his stupid carcass, right above the collar bone and then jerked the handle back and forward a foot or two to cut through the windpipe and main arteries. I cut a slit in the side of the tent with the Dutchman's knife and slipped through. I crept along until I got to the edge of the brush and then 'lit out' for Canton, tonight I am here."

He gave this grim recital in a strange, quiet, matter-of-fact way that rendered it atrociously realistic. I not the slightest doubt that he told it precisely as thing had occurred.

"And what do you propose to do here?"

"That is just the question. Do you think Jack will surrender me to the Yankees again?"

"Yes! Or hang you himself."

"And you, I suppose, would approve of that position of me?"

"If any objection could be reasonably made to a course, I suppose it would be based upon the fact that you are regarded by some persons as a monomaniac, and, therefore, irresponsible for your crimes."

"Irresponsible for my crimes?" he echoed, musing.

"I am sure I don't know. I can shut my eyes any day and see again the burning of my quiet home in Missouri, fired by the Yankees. I can see a frenzied mother bending over the murdered body of a gray-haired father. I can see a devil in the shape of man seize a bayonet and with one fiendish stroke plunge it through the breasts of a well-loved daughter. I can see a tear off her night dress and twist the girl, stripped naked, around with the bayonet until the glare of the burning homestead falls upon her burning face in quivering form. I can see a fond brother clutch the brute by the throat, only to be stretched senseless to blow from a musket. Oh, sir, if that had been my home, you would have dropped upon your knees in snow, under the midnight skies, as I did, and you would have registered a burning vow with God never to give, never to spare, always to follow, and always to murder—if you will call it so—those devilish miscreants while you lived; and you would have believed it your religion to keep your oath, as I have done."

I saw at once that it would be folly to try to reason with such fervid, impassioned, conscientious hatred.

"But the question now is," said the scout, "what am I going to do?"

"I think that you had better start for Tennessee tonight, join Wheeler's cavalry, go into the service regularly, do your whole duty to your country like a brave, capable man as you are, and try to get over this intense hatred which makes you a devil, not a man."

The scout pondered this scheme for some time. Then, with a dreary, broken-hearted sigh, he answered: "Perhaps you may be right. I have a horse at a farm ten miles out in the country. I will go and sleep until midnight and then start for Tennessee."

"You can lie on my bed there and sleep. I will wake you at 2 o'clock."

"No, I always go off by myself to sleep. I cannot rest at all unless out of sight and out of hearing of every one else."

A short time afterward Tucker left to join Wheeler's cavalry in Tennessee, and I never saw him afterward.

One day, while we were at Atlanta, I got a letter from a lady saying that there was a girl at her house who had been mortally hurt by a piece of shell, and who wanted to see me before she died. I went to the house.

"You do not recognize me?" said the girl.

"No."

"Turn back the sheet and look at my breasts," she said. "I am dying and there can be no impropriety in your doing so."

I did as she requested. There was a livid, triangular scar in the white flesh, beyond doubt a bayonet wound.

"Do you know me now?" she said, with a moving smile.

"Yes," said I, "you are the sister of 'Tucker, the Scout,' of whom he told me long ago."

"No—you are wrong again," she said. "I am 'Tucker, the Scout' myself. I cured a girl at Canton of her love for me by telling her I was a woman. Then again she feebly laughed—a mocking, wicked, tantalizing laugh."

She was as hard as flint. In vain I tried to soothe her heart in view of her rapidly approaching death, and I left her, bright, beautiful, vindictive, unforgiving, when she "still-hunted" the Yankees about Vicksburg.

I called the next day, and found that she was dead. The perfect corpse lay in quiet rest. The hard, brilliant, impenetrable, impenitent soul had fled.

Often I ask myself the question: "Was this insane?"

A paper of India, representing garrison sentiment, rages at Mr. Bryan because of his disapproval of British rule in that empire, and it crushingly reminds him that Americans do not treat the negroes any better than the English treat the Indians.

MARK TWAIN'S COLONEL SELLERS.

Can the Writer Recognize His Characters in the Dramatist's Work?

A new generation of theatre-goers is crowding into the front rows of the orchestra circle and the rear rows of the gallery the survivors of the older one that remembers the comedian John T. Raymond as Colonel Sellers, a dramatization of Mark Twain and Charles Dudley Warner's "The Gilded Age." To those who can recall the actor and his wide success there is interest in Mark Twain's recent declaration that the Colonel Sellers presented on the stage did not realize the character of the book, and was not at all like the man whose ventures and eccentricities made a taking feature of the story. Furthermore, the author says that Raymond lacked the refinement and sympathetic nature required to portray with fidelity such a character.

Many have read the book who never saw the play, and there are still thousands who are familiar with both the story and the drama, and all will find curious suggestions in Mark Twain's statement and be moved to ask questions, some of which will never be answered with authority. Did Raymond's portrayal win sympathy for the character? Can a comedian play a part that is foreign to his real nature? Are the ideals of the novelist often realized in the dramatization of his story? Does the dramatist or the actor "create" the part? What part has the appreciation or whim of the audience in developing the play and the tone of its characters? All of these queries and more, spring out of Mark Twain's objection.

Raymond did play the part in a hard, unsympathetic manner. He did not present the genial yet dignified, sophisticated yet refined, day-dreaming gentleman of the old school that Mark Twain tells us Colonel Sellers is in real life; but he did act the busy-brained, enthusiastic and impractical, over-sanguine and impecunious American that more than half of the millions who saw him on the stage knew personally under some other name. John T. Raymond was not a Joseph Jefferson, and the charm of a gentle, kindly nature did not surround his work in any part. The scene in the play most easily recalled, the dinner of raw turnips and cold water set before a visitor, and extolled and urged upon him, was the wrong key for many in every audience. One can compare his appeal as Colonel Sellers with that of Jefferson as Golightly in "Lend Me Five Shillings." One that ever saw it can forget the half-timid, half-desperate, but altogether winning way in which Golightly asked a loan of friends and strangers as they came from the ball-room, at first with hurried, anxious words, and then, when disappointed again and again, in dumb show. Among my earliest memories of theatrical events is the scene of "The Old Curiosity Shop"—a stage version presented by Katie Putnam and what was probably an average company of those days, thirty-five years ago. I may not have been a great performance, but it made me distinctly real to me the personages of a story that even then I had read more than once. Little Nell and the Marchioness, both played by Miss Putnam, Dick Triveler, Quilp, Sampson and Sally Brass, I have seen in the flesh, and I shall not willingly forget them. But in that company the poet who made the stanza about the seditious "donkey that wouldn't go" to Mrs. Jarley's wax-works—a comedian named Woodford—did not win my youthful and uninformed approval. He was thin and apparently hungry, and he surreptitiously filled his hat with biscuits from the table, which was not unpardonable; but he lifted his hat and spilled its contents when he went out, merely to gain a laugh, and spoiled his effort. In "A Poor Relation," the always genial and clever Sol. Smith Russell was tempted to rob the pocket of his cracker, but he did not sacrifice the sympathy of the audience by clowning.

Whether an actor can play a part foreign to his nature, nobler, gentler part that he plays off the stage, is easily answered. It can not be doubted that many have accomplished it, and to the satisfaction of the critical. The imagination of the auditor is a great factor in all the achievements of the actor. Mere tricks of elocution produce effects that are not to be reasoned away. I have heard a drunken, dissolute player read verses from the Scriptures in a manner more seriously impressive than any pulpit presentation it has been my fortune to hear. The consistent development of a character through the succeeding acts of a drama is something more than a momentary satisfying impression, however; but if an actor who is not entirely conscienceless can play Richard, why may not one who is not a Bayard in private life play the knight without fear and without reproach in his brief hour on the stage?

It is doubtful if the novelist often sees his ideals in the scenes of a drama made from his book. The playwright knows so much of the story as he needs; he fashions the episodes and moves the puppets in the way he thinks most effective before the footlights; even if he is not possessed of a thorough knowledge of stagecraft he is always anxious to supervise the rehearsals of his play and to advise and criticize the actors who assume the various roles. And the stage manager, who is the one being of supreme authority behind the scenes, and often a genius of arrangement and interpretation, makes and unmakes the playwright's work. Few actors, even among the greatest, but rely upon the judgment of the stage manager, and, willy-nilly, submit to accompaniments and plans of harmony which he has devised.

There are hundreds of striking, well-known characters in fiction that have never been presented on the stage. Dickens has painted a long line of portraits, distinct in feature, complete in equipment, but the theatre has known and retained only a few of them. Joseph Jefferson's Caleb Plummer, a small part in a short story, is one of the best; Fanny Davenport's Nancy Sikes, another dramatic bit, with only one scene of strength; Lotta's and Katie Putnam's Little Nell and the Marchioness; Edmund Collier's Fagin, and, in these later days, Henry Miller's Sidney Carton—these are the best known.

There is better mining-camp drama in Bret Harte's stories than in most of the plays whose scenes are laid in the gold-fields, yet it has been won from the printed pages with greater difficulty than the yellow metal from the gravel-beds. Annie Pixley found a fitting part in "M'liss," but she has had no successor. Stuart Robson tried to make Colonel Starbottle real, but the "Two Men of Sandy Bar" did not long hold the stage. The play was produced in Washington in 1876. Looking back to that performance in memory now, I can recall but one situation—the scene in which Colonel Starbottle and the Mexican select each a weapon from the pair hidden under the table-cover, fate to decide which is the loaded pistol. The loquacious colonel chooses the moment after the pistols are taken and raised to aim in which to tell a funny story about a cross-eyed man who suddenly finds himself in financial straits, and the story and its sequel are still remembered, but all else of the drama and its characters has faded. The playwright's work was not well done.

Twenty-eight years ago Ada Cavendish, a talented English actress, came to America and appeared in a stage version of Wilkie Collins's story, "The New Magdalen," but her success was not equal to her anticipations. Last year a more dextrous hand made "Zira" of the same story, and Margaret Anglin, a more magnetic actress, it is true, in its leading role won instant recognition of fresh emotional power. Augustin Daly, a great stage manager and clever adapter, took Wycherly's old comedy, "The Country Wife," and made of it a play that could be seen with unmixed pleasure by modern audiences. In it Ada Rehan was at her best, and Peggy will be fondly remembered longer than her Rosalind, Katherine, or Lady Teazle.

There are figures in history as well as in fiction that defy the power of the dramatist. No playwright, stage manager, or player has had the art to summon from the shades the French peasant-girl, warrior and mystic, Jeanne d'Arc. Even Mark Twain found her character an elusive one, and his story of her life, despite the glory of its theme, is, perhaps, the least attractive of his books.

G. L. S.

San Francisco, October, 1906.

Many things can be forgotten in forty-seven years, and probably few Americans remember the story of the slave-ship Clotilde that was run into Mobile bay and burned one dark night in 1859, and how its cargo of slaves was dumped off into the canebrakes and left, some to be picked up and sold, some to wander about and starve, and some to die of homesickness. Hardly a dozen of the old Clotilde's victims are alive, though numbers of their children live near the settlement and have intermarried with the common negro. Few of the captured ones had been more than twenty at the time of their enslavement, and all remembered the horrible details as if they had been experiences of a recent time. They were more stalwart in appearance and of finer physique than the American negro whose ancestors have been long in bondage. Their eyes were brighter too, their voices even softer and more melodious.

Governor Magoon is not favorably impressed with the Chinese as a factor in the construction of the Panama Canal. "There are at present from two to three thousand Chinese on the isthmus," said Governor Magoon, "and as a citizen I do not think they make desirable laborers. They can not be depended upon as can the Barbadoes or the native negro. As soon as the Chinese has earned enough money he starts a shop of his own and the Government loses a man."

The blowing of electric light bulbs at the present time is done by hand, and the operation is therefore slow; but a piece of machinery to do this work has been recently patented by a mechanical engineer of Toledo, O. The machine is said to reduce the cost of bulb production to one-quarter the present figures.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Speaker Cannon will take the stump for Charles E. Hughes, the Republican candidate for Governor of New York.

The resignation of Congressman James N. Gillett has been received officially by Governor Pardee, who will at once issue a call for a special election to fill the vacancy.

Judge Benjamin B. Lindsey of Denver is a candidate for Governor of Colorado, heading an independent ticket which endorses the Democratic nominees with the exception of two—Charles P. Caswell for the Supreme Court and Charles R. Dudley for Regent of the State University—from the Republican ticket.

Judge John Garber has filed with the Democratic State Central Committee his formal declination of the nomination to the Appellate Bench of the San Francisco district. The nomination was given the judge without his having been consulted. In his communication he regrets his inability to accept the honor, and states that his business will not permit of his making the canvass.

Sampel Gompers, president of the American Federation of Labor, was interviewed last week regarding the report that he would go to California and stump the State for Theodore Bell, according to a news dispatch. "There is nothing in the report," he said. "I have no intention of going to California during this campaign, consequently will not stump the State for anybody." Mr. Gompers said he had no recollection of Bell.

The President has appointed Judge Charles Magoon, just returned from the Panama zone, to be Governor of Cuba. It was at first believed that the President had decided upon Governor Beekman Winthrop. Minister Quesada will remain in Washington in that capacity, and be accredited to the provisional government. Quesada is recommended for the retention of his place by Taft and Bacon.

Congressman Julius Kahn of the Fourth California District, whose nomination for re-election by the Republicans had been endorsed by the Union Labor party, has been marked by President Gompers of the American Federation of Labor as unfriendly. A resolution was passed last Saturday by the San Francisco Labor Council instructing the Union Labor party to withdraw Kahn's name from the ticket and substitute that of D. S. Hirshburg, the Democratic nominee.

When Mr. "Finky" Conners, the leader of the Erie County "Democracy," heard from one of his lieutenants that certain delegates had fled his ranks, he remarked:

"Well, we're here, ain't we?
The rest of 'em,
Tell wid 'em!"

Which phrase is apt to take its place as a classic among the shortest of poems in the English language, says the New York World.

The shreds of senatorial courtesy are flying all over New Jersey after Senator La Follette's week at hammering his Republican colleagues, Senators Dryden and Kean, observes the Springfield (Mass.) Republican. The tour ended with large meetings in Jersey City and Hoboken. La Follette's last words were that Dryden and Kean were unfit to be in the United States Senate because they stood for corporate instead of public interests.

Concerning the vacancy in the United States Supreme Court, the President is reported to have said that no conclusion would be reached until Secretary Taft had returned to the United States and there was an opportunity for consultation with him. Various names have been suggested to the President for the place in the event that Secretary Taft declines the position and these include Judge Horace H. Lurton of the Sixth Judicial Circuit Court and Attorney-General Moody.

Clark Howell was the acknowledged leader of the Democrats of Georgia. He is the National Committee-man, the editor of the leading newspaper of the State, and the intellectual giant of the party. He has been slated for upward of two years for the Governorship which Hoke Smith has now won away from him. A year ago Smith was casually mentioned for Governor in a newspaper, says the Minneapolis Journal. The Howell paper declared that nothing would please Mr. Howell more than to illustrate to Mr. Hoke Smith how dead he was politically by beating him for Governor. Hoke Smith, who is placid, was inclined to let the challenge pass, but his wife took the paper to his study and declared that, for the honor of his children, he must announce himself a candidate for Governor and beat Clark Howell. Like a good citizen, Hoke Smith obeyed his wife, and the result is that he is just as good as elected Governor of Georgia, and Mr. Howell's halo hangs in tatters round his ears.

JAPAN'S FIRST ENGLISH TEACHER.

Ranald McDonald of Oregon, Who Prepared the Way for Commodore Perry.

Early in the spring of 1824, at Astoria, Oregon, there was born to Archibald McDonald, chief factor of the Hudson Bay Company, and Princess Sunday, his Chinook wife, a son, Ranald McDonald. Seventy years later, in 1894, Sir Ranald died at Fort Colville, Washington, after world-wanderings that were crowded with romance and strange adventure. McDonald was a prominent figure in the exciting incidents of the closing days of the Hudson Bay Company's dominancy in Oregon, but ere the Americans had established their dominion in the Northwest he crossed to Japan and established a school there, some months before Commodore Perry opened the Hermit Empire to the world. McDonald's pupils acted as interpreters during Perry's treaty negotiations. In his last years he requested Eva Emery Dye to write the story of his life, which has just been published under the title, "McDonald of Oregon."

In his youth McDonald had nursed at Vancouver a party of Japanese whose typhoon-swept junk had been cast on the Oregon coast. Their story of the wonders of their island home had inspired him to attempt a journey there, although it was supposed to be certain death for the foreigner who ventured into Japan. In 1843, while young McDonald was in Elgin, Canada, the Oregon boundary question was settled, and, as grandson and next in kin to the late King Cumcumly, of the Chinooks, he was entitled to a handsome inheritance, but he chose, instead, to carry out his cherished plans and break into Japan. Journeying to New York City, he shipped before the mast on board the whaler Plymouth, Captain Edwards, master. Edwards was short of hands and agreed to McDonald's stipulation that he should sell him a small boat and allow him to leave the ship off the coast of Japan. The daring young navigator scuttled his little sloop when in sight of one of the islands, and determined to place himself at the mercies of the Japanese as a ship-wrecked sailor. He was fortunate at the beginning to gain the friendship of one Tankaro:

By degrees intimacy sprang up with Tankaro; his desire to learn English seemed not less than that of Ranald's for Japanese. Pointing to objects with eye and mouth and ear open and intent, he asked the name, repeating the word over and over with avidity, seeming deeply to impress it upon the tablets of his memory.

"And now give me the Japanese," always Ranald insisted.

Cutting a pen from a crow quill—to the surprise of all, for many came to watch him—Ranald commenced a phonographic vocabulary of words and Japanese colloquial expressions with English equivalents. Whipping out his little book roll of mulberry-bark paper, Tankaro, too, dashed away with his writing brush from top to bottom, from right to left. A born vocabulist, Tankaro soon surpassed Ranald's little lexicon. But the overseers, when they noticed, shook their doubting heads. "No, no, no, this may not be according to the law." Nevertheless, in secret Ranald endeavored to keep up his study of the language.

Ranald's stores were minutely examined and inventoried, and a sketch was made of every article of interest—his quadrant, his boat, kegs, and anchor. Everything was measured, even the thickness of the sides of the chest. Most particularly his woolsens were scrutinized—sheep were unknown in Japan—and the height and dimensions of his person were taken. Five feet eight inches, broad shouldered, full-chested, stout, and muscular, Ranald McDonald was something of a giant among the diminutive Japanese.

McDonald's slight knowledge of their language, his brown skin and his almost Japanese features seem to have disposed his captors in his favor, and he was well treated on his journey to Nagasaki, although heavily guarded. At Nagasaki he first met Moryama Yenoke, who subsequently was "described, sketched, and photographed" by every envoy that visited Japan fifty years ago. As the weeks went by McDonald was constantly brought before the officials for questioning:

Every day now, more and more, Moryama and Saxtero, the interpreters, lingered at the cage of Ranald, quizzing, questioning, hungry, eager to find out about the world outside of Japan. Off and on, others had been coming from the first, until presently, appointed by the Governor of Nagasaki, fourteen came daily as pupils in English—Nish Youtchero, Wirriama Saxtero, Moryama Yenoke, Nish Katara, Akawa Ki Ejuro, Shoya Tamasabero, Nikiama Shoma, Eromade Dinoko, Sujake Tatsuetoro, Hewashe Yasaro, Judgero Shogie, Hori Tatsunoske, Namoura Tainozke, and Motke Sayeom—all bright and eager, all student samurai of the double sword. Every day these young interpreters came to read English, Ranald correcting and explaining. But Moryama especially was quick, keen, and receptive, astonishing in rapid acquirement.

"Moryama Yenoke speaks Dutch better than I do," one day remarked John Levyssohn, Holland's representative, the only white man allowed in Japan. A little later Ranald found his pupil poring over a Latin grammar.

"Have you ever been outside of Japan?" the American inquired.

"No, but I have a large library, and I am studying Latin and French." In French, too, Ranald could help him; it had been almost the language of his childhood.

More and more on winter nights Ranald's cage became a house of reception, lit with wax candles on low, square stands. With shaven midscalps, and topknots, men of all orders—students, military officers, priests, nobles, two-sworded samurai, and daimios—came to see and talk with the first teacher of English in Japan. Afar off on the rainy walks he could hear the clatter of their wooden clogs coming.

"Your honorable health?" they were soon inquiring.

With books and night lanterns and boxes of sweetmeats they were filling in, hoving profusely. Heating a kettle over his brazier, pulling out pipes and filling the tiny bowl to smoke, passing cakes and drinking hot "sake" out of delicate teacups like those brought by Ewa and Kioko to Vancouver, they asked questions. Those cups reminded Ranald of many things. Like the spinner of the thousand and one tales of the Arabian Nights, he told them of Oregon and the fur trade, the great migrations, the project of cutting railroads through lofty mountain chains to the west, the wonders of the locomotive and steamboat, the war with Mexico, its battles and victories.

Map in hand, eager and attentive, they heard of the accession of California, and the discovery of gold, the last word Ranald brought from the Anglo-Saxon world. There was no discussion; only questions, always questions, which Ranald freely answered, as far as he could. But he noted an evasion of any information concerning Japan in return.

Still sipping hot "sake," "And you were born—"

"Here," placing his finger on Astoria. "Destined to become a great seaport," he added, dreaming not of Portland, Seattle, and San Francisco. Puget Sound was traced, and the course of ships in the Pacific.

"All about whaling and the number of vessels," they urged.

Long and often this subject was dilated upon. "Japan would be a good place for supplies," said Ranald, "for coal, provisions, and water."

"No," objected Moryama, with emphasis at every such suggestion. "No ship can approach the coast. No ship can enter our harbors. It is against the law."

Not even Japanese who had left the country could return, as Ranald very well knew, for at the expulsion of the Portuguese the proclamation was made: "No Japanese ship or boat whatever, or any native of Japan shall presume to go out of the country. * * * All Japanese who return from abroad shall be put to death."

On the 26th of April, McDonald was informed that an American man-of-war, the Preble, with Commander James Glynn and Lieutenant Silas Bent, had arrived at Nagasaki to demand that fifteen shipwrecked sailors of the whaler Ladoga be delivered to them. McDonald was not ready to leave Japan, and he felt, too, that they were not ready to give him up, but dared no longer detain him. He had been among them for six months. The release and surrender of these seamen was probably the first instance in which the stubborn policy of the Japanese had yielded to the demands of foreigners. Copies of the depositions of the rescued seamen were dispatched by special ship to the United States. Then came Perry. In later years McDonald received many guests at Fort Colville, among them Mrs. Elizabeth Custer, in 1891. To her he said:

"Yes, I flatter myself that I was the instigator of Commodore Perry's expedition to Japan. You will find my depositions in executive document number fifty-nine of the Thirty-second Congress. That started Perry. I suggested to Captain Glynn of the ship Preble that in the event of another visit to Japan for the purpose of opening trade, models of Western ingenuity should be taken and exhibited. And Commodore Perry did that. I broke the seal that made Japan a closed empire—at all events cracked it, so it was easy for Commodore Perry to do the rest."

When Perry was preparing for his expedition to Japan he called upon manufacturers and machinists for samples of American art and inventions:

Manufacturers, inventors, and publishers fell in with the novel idea, one firm especially manufactured a small locomotive, tender, passenger car, and rails complete, to be laid down in Japan; another sent bundles of wires and an outfit of telegraphic instruments. Clocks, watches, stoves, military arms of the latest pattern, muskets, pistols, rifles, swords, balls and cartridges, samples of furniture, life-boats, books, weights, measures, garden seeds and agricultural implements enough to set up a small exposition were assigned to the indefatigable Commodore.

By diplomacy, by kindness, by resolute firmness, by arguing them into reasonableness, Commodore Perry had forced a consideration of the treaty on the reluctant Japanese, and the day finally came for landing the presents.

Moryama, who had been chief arbiter as well as interpreter in the treaty for coal, wood, water, provisions, and the saving of ships and their crews in distress—Moryama, who had translated the letter of the Emperor in reply to that of President Fillmore—Moryama, who with the prefect was to decide prices of merchandise and articles of harter—Moryama Yenoke, the indispensable, was now appointed to arrange for the reception of the presents intended for the Emperor. Officials with silk draperies trailing on the ground watched while the boats came ashore. Japanese workmen in mushroom hats and straw sandals jumped around constructing suitable sheds for the protection of machinery, and laying off level ground for the circular track of the miniature railroad. American officers and workmen were unpacking the mysteries of the boxes. On that day closed ancient history in Japan.

The telegraphic apparatus was set up, a mile in length, from the treaty house to a building specially erected, where the first message was flashed in Japan. The railroad was laid, and the locomotive spun, trailing a miniature train. A camera was set up, and the princes were daguerretyped—"spirit pictures" they called them; fires were built in stoves and pots began to boil; clocks, wound up, began to tick and strike; life-boats were launched on the stormy bay; agricultural implements and machinery began to buzz and hum; scales, weights, measures, maps, charts, books, furniture, window glass, telescopes, and perfumery—in short, an international industrial exposition was set up on the grounds adjoining the treaty house at Yokobama. Perry with his modern world had sailed back into the feudal ages, and they, at one stride, had stepped into today.

Affairs moved rapidly after the departure of Perry from Japan. While all America was listening for news of the Pacific railroad surveys, Perry came home, in January, '55, and, as the last act of a long and useful life, bailed down his flag in Brooklyn navy yard. In July, Townsend Harris was appointed the first Consul-General to Japan.

Already the Japanese had learned to manage the little locomotive the Commodore had given them, and had the life-boat afloat with a trained crew, but the telegraph was too mysterious. Eagerly Moryama asked for books on military and naval science, and medicine. Despite precautions, cholera had come, devastating Japan. Within two weeks after Perry left, an American clipper from San Francisco had entered Yedo Bay.

From the very hour of Perry's treaty Japan began to arm against the foreigner. Already a thousand brass howitzers had been cast after the model the Commodore had given them, copied down to the minutest particular, even to the percussion caps and drag ropes, with cartridges of paper and wads of wood. Brass drums had been copied from the Dutch.

Scientific batteries were in process of erection, steamships and gunpowder were being purchased, military and naval schools were opening all over Japan, and arsenals were in process of erection.

But the Japanese nobles were determined to make the last stand against the demands of the Americans. Fourteen out of eighteen powerful daimios protested to the Shogun not to open the country:

The world knows the rest, how step by step America taught her most eager pupils, the little brown men of Japan, showing them how to make a treaty, shaping it up and explaining every feature, pushing wider the little opening of the door that had been unlatched by Perry.

This meant no end of troubles. The great strain of it threw the American Consul into a fever, increasing the devotion and solicitude of Moryama. But the treaty, the precious treaty was ready, when Perry's old flagship, the Mississippi, brought secret word to the American Consul—"The allied fleets of Great Britain, France, and Russia are sailing to Yedo Bay."

"Must you have a fleet and cannon balls for arguments?" demanded Harris from his sick bed. "You must open Japan, or the navies of the earth will be thundering at your gate. Sign at once, and save yourselves."

And Il Kamon, summoned in this crisis to the Shogunate, did what no other Japanese dared—he signed Japan's first treaty of commerce with a foreign land. When the fleets came in, all was accomplished. "Gentlemen, we have a treaty with the United States," said Il Kamon. England, France, Russia, and twenty nations after them followed with treaties in rapid succession, all based on that first one, made by the American Consul and Moryama Yenoke. But it lost Il Kamon his head at the assassin hand of the Prince of Mito, who would be Shogun. It ended the Shogunate, and restored the Mikado, imprisoned and invisible for two hundred and fifty years. In the outcome, the boy, Mutsu Hito, sixteen years of age, came to the throne, and rules to this day, fifty years from the opening of Japan.

OLD FAVORITES.

Columbus.

"[Columbus compelled them to keep on the way, and on Friday, October 12, 1492, he was sighted.]"

Behind him lay the gray Azores,
Behind the Gates of Hercules;
Before him not the ghost of shores,
Before him only shoreless seas.

The good mate said: "Now must we pray,
For lo! the very stars are gone.
Brave Admiral, speak, what shall I say?"
"Why, say, 'Sail on! sail on! and on!'"

"My men grow mutinous day by day;
My men grow ghastly wan and weak."
The stout mate thought of home; a spray
Of salt wave washed his swarthy cheek.
"What shall I say, brave Admiral, say,
If we sight naught but seas at dawn?"
"Why, you shall say at break of day,
'Sail on! sail on! sail on! and on!'"

They sailed and sailed, as winds might blow,
Until at last the blanching mate said:
"Why, now not even God would know
Should I and all my men fall dead.
These very winds forget their way,
For God from these dread seas is gone.
Now speak, brave Admiral, speak and say—"
He said: "Sail on! sail on! and on!"

They sailed. They sailed. Then spake the mate
"This mad sea shows his teeth tonight.
He curls his lip; he lies in wait,
With lifted teeth as if to bite!
Brave Admiral, say but one good word:
What shall we do when hope is gone?"
The words leapt like a leaping sword:
"Sail on! sail on! sail on! and on!"

Then, pale and worn, he kept his deck,
And peered through darkness. Ah, that night
Of all dark nights! And then a speck—
A light! A light! A light! A light!
It grew; a starlit flag unfurled!
It grew to be Time's burst of dawn.
He gained a world; he gave that world
Its grandest lesson: "On! sail on!"

On Sir Francis Drake.

You, whose exploits the world itself admired,
Admire the strange exploits of peerless Drake.
And you whom neither lands nor seas have tir'd
Have tried your tongues when they rehearse make

What bard adventures he did undertake;
Then if that such Atlantes are too weak,
What marvel if this weight our shoulders bear

O you once matchless monarchs of the seas,
But now advanced to an higher place,
Invested Viceroy and high Satrapes,
In that fair palace near the mulken race;
O think not that his praise doth yours deface,
If he be justly praised, you justly grace,
Your graces by his praise are not defaced.

So in the May-tide of his summer age,
Valor enmowed the mind of vent'rous brake.
To lay his life with winds and wage in gage,
And bold and hard adventures undertake,
Leaving his country for his country's sake:
Loathing the life that cowardice doth stain,
Preferring death, if death might honor gain.

At Cuha silver, at Coquimbo gold,
At China cloth and precious silks he found.
Pearl at the Pearled Isles he did behold;
Rich cochineels hoarded did abound,
Enbosomed in Tichamachalco's ground:
Thus his industrious labor still did raise
The public profit and his private praise.

He that hath been where none but he hath been Leaving the world behind him as he went;
He that hath seen that none but he hath seen
Searching if any other world unken,
Lay yet within the Ocean's bosom pent:
Even he was Drake; O could I say he is,
No music would revive the soul like this.

He that did pass the Straits of Magellan,
And saw the famous island Mogadore;
He that unto the Isle of Mayo came,
Where winter wretched grapes in plenteous store
He that the Isle of Fogo passed before,
A second Etna where continual smoke
Of brimstone burning vaults the air doth choke

He that at Brava saw perpetual spring
Gracing the trees with never-fading green,
Like laurel branches ever flourishing:
He that at Taurapaza's port had been:
He that the rich Molucca's Isles had seen:
He that a new-found Albion described,
And safely home again his hark did guide.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

The Countess of Minto, who did so much to aid the work of the Victorian Order of Nurses in Canada, has now undertaken a similar work in India, where her husband succeeded Lord Czon as governor-general.

Miss Clara Clemens, the talented daughter of Mark Twain, made her debut as a concert singer before a fashionable audience in Norfolk, Conn., a few days ago. Miss Clemens is said to have a contralto voice, and pleased all who heard her.

The Sultan of Turkey, Abdul Hamid, objects to ordinary medical precautions. Under no circumstance will he have his temperature taken, as he is afraid of having the thermometer put in his mouth or under his arm lest the instrument explode.

A man in Washington was trying to secure a plaster cast of the President's face. "How long will it take to make the cast?" Mrs. Roosevelt asked. "Twenty minutes," was the reply. "That settles it," answered Mrs. Roosevelt. "No woman power could induce my husband to remain still for twenty minutes."

Madame Elizabeth Rosen, one of the finest equestriennes and most expert golfers in Washington, has been teaching the maids of Magnolia, Md., what a daring swimmer can do. This daughter of the Russian ambassador speaks all the polite languages of Europe and knows six or eight of the Slav dialects.

Jonathan Straus, who has just closed his fourteenth season of distributing pasteurized milk in New York city, serves notice that the demand has passed the bounds of private munificence. Mr. Straus has given in the past year, free to the poor, milk at the nominal price of 1 cent a bottle. He is now wishing to pay, more than three million dollars, for the milk.

My recently gave this bit of sunny philosophy to an interviewer: "If there is the tiniest speck of color in the sky, and there nearly always is, I color it, and that makes the whole heaven blue for me. I spend three hours daily in the open air, walking or driving in an open carriage; and I am accustomed myself to bear the extremes of summer and winter."

When John Burns visited Belgium recently he did not take with him his insignia of office, nor did he carry an official letter on ahead through the Foreign Office. He went to the labor colonies, prisons, and other institutions unexpectedly and unannounced, but he was quickly recognized and all doors were thrown open at the words "Je suis John Burns," every courtesy was shown to the workman Minister, and all information was readily granted to him.

James R. Howe, formerly register of deeds in Brooklyn, received fees amounting to more than $50,000 during his term of office, and he has given them back to the borough in the form of a bronze equestrian statue representing Washington at Valley Forge. The statue, with its pedestal, is thirty-five feet in height, and was conceived and executed by Henry Merwin Shady. It stands in the plaza at the Brooklyn end of the Williamsburg bridge, and was unveiled a few days ago with appropriate ceremonies.

Apologies have just been made to Marie Corelli by the London Daily Mail, which quoted as a personal expression the following passage from her novel, "Temporal Power": "I have never loved any man, because from my very childhood I have hated and feared all men. I loathe their presence, their looks, their voices, their manners—if one touches my hand in ordinary courtesy my instincts are offended and revolted and the sense of outrage remains with me for days." Those, it seems, are not her personal sentiments.

During Lord Kitchener's recent tour in northern India a non-commissioned officer in his escort became exceedingly intoxicated, and fell from his horse. Next day the man was ordered to appear before Lord Kitchener, and was fully prepared for severe punishment. To his surprise, the commander-in-chief received him alone in his tent, and gave him a sound talking to about the folly of taking strong drinks in a hot climate. Kitchener finally sent him back to his place after making him promise not to drink again while on duty.

Much of the beauty of the Czarina comes from exquisite coloring, and there is about her a subtle charm impossible to picture and difficult to describe, writes Amalia Kussner Coudert, in the Century Magazine. "She is very tall and very slender, yet most finely proportioned. Her features are almost Greek in their regularity, and the natural expression of her face struck me at once as a singularly wistful and sweet sadness that never went quite away even when she smiled. Her hair is strikingly beautiful and luxuriant, long, heavy, glossy, and brown-gold in color. Her eyes are large, soft, lustrous gray-blue, with long lashes, and I painted them cast down, as they nearly always are; for she is shy, and hardly ever looks up without a blush."

Augustus Thomas has recently devoted a large part of his time, and some of his royalties, to learning French in France, says Harper's Weekly. But he came back in time to welcome Mr. Bryan in New York, just as he stumped for him in 1900. The money that Mr. Thomas takes in at the box office, the houses for rent with which he covers his land at New Rochelle, his extensive cultivation of French roots—all these have not made him any less of a lover of the masses than he was when he swung a lantern in the railroad yard at St. Louis, or barn-stormed through Missouri, or made caricatures for a daily paper.

Mme. Melba, in spite of contrary reports, refuses to consent to the proposed early marriage of her son, George Nesbit Armstrong, and Miss Ruby Otway. Mme. Melba was married to Captain Armstrong at the age of seventeen, and the bitter results of her own early marriage have caused her to exact from her son the promise to wait two or three years. Some time ago Mme. Melba settled many thousands of dollars upon her only son, and he will inherit all her property. Miss Otway is a handsome girl. The combined ages of the young lovers total only thirty-eight years. The trustees for her son's money are Alfred Rothschild and Earl de Grey.

The career of Hon. William Pinkney Whyte, of Maryland, has been a notable one. Besides having been mayor of Baltimore and comptroller and Governor of his State, he has been at considerable intervals apart three times a member of the United States Senate. He served in that body by appointment in 1868-9, by election in 1875-81, and is now, by appointment, filling the vacancy caused by the death of Senator Gorman. Mr. Whyte recently entered his eighty-third year. He has never tasted liquor nor used tobacco; he has never been inside of a saloon; he is not a member of any club; he has defended sixty alleged murderers in the courts and secured the acquittal of all of them; he always rides in an ordinary day car on a passenger train and on the street cars in a city; he declines to use a typewriter; he is one of the few Senators alive who, in 1869, voted against enfranchising the negroes; and he never talks politics on Sunday.

Del Monte Offers

During the reconstruction of San Francisco, Hotel Del Monte offers a welcome shelter to those desiring a home-like place for rest and recreation. The park-like grounds, the golf links, the flowers, the many walks and drives were never more attractive than at the present. The entire hotel has recently been renovated and improved, with steam heat, electric lights, hot and cold water, telephones in every room. Why not make this attractive resort near San Francisco your permanent home? Special terms for families. Address Geo. P. Snell, Manager, Del Monte, California.

"The Secret of my Success"

VANITY FAIR.

Mme. Sarah Grand has been exploiting the art of happiness, says a cable dispatch to the New York World. London has taken her conclusions as pretty sensible philosophy. Incidentally it has enjoyed hugely her compliment to "smart" society. Here are some of the things Mme. Sarah said:

"Men understand the art of happiness better than women. A woman is penny wise and pound foolish. She denies herself, and makes herself miserable in her saving, while a man will have good sense and spend his money on himself and make himself happy."

"At the moment happiness is to be found in the simpler and less expensive modes of life. The quiet entertainments of the poor are happier than the magnificent affairs of the rich, whose indifference and insolence to their guests is equaled only by the chronic state of irritation of their guests toward them."

"In 'smart' society—as it is called, to distinguish it from good society—there is no such thing as 'noblesse oblige.'"

"When we say that life is not worth living we are taking the surest steps to make it so."

A hundred or more commercial travelers delayed their departure from a Broadway hotel one day last week that they might see the 255 girl students from Radnor College, Nashville, who are making a month's tour of the country under the escort and at the expense of A. N. Eshman, president of the college. The total cost of the trip will be $15,000.

The girls, who had visited Cincinnati, Cleveland, Buffalo, Niagara Falls and Albany, arrived in New York City on the steamboat Hendrik Hudson and had promptly eaten everything the hotel dining-room afforded. Indeed the head steward had to send out for edibles.

After breakfast the girls started Broadway throngs as, in a procession of automobiles, they made a tour of the city, every now and then giving the Radnor College cry in loud chorus. The girls did not rise early, but they were worth waiting to see when they marched into the dining-room in couples, wearing the college uniform of blue waists and skirts, with black mortarboards and waving tassels. They were formed in squads of twenty-six, each squad in charge of a teacher.

There were girls from all over the South, for not Tennessee alone was represented. Some of them came from far-away Texas. Few of them had ever been in the metropolis before, and all of them wanted to see Coney Island. They were more anxious to shoot the chutes than to see Grant's Tomb or the Museum of Art. "We've just seen libraries and schools and museums until we are tired," said a brown-eyed Texan maiden, "and we ought to see the Bowers and Coney Island."

After a round of the city the party left for Atlantic City. "It has been just lovely," said Miss Knoxie Jackson, from Walter Valley, Miss., "but I do wish we could have seen Coney Island."

Recently a curious fashion of marking trunks by individual and odd devices has come into practice. It is a trick that helps to identify one's baggage instantly, even at a distance, in a crowded railway station, and thus facilitates travel, especially abroad, where so much red tape entangles baggage transportation.

Some of the devices used are queer, to say the least. A lover of dogs had brindle heads in brown and white painted at intervals on all her trunks and suit cases before sailing for Germany. She felt sure, she said, that she would be able to identify her baggage anywhere by these signs, says the Philadelphia Bulletin.

Another curious design is that of skull and crossbones, done in black, white and red, on top, sides and ends of trunks, and on the bottom of every bag, of one traveler.

Dumbbell designs in red, white and blue identify another lot of luggage. One society woman has her trunks all marked with a design of a pair of gloves, painted red, black and gold, and appearing as if just taken off the hand and carelessly tossed in the trunk.

Family crests in gold and colors are used, and college girls going abroad have curious Chinese dragons, birds, etc., done in oriental color combinations on their baggage.

H. G. Wells has been the most hotly discussed writer in London in the last ten days. The London Mail has censured his views editorially and letters from the author and from indignant critics are printed at length. Mr. Wells's idea of a perfect world as set forth in his new Socialistic novel, "In the Days of the Comet," does not seem to appeal to Englishmen, and especially not to Englishwomen. His political schemes meet with a fair measure of approval, but when he undertakes to revolutionize the world's love affairs he treads on delicate ground, as does every writer who attempts to tell us how the Utopian deals with his womenfolk.

In Mr. Wells's new scheme, men's wives no less than their goods are held in common. Ingenious objection to this having been made by Mr. Wells's reviewers, he boldly replies: "Given a great change of heart in human beings and it is not my base imagination only that assures me that in this world there would be no marrying or giving in marriage."

The reviewers are not convinced by this defense, and certainly it is an interesting inconsistency that almost the first act of Mr. Wells's hero, after the world change that follows the collision with the comet, is to marry himself, apparently, to two several ladies. Englishmen do not fancy a polygamous Utopia.

Every throne in Europe is enveloped in tobacco smoke, except those of Holland and Turkey. Queen Wilhelmina's ideas on the subject differ from those of some other women of exalted station, while Abdul Hamid is restrained by the Mohammedan religion. Moreover, every president of a republic in the old and new world, so far as is known, except President Roosevelt, and every Oriental potentate finds solace in "the weed."

Emperor William of Germany smokes huge cigarettes specially made for him. King Edward of England has always been devoted to cigarettes, but of late years has leaned more and more toward dark Havana cigars. Emperor Francis Joseph of Austria likes the Austrian-made cigar manufactured of Virginia tobacco with a straw running through it. King Leopold of Belgium is a cigarette fiend, but is frequently seen smoking a pipe.

The greatest smoker of all is the stout, ever-contented King Carlos of Portugal. It is said that he smokes forty cigars a day. King Alfonso of Spain takes an occasional cigarette only. Pius X is the first Pope who has been known to enjoy a good cigar. His predecessors confined their love of tobacco to snuff. The Khedive of Egypt burns such bad cigarettes that the English master of his household, taking pity on the diplomats, had some good ones specially manufactured for the use of the diplomatic corps.

A porcelain manufacturing company of Trenton, N. J., has one of the oddest labor troubles ever experienced by any industrial concern. Twenty-five girls have gone on a strike because the company would not let them sing while at work.

A new male foreman's first official act was an edict against singing. Indignant, the girls appealed to the office and were ordered back to work. Then the strike was on. Among the favorite selections of the girls were: "Keep on the Sunny Side," "Waiting at the Church," and "Moon Dear." The girls sang with so much zest that they could be heard a block away and it was almost impossible to transact business in the adjoining offices.

There was a climax when one of the clerks, receiving an order over the long distance telephone, was asked when the goods would be shipped. Instantly, as if in answer to the query, a shrill voice floated in from the work-room to the telephone: "When the Harvest Days Are Over, Jessie Dear." The man on the other end of the line, believing he was being ridiculed, banged up the receiver and the firm lost the order.

Gen. N. M. Curtis, in his volume, "From Bull Run to Chancellorsville," recently published, is emphatic in his declaration for youthful soldiers. He says:

"I felt it was of great importance to reduce the maximum age of recruits. The principal reasons why a young man under 22 years makes a more efficient soldier in active campaign than one 25 or older are, first, the youth's greater recuperative powers; a well-developed boy can march all day in a sleet storm, lie down at night on the wet ground, which, perchance, may freeze under him, and get up in the morning rested, and march on or go into battle, while a man of mature years may find it difficult to get up in the morning, and if he does rise, he is not so well rested as the boy; second, the boy is more ready to accept suggestions as to the possibility of overcoming obstacles, and the enthusiasm and audacity of youth will cause him to enter a difficult and hazardous undertaking with a confidence which a man of mature years can not feel; third, the boy has seldom contracted marriage, and has none of the feelings of a man with a dependent family, and if the boy has in his mind one nearer than his mother, he will be more intent on performing an act that will tend to inspire her respect, than on saving himself at the expense of his reputation."

"Courage, vigor, audacity and self-confidence are the important qualifications of a soldier, and they are possessed to a greater degree by boys near the age of 20 than by men of middle life. At least one-quarter of the men enrolled in our army in the Civil War should never have been accepted, because of advanced years or physical disabilities, and quite that number never performed a day's active duty. Not only was the service injured by their presence in camp, but the industries and professions were depleted, while the hospital expenses and the pension rolls were increased to the same extent."

Through a great part of Ireland public opinion, moulded by the clergy, separates the sexes as far as possible, notes the Edinburgh Review. At the church door, and wherever else they congregate, men group on one side, women on the other. It is not well thought of for people of opposite sexes to be seen walking along the road together even to a market. The position certainly of some ecclesiastics has been made definite by the refusal of certain bishops to allow "mixed classes" in branches of the Gaelic League. On the whole, public opinion discourages whatever can be justly or even unjustly set down as sweet-heating.

Lieut. Frank P. Lahm, of the Sixth Cavalry, U. S. A., won the international balloon and the James Gordon Bennett cup in balloon "United States," last week. The was made from Paris, and Lieut. Lahm's balloon was carried over western France, then across the channel and landed in England. Sir Vonmiller was second; Count de la V. France, third; the Hon. C. Rolls, fourth the race. The beautiful cup becomes a trophy of the Aero Club of America. The first prize of $2900 goes to Lieut. Lahm and endurance medal to Mr. Rolls, who was longest in the air. Vonmiller traveled miles. Since the American War Department assigned Lieut. Lahm to the Cavalry School at Saumur he has devoted much attention to aerostatics. He made a dozen ascensions during the summer.

A new opera is to be written for Fritz Schaefer for the season 1907-8. The name of the vehicle for the impersonator of Mlle. Modigliani will be "The Mascot of the Troop," and probably that Victor Herbert will be intrusted with the musical setting.

STAGE GOSSIP.

The Colonial Theatre, on McAllister street, near Market, the first permanent playhouse to be opened since the fire, began its career last Saturday evening. Frank Bacon, the comedian, being a favorite with Alcazar audiences and known throughout the coast circuit, headed the capable company which presented Du Somet's farcical comedy, "The Man from Mexico." Among the players in the cast were Izeta Swell, A. Burt Wassner, Milton Nobles, Jr., Essie Bacon, Elonina Oldcastle, Edna McJure, and Walter Belasco.

Robert Mantell is anxious to make the part of Othello his own. He has played Othello with success, and seeks to emulate Booth and Irving, who alternated in the parts.

Wilton Lackaye is said to make use of great skill in "make-up" in "The Law and the Man," which has been pronounced a success in Chicago. As the discharged convict his appearance vividly conjured visions of the unfortunate who had served nineteen years in the galleries for the theft of a loaf of bread. As the philanthropic mayor of Meme the actor loses his identity completely and makes a more pleasing impression than when seen as Valjean.

Josephine Cohan, no longer appearing as a member of the Cohan family, supporting her author-brother, was in the vaudeville bill at Hammerstein's New York Theatre last week, presenting a one-act comedy sketch.

The engagement is announced of Margaret Livingston Chanler and Richard Aldrich, music director of the New York Times. Miss Chanler, an Astor heiress and worth several millions, has devoted herself to reform work.

Six plays absolutely new to theatre-going New York were produced in Broadway theatres during the past week. They were the works of Stephen Phillips, the De Mille brothers, George Cohan, Israel Zangwill, Jesse Lynch Williams, and William Vaughn Moody.

Sylvia Linden, who has been selected to follow Maxine Elliott in Clyde Fitch's "Her Own Way," is one of the few women on the stage who have graduated from Vassar College. She has been identified with a number of the Pinero plays which Charles Frohman produced.

Charles Warner, the famous English actor, who went into vaudeville this winter, appearing in sketches, "At the Telephone," and in the dramatic scene from "Drink." The latter play is a dramatization of Zola's "L'Assommoir," and Warner won fame as Coupeau in a long run of the powerful drama in London. Thomas W. Kne was not less famous in the part in this country in the middle '70s.

The American invasion of Europe, in a dramatic sense, takes place in earnest when E. F. Sothern and Julia Marlowe make their first appearance in London in March in the Waldorf Theatre. The two stars will not only be seen in London, but will turn six of the greatest European capitals into a series of "one-night stands." This will be the first time that any American players have ever appeared on continental stages outside of Paris and London. The closing performance of the tour will be given at Elsinore, the town made famous by Shakespeare in "Hamlet," and situated only thirty miles from Copenhagen. As yet no performance of "Hamlet" has ever been given at Elsinore, not even by Danish players. In Paris they will do "Jeanne D'Arc" in Rome, "Francesca da Rimini"; in Berlin, "The Sunken Bell."

Booked simply as Mrs. Langtry, a name of which she says she is proud, Mrs. Hugo de Bore, the actress, arrived in New York September 29, after an absence of three years. She made her American debut in vaudeville at the Fifth Avenue Theatre in New York this week.

Edward Knoblauch, the young dramatist whose last play of Boer life, "The Shulamite," was acted at the Savoy in London last season, with Le Ashwell in the title role of the Boer wife, Dorah—and in which play she is soon to be seen in New York—is a striking example of a native-born playwright who sought a foreign field of endeavor. Mr. Knoblauch, who is a New Yorker, graduated from Harvard in the class of '90. He was ivy orator on class day, and distinguished himself during his senior year as a member of its theatrical society, the Hasty Pudding Club. He collaborated in his plays and appeared in several productions. Since going abroad he has collaborated in and written about twenty-five plays. Among them are "The Loyal Rell," a drama of the 1745 rebellion, and "The Pader Pet," in which Cyril Maude appeared. "The Shulamite" is his most conspicuous work.

Mr. Scheel, formerly of San Francisco and now conductor of the Philadelphia Orchestra, has returned from a four months' trip abroad.

Mr. Scheel and his daughter attended the famous musical festival in Salzburg, where the noted singers and musicians of the world gathered late in August to observe the 150th anniversary of the birthday of the composer, Mozart. Several compositions of new music were procured by Mr. Scheel, and will be played in Philadelphia this season.

Campanari, the baritone, who has spent his summer at Spring Lake, N. J., won the prize in a golf tournament held there recently. Mr. Campanari has also sung a great number of times at Newport, where he is a typical idol in musical and social circles. He will open his season in Texas about the middle of October.

The Orpheum.

Not for many a month will there be at the Orpheum another bill like that of last week. There may be bills presenting greater novelties, bills of more uproarious fun, bills more like a circus, or bills with more melodrama or spectacle, and very likely there will be, but not soon such a bill of singing, and youth, and sprightliness. Seven musical turns—solos, duets, trios—and, added to these, the orchestral selections that Director and Organ-Master Rosner learned years ago just how to choose for an Orpheum audience. Never before were so many singers in one bill at that house of amusement, which seems just now to be the place of all others for San Franciscans in their hours of leisure. And not only singers, with real voices, but young singers, not yet tired or languid, not yet ready to renounce enthusiasm as a vanity. In the long list only one pair whose appearance would suggest many skirmishes as well as decisive engagements with a sometimes strangely unappreciative world.

The young lieutenant and his military sweetheart, Tom Fortune and Josephine Davis, began the melodic feast to be spread on the stage, and his songs were distinctly worthy of the approval manifested even to the farthest topmost rows in the balcony. Then the wandering minstrels, Adami and Taylor, and the soprano was better than acceptable, even if a little worn. Leroy and Woodford did not offer singing as their strongest claim to favor, for Leroy is an unctuous comedian, almost in the Pete Dailey style, but they sang, singly and together, and there were no complaints. Eleanor Dorel, a dainty vocalist, with more good looks than voice, came next, and if you could not hear the words of "The Rosary," you knew what they were anyway, and your opera glass consoled you. DeHaven and Parker, in "A College Boy's Frolic," were boy and girl in appearance, and they sang new songs, well arranged, and they danced as lightly as youth has ever tripped it.

Then the most artistic number of all—the Three Roses. Charming girls, piquant and graceful, two with violins and the third with a cello. Their selections were spirited, their execution rhythmic and sure. A trio, a cello solo with piano accompaniment, then a song, with the violinists playing as they sang, and something of the gipsy in it all that stirred one's blood. Years ago Charles Reade wrote of such a feat in one of his novels; of an heir to a title who consorted with gipsies and learned his music of them, or had it in his nature, and of his ability to sing the air and play his own accompaniment, or play the melody and sing the words in a haunting second. The scene revived his description of that musical witchery. One felt almost prepared for an inharmonious contrast in the succeeding turn, but it did not come. Instead, Clifton Crawford, a polished monologist in faultless evening dress, with a really funny song or two, some whimsically amusing imitations, and a good recitation of Kipling's "Gunga Din." The Zazel and Vernon company gave their familiar pantomime, "The Elopement," but it grows funnier with age, for the pantomimists are, somehow, still young.

What becomes of vaudeville people when they grow old? They used to go into the legitimate. Den. Thompson is still with us, and numerous others, but the evolution is the other way about now. Happy people are they, if they can carry their fun, their audacity, their nimble wit, past the age when voices crack and limbs creak at the joints. And if they can not keep those treasures, they may at least go to the Orpheum and enjoy the possessions of their successors. For the vaudeville theatre will still be there.

The newcomers at the Orpheum, beginning Sunday at the matinee, are Junie McCree, the eccentric comedian, in "The Man from Denver"; the Waterbury Bros. and Ernest Tenny, in a musical skit; Raffayette's trained dogs; Fred Watson and the Morrissey sisters, in songs and dances. The holdovers include Bresina, James Thornton, Willie Eckstein, the boy pianist, and the four Bards. The attractions at the Chutes, where the Orpheum theatre is situated, are permanent yet always interesting.

Ellen Beach Yaw in Concert.

The first musical attraction of the season announced by Manager Will Greenbaum, is Ellen Beach Yaw, the famous lyric soprano, a Californian, who has pleased the leading critics of England, Italy and France. Miss Yaw returned to this country last season but arrived too late to arrange a tour and her only appearance was at Carnegie Hall, New York, in conjunction with Kubelik, the violinist. Then she returned to her home in Southern California for a rest. She is now booked to tour America at the head of a concert organization, and Manager Greenbaum has induced her to give a series of concerts in this State prior to her departure.

There will be two concerts in Oakland, both matinees, and one in San Francisco. The dates for the Oakland concerts are next Friday afternoon, October 19, and the following Wednesday afternoon, October 24, at three o'clock. The prices will range from $1.50 down to 50 cents and seats may be secured at the box office of Ye Liberty Theatre on and after Monday next.

The San Francisco concert will be given Tuesday evening, October 23, at the Christian Science Hall, corner of Scott and Sacramento, which is a new auditorium with excellent acoustic properties. The seats for this concert may be secured at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s new store on Van Ness avenue, between California and Sacramento.

SWAIN'S NEW CAFE.

The new departure at Swain's has already proved a popular success. The cafe is a handsomely appointed place of refreshment, on the ground floor, and so spacious that 250 may dine at once and with perfect service. In addition to a modern grill and long and carefully arranged menu, the cafe presents a select wine card, representing the best vintages, and including also Schlitz and Wurzbarger beers. During the dinner hour there is good music by Eugene Bressel and orchestra and a more inviting or comfortable dining-room would be hard to find. The cafe is next to the bakery which has been noted for years for the best of everything in that line, and both departments are given the same careful and efficient attention. The building is at 1111 and 1113 Post street, and all former patrons and the public generally are invited to test its capabilities.

LITERARY NOTES.

In London with an Artist.

One could wish for no better guide and mentor in that wilderness of brick and varied memories than "A Wanderer in London," by E. V. Lucas. Its author has written before this of Holland, of "Highways and Byways of Sussex," and of English towns and country lanes elsewhere with artistic perception and enduring interest, but he is a Londoner, and in the city he wanders with a method which makes every reader who has never seen, yet longs for the sights, a comprehending, fully charted, and sympathetic companion. And to those who know their London as well, it should be a suggestive, perhaps an inspiring record of rambles, odd finds, and pleasing descriptions.

There is scarcely a page in the volume which could not stand alone as a picture, a reminiscence, or a biographical note, though there is no sense of crowding information into small space or of dragging in irrelevant gossip. The chapter headings of themselves are illuminating, and innumerable and widely differing as are the nooks and corners described, it is not a confused mass of detail. Piccadilly, Mayfair, St. James's, Leicester Square, the National Gallery, the Strand and Covent Garden, Fleet Street, St. Paul's, Cheapside, the Tower, Whitechapel, Holborn, the British Museum, Kensington, Chelsea and the River, Westminster and Whitehall, are names familiar to all readers, and each neighborhood has been painted and written about many times, but Mr. Lucas gives no suggestion of tiring old straw. His knowledge is sufficient, his interest in landmarks genuine if not absorbing, and his remembrances range from Goldsmith and Lamb to Kate Greenaway and J. M. Barrie.

With an especial inclination toward the treasures of art possessed by London, Mr. Lucas gives several pages of description to the great works of the Italian masters and the northern painters, and thirty-six of the illustrations are photogravures made from famous works. These are accompanied by sixteen copies in color of pastels showing picturesque buildings and views. A carefully made index completes a book that is as handsome in dress as it is entertaining and valuable.

Russian Folk Tales.

Louise Seymour Houghton has translated "The Russian Grandmother's Wonder Tales," from the German of "Tales and Legends of South Slavonia," published twenty years ago by an eminent folk-loreist, Dr. Friedrich Kraus. The tales are told as they fell from the lips of Dr. Kraus's peasant mother, poor and illiterate, but rich and learned in the wonder-lore of her people. One rarely meets in these stories with the fays and elfins of the warmer climes, "whose midnight revels by a forest side or fountain, belated peasants see." There is in most of them a grim reflection of the severity of the conditions under which the Southern Russians live. When all ends happily there are royal feasts of meat and foaming wine and the villains of the beast stories, Petz, the bear, and Isegrim, the wolf, are always so hungry. These wonder-tales undoubtedly originated in the far East, and while the warm Oriental imagery has been chilled in the transplanting, some of them are strikingly similar to the "Arabian Nights" stories.

Whimsical Rhymes.

Carolyn Wells has collected several hundred curiosities of verse in "A Whimsy Anthology." Most of these odd fancies are very ingenious; many of them, indeed, have been written by the most famous authors, in whimsical mood; and several are among the best-known rhymes in the language. Some of these literary trifles depend for their effect on unusual typographical devices, others on the expression of a capricious thought, and still others on odd spelling or play on words. A limerick is a typical whimsy, so are tongue-twisters like "Peter Piper picked a peck of pickled peppers," etc. That classic memory rhyme, "Thirty days hath September," known by all over the age of three, is also a whimsy; so are poems that may be read this way, that way, and t'other way, and still make sense; and couplets making fun of our spelling, to the delight of the Carnegie reformers, may be found by the score in the Anthology. Poe's "The Bells," and Southey's "Cataract of Lodore," are examples of the more dignified whimsies.

The Simple Life in America.

With hat in hand, and hand on heart, the apostle of the simple life bows and beams and scatters praise, and thanks and benisons in "My Impressions of America." "We see places through our humors," some one says, "as through differently colored glasses." What more natural, then, that Charles Wagner, with President Roosevelt as his patron, and even cabmen as his disciples, as he tells us, should offer us the kindly tribute of his admiration. Not even a visit to the Chicago stock yards rouses Mr. Wagner to adverse criticism. Ah, the dear Americans, how he would love to embrace them all in a fervent Gallic hug! None of us is too humble to escape his paternal pat. "Our black brother"—in whose open face he often saw "the marks of true spirituality"—as he bends over your shoes, "considers you as a subject for his art and good intentions." Your artistic bootblack dismisses you with a broad smile, and you go away with "a good polish that lasts a week—if it doesn't rain." Thus, he naively and with much benevolence comments on our institutions. Our enthusiasm for the simple life is widespread and sincere, he believes, and if we continue in the way we are going all will be well with us.

New Publications.

Rain will dash against window panes, and winter winds will rattle shutters heedlessly to the young reader who is intent on either of four books that have just been issued. "In Eastern Wonderlands," by Charlotte Chaffee Gibson, is a story of a real trip made around the world by three children, with special reference to the Orient; "Roberta and Her Brothers," by Alice Ward Bailey, is a delightful tale of a girl who takes a mother's place; "Pelham and His Friend Tim," by Allen French, is an exciting story of adventure for boys; "Playtime," by Clara Murray, is for the very young reader. Published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

Ruel P. Smith has written a rattling good story for boys in "The Rival Campers Aloft." The adventures of this party of typical American lads, manly, courageous, athletic, will be read with eager interest by boys of all ages, who love out-door life. Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston; $1.50.

Mary Raymond Shipman Andrews's short story, "The Good Samaritan," is concerned with the humorously embarrassing experiences of a newly ordained clergyman who attempts to take home his completely intoxicated cousin. Published by McClure, Phillips & Co., New York.

Professor Wilde of the Northwestern University has translated "The History of Ancient Civilization," by Charles Seignobos of the University of Paris. The work is widely used in the secondary schools of France. Beginning with the Egyptians and Chaldeans, the book surveys the peoples of the Orient, the Hindoos, Persians, Phœnicians, Jews, Greeks, and last of all the Romans. The author has selected the most significant events in the political and social history of the various nations, and describes the customs, language, culture, art, science, religion and family life. The different topics are indicated by large, black type. A valuable feature is a comprehensive list of references for supplementary reading. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons; $1.25.

"The Renewal of Life," by Margaret Warner Morley, is a frank and wholesome study of the origin of life. The author tells how and when parents may delicately inform children of the truths of sex life. Published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago; $1.25.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

A story of the squatter days on a California ranch in the early fifties, entitled "Casa Grande," by Charles Duff Stuart of San Francisco, will be published this month.

The statement that the sister of A. Conan Doyle has written a detective story will arouse public curiosity. Here is an opportunity for a family test of the comparative fertility, in certain directions, of a man's and a woman's mind. "The Secret of the Moor Cottage," by H. Ripley Cromarsh, who is none other than the sister of A. Conan Doyle, is announced for immediate publication.

The Macmillan Company have ready the latest work of Pierre Loti, a novel entitled "Disenchanted." It is said to be, as all this author's stories are, a marvelous effect of painting in words.

Plans are on foot for the publication about the first of the year of the second part of Volume XX of Sabin's "Dictionary of Books Relating to America from Its Discovery to the Present Time." This monumental work, begun in 1868 by Joseph Sabin, is an exhaustive bibliography of publications about America, arranged alphabetically by authors, and extending, when it was discontinued in 1892, through all the names from the beginning to Smith. Some months ago the Carnegie Institution in Washington made a grant for the completion of the work to Wilberforce James, director of the Lenox Library, who was the editor of the last five volumes of the nineteen published before 1892.

A series of critical biographies, whose character is sufficiently indicated by the title "Modern Poets and Christian Teaching," is coming out. The volumes ready this autumn will be: "Robert Browning," by Frank C. Lockwood; "Richard Watson Gilder," "Edwin Markham" and "Edward Rowland Sill," by David G. Downey; "Matthew Arnold," by J. M. Dixon; "Mrs. Browning," by Martha Foote Crowe, and "Lowell," by W. A. Quayle.

"Moliere, the Poet and Man," by Hobart C. Chatfield-Taylor; Brandes's "Reminiscences of My Childhood and Youth," translated by G. M. Fox-Davies; "The World's Painters Since Leonardo," by J. W. Pattison; "The Plays of Our Forefathers," by Charles Mills Gayley, are new books on the fall list of one New York publishing house.

A new anthology, "A Pageant of Elizabethan Poetry," has been selected and made up by Arthur Symons. The period is from Spenser to Herrick, and the arrangement is not chronological, but by subjects.

Edwin Markham is preparing a volume of selections from the writings of the much-discussed mystic, Thomas Lake Harris—regarded by some as a prophet, by others as a charlatan. The biography of Mr. Harris, who died a few months ago, will probably also be written by Mr. Markham.

The cover design of Mrs. Hugh Fraser's novel about Washington's mother, "In the Shadow of the Lord," is taken from the Washington arms in an old church in England.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Ex-Congressman Eddy, of Minnesota, was known as the homeliest man in Congress. He as to speak in a small town one night, and arriving he saw in an opposition newspaper headline to the effect that "Two-faced Eddy speaks here tonight."

That evening he said: "You know, ladies and gentleman, that I'm not the man referred to in this paper. It must be some one else, for I had two faces I would wear the other one."

Nicholas Longworth went to the western end of his county to become acquainted and to capture votes. Now the town of Harrison is partly Indiana and partly in Ohio. Going to a store, Mr. Longworth made himself very agreeable, bought cigars for the crowd, jollied every one, and then asked them to vote for him. There was a long, loud laugh, and when it was over he asked:

"What is so funny?" "Oh, nothing," remarked the proprietor, "except that you are on the Indiana side of the creek. Your Ohio voters are across the way."

A school girl in a Massachusetts town had been made to acknowledge the superiority of her brothers. One day her mother remarked on the apparent utter lack of intelligence in a hen. "You can't teach a hen anything," she said. "They have ruined more of the garden than a cow or pig something, but a hen—never!" "Hm!" exclaimed the child indignantly, "I think they know just as much as roosters!"

At a dinner Senator Long was once asked by a young woman to define diplomacy. "Well," said he, "what do you do at a ball when a man asks you for a waltz and you don't wish to dance with him?" "I tell him," she replied, "that my card is full." "But supposing it isn't full?" "Then I insist it is and at the same time let him see it isn't." "That's diplomacy," said Senator Long.

Theodore Billroth, the eminent Viennese surgeon, lecturing to his class in a medical school, said that a doctor needed two gifts—he must be free from any tendency toward nausea and he must be a good observer. He then poured a nauseous fluid into a glass, dipped one of his fingers into it and licked it off, whereupon he invited the students to follow his example. Without flinching they did so. With a broad grin the surgeon looked at them and said: "You have passed the first test brilliantly. Not so the second, for none of you observed that I dipped my first finger into the glass, but licked the second!"

The Wolf Hopper was calling down a speak-in-tube to the janitor of his apartment in New York. Mr. Hopper, unable to get the information desired, finally blurted out, "Say, is there a blaring idiot at the end of this tube?" The reply came back with startling rapidity, "Not at the end, sir."

"Pray do not rise," she said, as an old man rose in a trolley car to give the young woman his seat. "But I—" began the old man. "No; please don't," and she gently pushed the old man back into the seat. After the car had gone a block the old man again attempted to rise. "I'll be of you, sir, please don't," the young woman said. She was very pretty and her daintily gloved hand once more rested on his shoulder as she gently pushed him back. And she posed for our more blocks, until the old man once more ventured to rise from his seat. Again the pretty one was argued. "Really, I don't mind it, sir," she said. "That's all very well for you, miss," said the old man, "but I do. I want to get out. I've gone six blocks beyond my street already."

A leading American politician recently took his little son to Washington, where they paid a visit to the Senate gallery.

Edward Everett Hale specially interested the boy, and his father explained that Dr. Hale was chaplain of the Senate.

"What he prays for the Senate, doesn't he?" asked the lad. "No," said the politician, "he gets up and takes a look at the Senate, and then he prays for the country."

A man who was asked his Christian name, replied "Solomon Isaacs," is an old acquaintance, but it is amusing to remember that a recent New York reporter once addressed the same question to Wu Ting-fang. The folio may be old, but it is perennially provocative.

tive of mirth: "Wanted—a competent person to undertake the sale of a new medicine that will prove highly lucrative to the undertaker." And we always read with fresh joy of the rural justice who thus addressed a convicted marauder: "Prisoner, a bountiful Providence has endowed you with health and strength, instead of which you go about the country stealing hens."

A London actor appearing at a cheap theatre in Salford found so small an audience that he sought out the manager for an explanation. "You see," the manager told him, "my people are at the Halle concert." "Oh!" the actor said, surprised, "I should hardly have thought your patrons would care much for high-class music." "No," the other explained, "to tell the truth, they go to pick pockets."

Chairman Sherman, of the Republican campaign committee, was recently approached by a somewhat unimportant Ohio politician, who, though formerly a Republican, has of late years voted the State Democratic tickets.

It appeared from the man's conversation that he had seen the error of his ways. At the same time he hinted he would like a job at campaign headquarters.

"I'm sorry," Mr. Sherman is reported to have replied, "that I shall have to disappoint you. Glad to see you back; but in these days the wise prodigal brings along his own calf."

"Dr. Besom is once more among us for a brief season," wrote the chronicler of Northby's social and religious life. "He says and does exactly as he thinks right, without regard to the opinion or belief of others."

"His wife is not with him." Modern business methods favor double-entry bookkeeping. In the business colleges when the instructor asks what this sort of bookkeeping is the pupil will reply, winking and smiling: "Double-entry bookkeeping is the keeping of two sets of books, one of which may be produced in court if required."

A strict housewife said to a new maid: "I forgot to tell you, Maude, that if you break anything I'll have to take it out of your wages."

But Maude, whom two days had heartily sickened of her berth, replied with a merry laugh: "Do it, ma'am, do it. I've just broke the hundred-dollar vase in the parlor and if you can take that out of $4—for I'm leavin' at the end of the week—why, you'll be mighty clever."

"Are you the editor that takes in society news?" inquired the caller, an undersized man, with a tired and timid appealing look on his face.

"Yes, sir," replied the young man at the desk. "I can take in any kind of news. What have you?"

"Why, it's this way," said the caller, lowering his voice. "My wife gave a small party last night, and I am willing to pay to have this report of the affair put in the paper."

"We don't charge anything for publishing society news," observed the young man at the desk, taking the proffered manuscript and looking it over.

"That's all right," was the reply. "You don't understand. I wrote this up myself, and I put in a line or two that says, 'Mr. Halfstick assisted his distinguished wife in receiving the guests.' That's the way I want it to go in, and I don't care if it costs a dollar a word. I want my friends to know, by George! that I still belong to the family."

"You can't beat the Irishman for wit," says Robert Edeson, "and he takes advantage of his native proclivity in all his business enterprises. While walking in one of the business thoroughfares of Pittsburg last year my attention was arrested by a display of shirts in a haberdasher's window, which for variety of sunset colors far excelled a Turner landscape when the sun is red and low, and there in the window in glaring green type a large sign read: 'Listen!'"

A lot of poor children were at Rockefeller's stock farm near Cleveland. He gave each of them some milk to drink, the product of a $2,000 prize cow. "How do you like it?" he asked when they had finished. "Gee, it's fine!" responded one little fellow, who added after a thoughtful pause: "I wisht our milkman kep' a cow!"

Perry Belmont was nominated to the office of coroner, the other day at Riverhead, Long Island. The next day he received a postal card from a friend in New York: "Dear Perry—Would you mind going to Buffalo next week and sitting on the State Democratic party, after Mr. Hearst and Mr. Murphy have supplied the corpse?"

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

The engagement is announced of Miss Marie Pickering, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Fred Pickering, to Mr. Julius Kruttschnitt, Jr. No date has as yet been announced for the wedding.

The engagement is announced of Miss Anita Wieland, daughter of Mrs. J. F. Larkin, to Dr. Reuben L. Hale. No definite date has been announced for the wedding, but it will probably take place in November.

The marriage of Miss Carmelita Dibblee, daughter of the late Mr. Thomas Dibblee, and Mrs. Francesca de la Guerra Dibblee of Santa Barbara, to Mr. Francis T. Underhill, took place on Thursday afternoon of last week at the Dibblee home in Santa Barbara, the ceremony being performed by the Rev. Hugh Walker of Los Angeles. Only a few immediate relatives were present. After the ceremony Mr. and Mrs. Underhill went to their country place at Montecito, leaving the next day for a three months' trip East. They will then return to Santa Barbara and will later go around the world.

The wedding of Miss Georgene Shepard, daughter of Mr. A. D. Shepard, to Lieutenant Edwin C. Long, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., took place on Tuesday afternoon of last week at the home of Mr. and Mrs. Frank Miller in Sausalito. The ceremony was performed at four o'clock by the Rev. George Maxwell of Christ Church. The bridesmaids were Miss Margery Shepard, the bride's sister, and Miss Edith Miller. Lieutenant Frederick Test, U. S. A., was the best man. About fifty guests were present. Lieutenant Long left on Thursday for Havana, where he will join General Funston, U. S. A. Mrs. Long has remained at Fort Baker with Lieutenant and Mrs. Hawes.

The wedding of Miss Inez Strauch to Mr. James H. Graham took place on Wednesday evening at the First Unitarian Church. The ceremony was performed at half-past eight o'clock by the Rev. Bradford Leavitt. The bride, who was given away by her brother, Mr. Walter Strauch, had no attendants, but Mr. Charles J. Dickman was the best man. Four hundred invitations were sent out for the ceremony, but only about forty guests were hidden to the reception which followed at the Graham home on McAllister street.

Mr. and Mrs. John Bigelow have sent out invitations for the marriage of their daughter, Mrs. Elue Gardner Hodgson, to Mr. Walter Remington Quick of San Francisco on Wednesday afternoon, October 24th, at 5 o'clock, at 929 Hennepin avenue, Minneapolis, Minnesota. Mr. Philip Paschel of this city will be the best man.

Royal does not contain an atom of phosphoric acid (which is the product of bones digested in sulphuric acid) or of alum (which is one-third sulphuric acid) substances adopted for other baking powders because of their cheapness.

PERSONAL.

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy people who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Lieutenant-General Arthur MacArthur, U. S. A. received the officers of Fort Baker: Captain H. B. Clark, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Guy E. Manning, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Arnold, U. S. A.; Lieutenant G. P. Hawes, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Jones, U. S. A., and Lieutenant Clarence Cagan, U. S. A., on Wednesday of last week, at home at Fort Mason.

Lieutenant-General Stephen P. Locelyn, U. S. A. arrived here on Sunday last for a brief stay en route to Vancouver Barracks, where he goes to assume command of the Department of Columbia.

Colonel John L. Clem, assistant quartermaster-general U. S. A., has been detailed by order of the president, a member of the Army Retiring Association at the Presidio of San Francisco, vice Colonel William H. Comegys, assistant paymaster-general, U. S. A., who has been relieved.

The leave of absence granted Colonel Edward Bravo, U. S. A., has been extended one month and twenty days and he is authorized to go beyond the sea.

Colonel Enoch H. Crowder, General Staff, U. S. A., is announced as chief of staff of the Pacific division.

Lieutenant Colonel Elijah W. Halford, Paymaster, U. S. A., is relieved from duty as paymaster, Department of the Gulf, and ordered to proceed to San Francisco for duty as chief paymaster of the Department of California, relieving Colonel William H. Comegys, assistant paymaster-general, who will proceed to New York City and report for duty as chief paymaster of the Department of the East.

Colonel John P. Wissler, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., left on Thursday of last week for Washington, D. C., and will proceed from there to Europe, where he goes as military attaché to Berlin.

Colonel Lea Febiger, U. S. A., acting inspector-general of the Pacific Division, expects to be relieved from his present duty on November 1 and will then probably join his regiment, the Infantry, with station at Fort Wright, Oregon.

Captain Richardson Clover, U. S. N., Mrs. Clover and their daughters left last week for home in Washington, D. C., after having spent the summer at their country place, Laguna in the Napa Valley.

Major Parker W. West, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., has been assigned to the first squadron of his regiment, with station at Fort Walla Walla.

Inspector Z. W. Reynolds, U. S. N., has been ordered to additional duty as paymaster at the naval training station at San Francisco.

Captain B. Frank Cheatham, quartermaster, U. S. A., has been relieved at Fort Wayne, Indiana, and ordered to proceed to San Francisco and in charge of the construction work at posts about San Francisco, relieving Colonel William H. Comegys, U. S. A., and assuming the position vacated by the departure for Cuba of Captain William Wren, U. S. A. Captain Cheatham will take charge of improvements pertaining to the establishment of the new supply depot at Fort Mason. Captain Cheatham is well known here, and Mrs. Cheatham was formerly Miss Evelynman, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. James Wren of this city.

Captain John H. Wholley, Second Infantry, U. S. A., has been relieved from duty at Mount Vernon Military Academy, San Rafael, and ordered to join his regiment.

Lieutenant John Evelyn Page, U. S. N., who is well known on this Coast, has been ordered to duty at the Naval Hospital, Norfolk, Virginia.

Quartermaster Grey Skipwith, U. S. N., has had his orders to the Milwaukee revoked and has been detached from duty in charge of the apprenticeship seamen, at the Naval Training Station, Newport, R. I., and directed to continue her duties.

Lieutenant John M. Kelso, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been retired by the army board in consideration of the Presidio of San Francisco on account of the impairment of his eyesight, due to service in the Philippines.

Lieutenant O. P. M. Hazzard, Second Cavalry, U. S. A., has been appointed as assistant to Colonel John L. Clem, quartermaster of the Department of California.

Assistant Paymaster D. B. Rogers, U. S. N., has been ordered detached from the Navy Paymaster's School at Washington, D. C., and ordered to the navy yard, Mare Island, for duty as assistant to the general store keeper.

Miss Raymond H. Fenner, the wife of Lieutenant Fenner, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who was at Fort Baker, left on Saturday last for Fort Monroe, Virginia, where Lieutenant Fenner is taking a course in the Artillery School.

He will stand relieved from duty in the headquarters and staff of third squadron and command of Major Harry C. Benson, U. S. A., will stand relieved from duty in the headquarters of National Park on or about November 1 and will then proceed by marching to their headquarters at the Presidio of San Francisco.

Lieutenant John M. Kelso, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., under command of Captain Kirby Walker, U. S. A., was relieved from duty in the Sequoia and General Grant National Parks on October 1st, and proceeded to march to their station at the Presidio of Monterey.

The Vanderbilt Cup Race.

Louis Wagner, in a 110-horsepower French car, Saturday, Oct. 6, won the third international automobile race for the William K. Vanderbilt, Jr., cup, completing the distance of 297.1 miles in 290 minutes 10 2-5 seconds, or at the rate of more than a mile a minute.

Vincenzo Lancia, in a 120-horsepower Italian car, was second in 293 minutes 28 4-5 seconds.

Antoine Duray, in a 120-horsepower French car, was third in 293 minutes 44 4-5 seconds.

Albert Clement, in a 100-horsepower French car, was fourth in 301 minutes 59 4-5 seconds.

Camilo Jenatz, in a 120-horsepower German car, was fifth in 304 minutes 38 seconds.

Only five cars finished the race, but there were fourteen of the seventeen cars that started running at the time the race was declared off, which was done as soon as Clement had won fourth place.

While France carried away premier honors of the race, Joseph Tracy of the American team had the satisfaction of registering the fastest lap made. On his fifth round Tracy drove 29.7 miles in the remarkable time of 26 minutes 21 seconds. Tracy suffered severely from tire troubles in the first few rounds and this cost him dear.

Elliott Shepard ran into a spectator and fatally injured him. Shepard then broke a crank shaft and dropped out on the seventh lap, when he was running sixth.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

It would be easier to be content with little if nobody had any more.—Life.

Visitor—"What are you doing here, my poor man?" Convict—"Time, mum."—Baltimore American.

Howell—"Did that fellow who wanted you to invest have a sure thing, as he claimed?" Powell—"Yes; I was it."—Judge.

Friend—"If you love Miss Gotrox, old man, why don't you marry her?" Bachelor Doctor—"Heavens! man, she is one of my best patients!"—Judge.

Effie—"But, papa, how do you know that it was a stork that brought us the new baby?" Papa—"Because, my dear, I just saw his bill!"—Woman's Home Companion.

"Ignorance of the law," said the judge, "excuses no one." "That being the case," rejoined the prisoner, "it's a wonder the jury didn't find my lawyer guilty."—Chicago Daily News.

"Our imitation is really considerably better than the real thing." "You don't say! Then hadn't we better begin cautioning the public to beware of the genuine?"—Louisville Courier-Journal.

She—"Were you ever in a street car accident?" He—"Yes. The car was completely wrecked, but the passengers were packed so tight that only the outside layers were injured."—Chicago News.

"Slowboy is about discouraged. He's been waiting ten years for a promotion and hasn't got it yet." "That's the trouble. If he'd worked more and waited less he'd have had it long ago."—Detroit Free Press.

"Let me see," said she, "what is it you call these men who run automobiles?" "Pardon me," replied the gallant man, "I'm too much of a gentleman to tell you what I call them."—Philadelphia Ledger.

"What a wonderful vocabulary the new minister has," said Mrs. Oldcastle. "Yes," replied her hostess, "it's almost as big as Josiah's Uncle William's was, only his turned into a goitre, at last."—Chicago Record-Herald.

"I wonder," said the man who was given to thought at times, "I wonder what is meant by the 'embarrassment of riches'?" "The poor relation, very likely," replied the man who was one.—Philadelphia Public Ledger.

"Can't you find any work at all?" asked the kind lady of Frayed Franklin. "Plenty, mum. But everybody wants references from me last employer." "Can't you get them?" "No, mum. He's been dead 28 years."—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Dashaway—"I want you to meet Miss Hopper. Stunning girl. Just back from Europe." Cleverton—"Her first visit?" "Yes." "Well, old man, if it's all the same to you, I'll wait until she's gotten through telling about it."—Life.

"That's all right, sis," answered Tommy. "I could see that you were only playing telephone. He was ringing you up—oh, you needn't hide your left hand behind you—but he had his lips entirely too close to the receiver."—Chicago Tribune.

"Wait a minute till I get my clothes off!" came a shrill voice from the back end of the cable car. All the strap-holders turned their heads as one man. It was a small boy striving to drag off the hamper containing his mother's washing.—Judge.

Mother (who has been asked to suggest a game for a rainy afternoon)—"Why don't you pretend you are me? And George can be daddy. Then you might play at housekeeping." Daughter—"But, mother, we've quarreled once already!"—Punch.

"You don't realize that there are other considerations in life than money," said the censorious friend. "Yes, I do," answered Senator Sorghum. "But whenever I want anything done I can't get the other fellow to realize it."—Washington Star.

"Oh, lady, I do love peach cake," hinted the hungry hobo as he rested his greasy sleeve on the gatepost. "Well," replied the housewife with the rolling pin, "suppose I should make you some peach cake. Would you do any work?" "Would I, mum? Why, I would do the hardest work I ever did in my life." "And what would you do?" "Why, I'd climb dat tree and get enough peaches fer de cake."—Chicago Daily News.

Reporter—"I called, sir, to ask you if you could tell me anything of the affairs of the bank whose wreck is just announced." Substantial Citizen—"Good heavens, man, how should I know anything about its affairs? Why, I'm one of the board of directors!"—Baltimore American.

THE TUNEFUL LIAR.

Working Father.

Everybody's working father,
He's as soft as lard;
May and Nell, and mother,
Work him good and hard;
Work him for new outfits,
Everything they can—
Everybody in the family
Works—our—old—man!

—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Reform Needed.

The novelists of true romance
Their food will have to vary;
To make the villain bite the dust
Is quite unsanitary.

—New York Sun.

Official Spelling.

Pray, Roosevelt, excuse us
If you but amuse us
By ukases stern from your dwelling,
We'll never change, Teddy,
Until we are ready,
Our favorite methods of spelling—
So kindly stop squinting
At Government Printing,
And leave it, pray, just as you met it,
For all you will ever
Hear in your endeavor
To pilot our pens is—"Forget it!"

—Thomas R. Ybarra in the New York Times.

Transitional.

The tumult on the bleachers dies,
The fans have left their seats of old;
In many a reminiscent guise
The baseball stories are retold.
The rooting and the shouting cease,
But down the gridiron in full chase
The athlete who might mock at Greece
Comes with the fearful football face.
The college yell is with us yet,
You better bet! You better bet!

—Baltimore Sun.

MOTHERS BE SURE AND USE "MRS. WINSLOW'S Soothing Syrup for your children while teething.

Lady Gushington—"So your son is a real author! How distractingly interesting! And does he write for money?" Practical Dad—"Yes. I get his applications about once a week."—Punch.

All over the world, babies have been benefited during the teething period, by Steedman's Soothing Powders.

"Bridget, I am going out tonight." "And leave the house alone?"—Life.

Automobile Cabs for San Francisco.

A New York dispatch states that within two months a hundred automobile vehicles are to be added to the public cab service of the city. These are to be equipped with the "taximeter," which, for the passenger's information, automatically registers the distance traveled and the amount due. The company which installs this service also has a permanent record on the taximeter of every cent collected and every mile traveled.

This to the New Yorkers must sound almost too good to be believed. True, the taximeter cabs have been known in Germany for over ten years and in other parts of Europe for lesser periods, but they are so cheap, so comfortable, and so free from chances for swindling that it seems impossible that they can ever be installed in New York. There is no city with higher fares.

The foregoing dispatch makes the question pertinent, why would not an automobile cab service be a good thing for San Francisco? The condition of the streets since the conflagration has been such as to make them very hard on both men and horses. As a result the use of automobiles has become much more general. But the automobile is too costly for the ordinary purse, whether it be owned or simply hired. Therefore, the man or woman of modest means is forced to use the street cars or the horse-driven cabs. The street-car service in San Francisco at present is very bad. The number of cars is inadequate; they are not properly equipped; many of them are destitute of brakes, fenders, and other safety appliances; and many of the platform men who run them are ugly ruffians who ought to be in jail. They are jammed with people of all degrees of morality and cleanliness and every variety of smell. It is difficult to get in or out of them without having your pocket picked, if you are a woman, or becoming engaged in a fight, if you are a man. Such being the case, people who have much business to transact and who do not yearn for either murder or maiming, are forced to fall back on the cabs or shank's mare. Nearly all the hackney carriages in San Francisco were destroyed by the fire, and the horses who used to draw them were probably swallowed up in the yawning earthquake abysses which the Eastern adjusters are so fond of talking about. For there is no relic of San Francisco's former cab service. What remains is a collection of what old San Francisco called "plaza-hacks," or "small-pox wagons"; they are drawn by animals in the last stages of inanition, with knee-sprung fore-legs and collapsible hind-legs; their charioteers are carelessly clad gentlemen, usually unshaven, frequently intoxicated, and invariably surly. For such an equipage one pays $2.00 an hour. And if you hire a cab to a point in the Western Addition—which is where everything is, by the way—and leave it there, the cabman demands pay for his return journey, and if you refuse it he wants to fight you. On the whole, therefore, the cab service, as well as the car service of San Francisco, like the police service, the fire service, and the water service, needs a vast deal of improvement.

There are so many new men engaged in new enterprises in San Francisco, that this new idea may commend itself to them. Why would it not be a good idea to install a public automobile cab service in San Francisco? It will be many months before the United Railroads has its car service working perfectly, and by that time the people will have acquired the cab habit. Those who have not used these automobile cabs in European cities have no idea how convenient they are. They are now operated in German, Swiss, and French cities, but we may take a single city, Berlin, as an exemplar. There you may find these gasoline automobiles at all the cab stands in the central parts of the city, likewise at other stands outside of the parks in the residential quarters of the city. Some of the cabs are like our ordinary automobiles with two seats and a tonneau. Others are arranged with a limousine or top for use in stormy weather; some seat three passengers, some seat five. The taximeter, a locked case with a seven-inch dial, faces the passenger. Its gearing is connected with the axle of the vehicle like a cyclometer. On top is a little metal flag marked "Free." When you enter the cab the cab driver lowers the flag; this connects the gearing, and the cab axle sets it in motion. The indicator on the dial starts at fifty pfennig, about twelve cents. This is the minimum, and for this you are entitled to drive eight hundred meters, or about half a mile. At that rate you could drive about the distance from the ferries in San Francisco to Kearny and Market Streets. After the first 800 meters the dial charges only 10 pfennig for each additional 400 meters, or two and one-half cents per quarter mile. The dial also regulates waiting time at twelve cents for the first eight minutes, and two and a half cents for each additional four minutes.

The general principles are given above. There are other details, such as the rates for work after midnight; the rates for three, four, or five persons; the rates for carrying luggage, the rates outside of the city limits, etc.

It is difficult to describe how admirably the system works. Under the old system if you hired a cab driver by the hour, the cabman "loafed"—partly to save his horse and partly to increase his charge. But under the taximeter system the cabman drives rapidly; if you hire him by the hour, the more rapidly he drives the more miles he will cover and the more you have to pay him. If you hire him by the course, the more rapidly he drives the sooner he gets to the end of the course and is free to take another fare.

In Berlin the rate for the taximeter motor cabs is the same as the rate for the taximeter horse cabs. It has been demonstrated there that the motor can cover so much more ground in the course of a day that it can work profitably for the same rate as the slower horse cab. Probably a good horse can cover thirty miles a day—the radius differs in different cities according to grade, pavements, etc. But the radius of a motor cab is four or five times that of a horse cab. It is possible in three or four hours for a motor cab almost completely to cover the inner district and the suburbs of a great city like Paris or Berlin. When the taximeter motor cab reaches the "boundary"—which in Paris is the fortifications and what we call our "city limits"—the driver presses a button on the dial, and a different rate from the urban tax at once begins to register. When the cab comes back to the city boundaries the button again is pressed and the suburban tax rate is changed to the urban.

San Francisco has always been very hard on horses. It is probable that the old United Carriage Company, which gave a very good service, paid less return than any enterprise in San Francisco having a similar amount of money invested. As for the Pacific Cab Company and other rivals, they all disappeared. Private owners of cab services have purveyed to San Francisco's trade for years, and it is probable that not one of them died leaving a large fortune, most of them died poor, and some of them bankrupt. With San Francisco's grades and pavements, the wear and tear on horses, harness, and vehicles are so great as to leave little or no profit in the cab business. But none of these objections apply to the motor cab. The usefulness of the automobile has been plainly demonstrated in the encumbered streets of San Francisco since the fire. Why, then, would it not be a good idea to install such a service as New York is about to inaugurate? San Francisco needs it worse than New York. And San Francisco is in so great a hurry to get around, and the present means of getting around are so utterly inadequate, that such a service, in our opinion, would pay largely from the first.

The Demons Excluded in San Diego.

A new church has just been completed in San Diego, and on each corner at the top of the high central tower of the building, in accordance with the plan of the architect, has been placed a figure described as "anything but angelic in appearance." The figures were scarcely in place before there came an outcry from some of the good people of the congregation. The decorations were pronounced indecorous, hideous, and highly objectionable.

In vain the architect reasoned with the objecting critics, explaining that the figures were gargoyles, and entirely in keeping with their position and surroundings.

Authority for their use could be found in the most noted of church edifices. Furthermore, they had been mentioned in the specifications, were strictly in accordance with the details described, and the objections then made were too late. In answer to this the objectors said that they were not ornamental or attractive; that they were useless and absurd; and that if they had been mentioned in the preliminary plans the name had carried no significance to the listeners at the time—that the word had suggested nothing more than an architectural frill of some sort, like a frieze or a dado, or any other technical term that possibly meant something definite to builders but was insignificant and immaterial to those unlearned in the art. In the meantime the grotesque figures leer mockingly down from their elevation on all who pass, the interested observers who return their stare and those who avert their gaze with shudders of dislike.

It is easy to sympathize with the architect's critics. Gargoyles, as now shaped, are useless, out-of-date, and absurd anywhere, and especially in San Diego. Their name, from the old French gargouille, throat, or the Latin gurgulio, gullet, shows that they were, primarily, water-spouts, the mouths of pipes or gutters. Before the day of metal pipes to convey the rain-water from the roof, they were made to project and throw the flow clear of the walls. They were of stone and carved to harmonize with the decorative details surrounding them. Later they were made in fanciful and grotesque shapes, and degenerated into excrescences with nothing but their ugliness to recommend them. Appearing on churches and cathedrals in the early English style of architecture, they came to represent the demons who are excluded from the sacred precincts. Westminster Abbey in London and Notre Dame Cathedral in Paris present notable examples of their use, distorted in feature, demoniac in expression. There is no excuse for their use in San Diego. On the San Diego church tower they are anachronisms and worse. The tower needs no water-spouts. Water does not fall in appreciable quantities on the just or the unjust in San Diego.

Let's Ask Roosevelt About It.

The Argonaut recently remarked to its friend, the Sacramento Bee, that since the contest in California had narrowed down to the candidate of Theodore Roosevelt, who is James N. Gillett, and the candidate of Samuel Gompers, who is Theodore Bell, that the Argonaut will choose Theodore Roosevelt's man, but the Bee could choose Gompers's. Our Sacramento contemporary now fiercely demands, "By what shadow of reason does the Argonaut argue that Theodore Roosevelt, were he conversant with the facts in this political contest in California today, would favor Gillett for Governor?"

Well, the reason we think so is because Gillett is a good man, because he is a Republican, because he supported the Administration measures in Congress, because he worked there for the railway regulation bill, and because he would make the best Governor. But the Bee goes on to imply that President Roosevelt would "in order to help to overthrow the corrupt Republican ring" send one of his Cabinet to California "to advise the election of the Democratic State ticket."

We doubt very much the probability of the Bee's belief. In fact, we are so strongly convinced that President Roosevelt would recommend good Republicans and all good citizens in this State to vote for Gillett rather than for Gompers's candidate, Bell, that we will not take the trouble to write and ask him. But we strongly urge the Bee to do so. The President is a kindly and considerate gentleman, and if he thinks the Bee is in any grave doubt at this juncture, he would certainly endeavor to help our esteemed contemporary. By all means let the Bee write and ask President Roosevelt for whom he would prefer to have his friends in California vote: for the candidate of the people, Gillett, or for the candidate of organized labor, Bell.

We will make a bargain with the Bee—"unsight'n unseen," as boys say—we will promise to vote for the man, whom Roosevelt selects for the Bee, even if it be Bell.

Thus again we may say, in advance of the President's decision, that in this matter of advice concerning California candidates, the Argonaut chooses Roosevelt. And again the Bee will have to choose Gompers.

Relief Conditions in San Francisco.

In several cities, large and small, throughout the United States there is an indisposition to forward what remains of their San Francisco relief funds. Los Angeles still retains some $60,000, part of which the committee in charge diverted to Valparaiso. Only last week Pasadena was discussing the appropriation of her San Francisco relief fund for an emergency hospital. The National Red Cross at Washington retains some $1,800,000 which was intended for the San Francisco sufferers, but which its officers seem reluctant to forward. Over a million and a half still remains in the San Francisco relief funds of New York, Boston, and Philadelphia. So strong has grown the reluctance of the custodians of some of these Eastern funds to place them in the hands of the Relief Corporation of San Francisco that direct representatives of these cities have been sent here. David Paton has been representing here both the New York and Philadelphia relief funds. James D. Hague, who, although a resident of New York, has been for years connected with the mining interests of the Pacific Coast and is intimately acquainted here, represents the New York Chamber of Commerce Relief fund. Mr. Paton also represents, for the time being, the Philadelphia fund. Wm. D. Sohler has been specially deputed by the custodians of the Boston fund to administer it in San Francisco. The New York Chamber of Commerce fund has this week been turned over to the San Francisco Relief Corporation, with certain restrictions as to its distribution.

Some of the Eastern representatives seem to have decided to keep the money in their own hands. They apparently do not approve of the methods of distribution which have been followed in San Francisco. They particularly disapprove of the large amount of money paid out for "claims." These claims are for goods that were seized during the days immediately following the disaster, which include every possible utensil and commodity, from bread to beer, from perfumery to whisky, from lumber to typewriters. There was serious division in the San Francisco Relief Corporation on this claim question. One of the committee, Garret W. McEnerney, supported the claimants most vigorously, and being a prominent attorney, he prevailed over the laymen. But they finally became appalled at the size, present and potential, of the "claims" which rolled up like snowballs; hence the executive committee stopped paying them a short time ago, without expressing any opinion as to their validity or justice. These "claims" jarred unpleasantly on many people here as well as in the East. If business men, railway corporations, and others were deprived of their property during a temporary paralysis of law, it would seem that the municipality is liable for restitution and not the Relief Corporation. The people of the United States gave their generous donations to feed and clothe the suffering, and not to reimburse merchants and corporations whose goods had been seized. The Eastern representatives also object to the large administrative expense. They have abundant reason. Not long ago figures were submitted by the Relief Corporation which, after a vigorous pruning down, showed a total of over $100,000 a month for purely administrative expenses. Merely to administer a relief fund of five millions the committee was paying out one and a quarter million dollars a year. This did not include food, clothing, lumber, or other necessities, but salaries only. The size of this administrative estimate shocked San Francisco. No wonder it shocked the Easterners.

The representatives from the Atlantic cities also believe that the present methods of administering the relief fund are leading, as they say, toward "pauperism on a great scale." This they consider undesirable. They wish to bring about conditions by which the people to be helped shall be put upon their feet and made self-supporting as speedily as possible.

The Relief Committee-men continue preparations for constructing cottages and other shelter for the refugees. At first they offered to pay a part of the expense of rebuilding homes. Such was the demand for money that this offer they were forced to withdraw. Then they offered to furnish portable houses to people as had vacant land; such was the rush for portable houses that this offer also they were forced to withdraw. They were unable, they claim, to build houses rapidly enough for the refugees who were to be installed on public parks.

Here again the Relief Corporation has got into difficulties. Ever since the disaster there have been refugees in tents, shacks, shanties, and temporary structures of every description on many of the public squares and parks. The National military reservations, cleared by the Federal commander some time ago, park commissioners have been desirous to clear the parks and squares of the city also. Yet the Relief Corporation has gone ahead with its plans for erecting some thousand cottages to replace the tents. These houses are two or three rooms in size, very simply constructed, and heated by gas stoves. The Relief Corporation had assumed that it had the permission of the park commissioners to install these cottages up to August, 1907. But it received a letter from the park commissioners in which it was informed that it was in error. A somewhat heated meeting ensued between the two bodies, which resulted in Mr. The Magee and Mr. W. J. Dingee exchanging caustic compliments, which finally, however, were withdrawn. The Relief Corporation accused the park commissioner acting in bad faith and of breaking their promise. Commissioner Lloyd, one of the veterans of the war, stopped the argument by pointing out that the park commissioners had not granted any permission at all, but simply not forbidden the refugees to reside in the parks. Furthermore, he added, the park commissioners had no right to "give permission" for the use of the public parks for residence purposes; that if they gave any such permission it was illegal; and that any citizen could take proceedings against the commissioners to force them to stop the parks. This was so palpably clear that the question ceased to be a matter of controversy.

The most notable result of the controversy was a letter from Park Commissioner Dingee, in which he said:

The refugee camps are evil, and should be abolished. There is employment at good wages for every man and woman in the city who is able and willing to work, they are unnecessary. They are an injury to the good name of the city, and bar the welfare of this community. They are fostering a spirit of dependence, the love of idleness, they are ruinous to self-respect and destructive of good morals. They are breeding mendicancy, improvidence, and shiftlessness. They are erecting idle vicious elements of society both in and out of the city. The moral atmosphere pervading them is pernicious. They are rapidly degenerating into pauper communities, with phases at once horrible and disgusting.

Mr. Dingee then pays his attention to the matter of the relief fund. He says:

No sane person will accuse the gentlemen composing the relief committee of misappropriation or of using the fund for their personal advantage. But how that large sum shall be properly expended is a problem. Better by far that it had never been collected. Its net results thus far have been scandals, contentions, mendicancy, and even worse. It is bringing shame and reproach to the city.

The people who live adjacent to the refugee camps also charge that they are plague spots, moral and physical; that drunkenness and immorality are rife; that the majority of their inhabitants are too lazy to work; that the carnival of crime now afflicting San Francisco is due to the presence in the refugee camps of dangerous criminals.

It must not be supposed that these charges mean that no provision is to be made for those who are honest, deserving, and destitute, of whom there are doubtless many. The buildings at the Ingleside race track have been prepared by the Relief Corporation and there are thousands of refugees are to be fed and lodged, including of course the old, sick and decrepit. Furthermore the park commissioners control a number of blocks of land extending from Golden Gate Park to the Presidio reservation, intended some day to be used as a park. This they will permit the refugees to reside upon upon further notice.

The Eastern representatives speak in high terms of the character and motives of the members of the Relief Corporation. Concerning those refugees who have incurred charges of malfeasance and mismanagement the Relief Corporation, the Eastern representatives say that they are mistaken and misled. It is probable that the Relief Corporation will before many days turn over its funds to the regular charitable associations of San Francisco. It will do so—if for no other reason—because it will have no further funds.

Government by Organized Labor.

The Sacramento Bee is much concerned about the Argonaut's attitude toward Mr. Gillett, Mr. Gompers, and unorganized labor. The Bee says: "The Argonaut has no sympathy whatever with the working classes, whether organized or unorganized," and it adds, "The Argonaut is not standing with the loyalty and patriotism of the brain and brawn of California." By this we mean that the Bee believes that organized labor includes all the "loyalty and patriotism, brawn and brain of California." We can assure the Bee that it is very mistaken—there is plenty of patriotism, any amount of loyalty, and a good deal more brains outside organized labor than inside. We will go further—we can assure the Bee that there is a vastly larger number of the working classes outside of organized labor than inside of organized labor in California.

As to the statement that the Argonaut "has always been known as an organ of the rich," if that is so, we do not know it. The Editor of the Argonaut has lived for his living all his life, is working for his living as hard as he ever did in his life, and expects to work for his living to the end of his life. He likes his work.

As to being an enemy of organized labor, the Argonaut is not hostile to organized labor or union labor wherever has been. During all of the time that it has lived, nearly a third of a century, the Argonaut has employed union printers. Prior to the introduction of setting machines we employed union compositors, for many years we paid them five cents per thousand more than the union scale. We did it because they were good men, because they did good work, because we liked them. After the introduction of the new composition we also employed union printers—we paid higher wages than the union scale called for—linotype operators, pressmen, and foremen. We employed union workmen because, as a rule, they are better men than non-union workmen. We like good men, and we have no use for poor ones, union or non-union. There is no more independent being on earth than a skilled artisan. He beats a bookkeeper, he is the superior of a clerk, and we think he outranks the average jay attorney.

Now, the Bee is mistaken: we are not hostile to union labor and we are not hostile to organized labor. But we are hostile to Government by Organized Labor. It was the first time in the history of this country a labor leader, Samuel Gompers, has attempted to get to our representatives in the Federal Congress. Accompanied by a gang of his henchmen he has demanded of the President, the Speaker of the House, the President of the Senate that they shall shape legislation according to his behest. He has insolently demanded of Congressmen to vote according to his bidding on many measures. When the more courteous among them refused, he has ordered his Labor cohorts to defeat these Congressmen at the polls. He is already met with one failure in Maine. We will meet with many more. He and his henchmen in this State are now attempting to defeat Congressmen Gillett, Republican candidate for Governor of California.

A gentleman supported by the Bee, Theodore Bell, who is masquerading as the Democratic candidate, is making the Labor Union candidate. He has been "used" by the Labor Union Convention. The platform of the Labor Union party has been filed at Sacramento, according to law, with Bell as its head. As the Democratic party in this State is now moribund, we may say without question that he is the Labor Union candidate; that if elected he will represent the labor party and will shape the government of the State according to their dictates. This is a fair assumption—based on their endorsement, from their demands, and from their speeches. It is also a fair assumption from Gompers's attitude—because Congressman Gillett refused to obey his dictates, Gompers is now ordering the labor unions to vote against him.

If elected, Bell will have to appoint Labor Union politicians like Maestretti, Furuseth, and Michael Casey, Bank Commissioners, Harbor Commissioners, and Regents of the University.

What kind of a government would we have in the State of California if it were a Government by Organized Labor? Let us look for some exemplars. We need not go far afield. We can take our own city of San Francisco.

For nearly five years San Francisco has been almost entirely ruled by a Government of Organized Labor. For the first few years a certain number of the municipal officers were either Republican or Democratic. But in November, 1905, the candidates of the organized labor ticket succeeded in defeating the fusion Republican and Democratic ticket. As a result the entire Labor Union ticket was elected from top to toe. Thereafter there could be no doubt as to where lay the responsibility for San Francisco's government. It lay at the door of Organized Labor. From Mayor down to pound-keeper there is not a municipal official in San Francisco who is not either an elective or appointive representative of Government by Organized Labor. The Mayor, the Board of Supervisors, the Board of Public Works, the Police Commissioners, the Fire Commissioners, the Election Commissioners, the Board of Education—in short, every one of the city and county officials is a representative of the Labor Union ticket.

At the head of this ticket was Mayor Schmitz, whom we believe to be the best of the bunch, a well-meaning man, but one who has been unable to cope with the foulness and villainess of a Government by Organized Labor. In fact, so phenomenally corrupt and inefficient has proved to be this Government by Organized Labor, particularly when confronted with the problems presented by earthquake and fire—that Mayor Schmitz has gone off on a vacation. He has fled in dismay before the situation. And in our opinion he was wise. We do not think that any honest and well-meaning man—and such we believe Mayor Schmitz to be—can cope with the grave problems presented to the government of San Francisco by the present situation, when there stand behind him such a set of men as have been elected by the forces of Organized Labor.

How are the people of San Francisco faring under a Government by Organized Labor? The United States promises them protection to life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness. The State of California reaffirms and guarantees that promise. Are they so secured? Let us take at random a few headings indicating the workings of a great city under Government by Organized Labor. First we will select a few from the Examiner, which is not the enemy of organized labor, but its bosom friend:

YOUNG GIRL HELD UP BY TWO HIGHWAYMEN. TWO MEN SEIZE MISS HELEN SALZIG AND TEAR PURSE FROM HER BOLDLY. SHE IS LEFT FAINTING ON THE STREET. BANOITS AFTER TRYING TO WREST THE RINGS FROM HER FINGERS BECOME FRIGHTENED.

PLANS LAID FOR COMMITTEE OF SAFETY—BUSINESS MEN READY TO SUPPLY MONEY TO STOP THUGS' REIGN OF TERROR—MASS MEETING IS CALLED.

A YOUNG GIRL SEIZED—THIEVES STEAL WATCH.

TWENTY MEN REQUEST PERMISSION TO CARRY ARMS FROM POLICE COMMISSION.

THUG ATTEMPTS TO KILL CLERK—HE IS BATTERED BY A SLUNG-SHOT IN A MARKET STREET STORE.

DINAN MUST STOP CRIME OR RESIGN—SO SAYS POLICE COMMISSIONER LEAHY—NO REASON WHY NOTORIOUS THIEVES SHOULD BE PERMITTED TO ROAM THE CITY AT WILL.

BEATEN BY CARMEN—LEFT SENSELESS IN THE STREET—CONTROLLER BAR USED IN FIGHT WITH PASSENGERS, ONE OF WHOM MAY DIE.

THE foregoing headings are from a paper—the Examiner—which believes in and supports Government by Organized Labor. The following are taken from a paper which has never opposed organized labor, although it takes a fairer view of disputed points than does the Examiner. These headings are from the San Francisco Chronicle:

CROOKS STALK CITIZENS WHILE POLICE ARE IMPOTENT—THUG TRIES TO CRUSH SKULL OF A SALESMAN IN A MARKET STREET STORE—W. J. SULLIVAN STRUCK DOWN IN THE SAME MANNER AS THE JAPANESE BANKER.

BADLY BEATEN BY CREW OF CAR—ALTERATION OVER PAYMENT OF FARES—PASSENGER LIES AT POINT OF DEATH.

TROLLEY ACCIDENTS CONTINUE WITH UNINTERRUPTED REGULARITY—THREE WAGONS STRUCK BY CARS—SIX PERSONS INJURED AS A RESULT OF YESTERDAY'S COLLISIONS.

DISCIPLINE OF COMPANY'S EMPLOYEES VERY POOR—LONG CONTINUED RUN OF TROLLEY CAR DISASTERS.

MOTORMEN IMPEDED BY CROWDS FROM USING BRAKES—MANY ACCIDENTS DUE TO THEIR INABILITY TO STOP CARS.

NUMEROUS PEOPLE KNOCKED FROM CARS BY CROWDING ON THE STEPS—SEVERAL FATAL ACCIDENTS AS A RESULT OF THIS OVERCROWDING.

DAUGHTER OF LEON SLOSS ROBBED BY AN ARMED THUG—COMPELS HER TO WALK WITH HIM ARM IN ARM—PRESSES A PISTOL AGAINST HER SIDE AND DEMANDS THE CONTENTS OF HER HANDBAG AND HER JEWELS.

GOVERNOR PARDEE OFFERS $500 REWARD FOR EACH OF THE THUGS WHO MURDERED STORE-KEEPERS IN SAN FRANCISCO.

McALLISTER STREET IMPROVEMENT CLUB AROUSED OVER THE PRESENT REIGN OF LAWLESSNESS—CLUB DENOUNCES THE POLICE DEPARTMENT.

HIGHWAYMAN ARRESTED FOR BRUTAL ASSAULT AND ROBBERY.

$5,000 REWARD TO BE OFFERED FOR THUGS WHO ASSASSINATED JAPANESE BANKER.

A CRIMSON RECORD, NINE MURDERS, TWENTY-FIVE ROBBERIES AND TEN BURGLARIES DURING THE PAST TWO MONTHS—A REIGN OF TERROR IN SAN FRANCISCO.

THE WORK FOR BETTER FIRE PROTECTION—SUTTER STREET PROPERTY OWNERS ORGANIZE—DETERMINED TO CONSTRUCT SALT WATER SYSTEM OF IMMENSE CISTERNS THEMSELVES—CAN NOT WAIT FOR THE CITY AND ARE DESTITUTE OF FIRE PROTECTION.

LIBRARY SITE CAN NOT BE USED FOR CITY HALL—THE COURT DECIDES THAT THE BONOS WERE ISSUED FOR LIBRARY—SUPERVISORS CAN NOT SET ASIDE THE LAW—MONEY AND SITE MUST BE USED FOR A PUBLIC LIBRARY FOR WHICH THE PEOPLE VOTED.

THE foregoing batch of headings typify what kind of security is afforded to life and property in a city with a Government by Organized Labor.

The following headings are taken from the San Francisco Call, a newspaper which has recently changed its critical tone toward labor-unions, and now gives a daily department heading, "news of the labor world." In this and other ways the Call testifies that it is a friend of organized labor:

THUGS SURPRISED IN A SALOON—TWO MEN CAPTURED, ONE ARMED WITH A MARLINPIKE.

DAILY CRIMES AROUSE THE BUSINESS COMMUNITY—MOVEMENT LAUNCHED TO SUPPRESS LAWLESSNESS.
CHIEF OF POLICE DINAN GIVEN THIRTY DAYS TO STOP THE EPIDEMIC OF BRUTAL CRIME THAT AFFLICTS SAN FRANCISCO.
MOGAN LIBERATES FIVE BAD MEN—CRIMINALS CAUGHT IN TENT BY PATROLMAN NOT EVEN DELAYED AS VAGRANTS—WHILE PART OF THE POLICE AND ALL DECENT CITIZENS ARE STRIVING TO END THE PRESENT REIGN OF LAWLESSNESS IN THIS CITY, POLICE JUDGE MOGAN IS A FRIEND OF THE FOOTPAD, AND PROTECTOR OF THE GAS-PIPE WIELDER.
ROBBER FELS HARDWARE DEALER IN THE GLARE OF MID-DAY. UNSPEAKABLE CRIMINALS HOLD UP GIRLS IN PUBLIC STREETS—DESPERATE THUGS FLEE FOR LIFE—CRIES OF VICTIMS AROUSE THE NEIGHBORHOOD—THE THUGS HIDE IN PRESIDIO—FEAR OF KILLING RESIDENTS PREVENTS CITIZENS FROM SHOOTING MISCREANTS.
HIGHWAYMEN COMPEL TWO YOUNG GIRLS TO YIELD UP BELONGINGS.
POLICE OF THE OPINION THAT ORGANIZED YEGGMEN HAVE INVADDED THE CITY—HARDWARE DEALER BEATEN SENSELESS AT COUNTER.
HALF A DOZEN CIGAR STANDS ROBBED BY DARING OPERATOR—HE POINTS PISTOL AND DEMANDS CASH.
PUPILS AND TEACHERS WANT POLICE PROTECTION—THE CHIEF IS ASKED TO SEND A SQUAD TO THE MISSION HIGH SCHOOL EACH EVENING.

The foregoing headlines represent the doings of three days in San Francisco. They are taken from one journal which boasts that it is a friend of the labor unions, the Examiner; from the Call, which has lately become their mouthpiece; and from the Chronicle, which has always been fair to the labor unions. Yet what a red record do we read of life in a city governed by Organized Labor!

Perhaps it may be said that political or other motives might color the narratives of these San Francisco dailies. It is not probable that all three could be so influenced as to tell such startling tales if they were false or exaggerated, and to tell them in so strikingly similar a fashion. Yet to be on the safe side let us take an extract from another daily journal—one published in a distant city. Here, then, are some lines from an editorial printed in a journal which has always been the friend and authorized organ of organized labor:

The army is still needed in San Francisco. The metropolis is suffering from a re-influx of the thieves and thugs who fled like frightened rats when the United States troops had charge there.

The presence of Uncle Sam's men after April 18th was the best thing that could have happened for San Francisco, but they were withdrawn too soon. If the regulars were in control, the sanitary and police regulations would be strictly enforced; there would be no procrastination in separating the sheep from the goats if Uncle Sam's boys were in control once again. And most certainly there would be no thieves and thugs at large, although there might be a number rapidly sent to the hereafter without benefit of clergy.

What paper is this that believes the conditions under a Government by Organized Labor are so bad that it needs the strong hand of Uncle Sam to remedy them? What paper is this that believes the thieves and thugs now plying their trade unchecked in San Francisco are so dangerous and so bold that the regular troops are needed to protect the citizens?

It is the Sacramento Bee.

From mayhem and murder, from danger to life and limb, let us turn to questions of property, municipal and individual. Under a Government by Organized Labor the city of San Francisco attempted to raise funds for certain municipal improvements. For fifty years the city government had been conducted by taxation. While it is true that many needed municipal improvements were dispensed with, the fact remains that not only the City Hall, but the Hall of Justice, the schools, hospitals, and other public buildings had been constructed from current taxes. Yet under a Government by Organized Labor the enormous amount of over $6,000,000 a year was found inadequate even for current expenses, much less for municipal improvements. Therefore, it was determined to raise money by the sale of bonds, and the people cheerfully voted a sum of over twelve millions of dollars. Under a Government by Organized Labor it was found impossible to dispose of these bonds. People who wished to invest their money believed there were better ways in which to invest it than in the promise to pay of a Government by Organized Labor. Months passed during which these bonds remained unsold. Finally the city of San Francisco succeeded in disposing of about two and a half millions of them, largely to local bankers and other local financiers who doubtless did not wish to see the city discredited in the eyes of the financial world.

What has been the condition of San Francisco since the earthquake and fire under a Government by Organized Labor? As we write six months have elapsed since that disaster. During that period some thousands of buildings have been erected by private individuals. Building permits to the extent of about a million dollars a week are applied for. Has any public building yet been erected or even repaired by this Government of Organized Labor? If so, what building? Can the Bee point to anything that has been done in San Francisco by the Government of Organized Labor in the way of repairing the ravages of earthquake and fire? If so, we should like to know what it is. As a matter of fact, in San Francisco today the City Hall still stands a gigantic and melancholy wreck, just as it stood when three days' conflagration had finished the work begun by thirty seconds of earthquake. The Hall of Justice still stands, a hideous ruin. As we write, the Government by Organized Labor is "talking of beginning"; but it has been talking of beginning for six months, and it has not begun. The Hall of Records also is a ruin, and also has been untouched. Although the municipal records of San Francisco—representing values aggregating many hundred millions of dollars—were practically all destroyed, the accumulation of records since the disaster has been very great. These records today stand in a flimsy wooden building of the most combustible nature, surrounded by other inflammable structures. Such is the care given to the public records under a Government by Organized Labor. Yet engineers report that the old Hall of Records can be repaired for a few thousand dollars. There are no court rooms other than makeshift ones for the civil and criminal courts of San Francisco. In many of them the judges complain bitterly of actual physical discomfort for themselves, the attorneys, and the witnesses. Yet six months have elapsed. There are millions in the treasury of the City of San Francisco, and there are some ten millions of unsold bonds. Why can not a Government by Organized Labor use the unused millions in the treasury? Why can not a Government by Organized Labor sell the unsold bonds?

In this unfortunate city, conducted by a government by Organized Labor, there is today practically no fire protection. The broken water-mains have not yet been repaired. On Valencia street, where the worst break occurred, laborers are now working on the shattered street. Vehicles drive around it—they have been driving around it for six months. The fire engine houses which were destroyed by the fire have not yet been rebuilt. Many of the fire engines are stored on the city front wharves, with inadequate and unsanitary quarters for the men and horses, while the expensive machinery is going to rust and ruin under the paternal care of a Government by Organized Labor. The firemen on the wharves complain that beneath them broken sewers are discharging their contents inside of the sea wall, which space is controlled by the city. The State is not yet—thank God!—controlled by a Government of Organized Labor. The State has only to deal with the outside of the sea wall and not with the inside. It naturally refuses to repair San Francisco's broken sewers. Yet the Board of Health of this Government by Organized Labor indulges in futile abuse of the State Board of Harbor Commissioners because it refuses to do the work which properly belongs to this Government by Organized Labor.

The police system of this city governed by Organized Labor is utterly demoralized. It is only fair to say that we make no reference here to H. T. Creswell and G. H. Umben, new members of the Police Commission. They are recent appointees. But the conditions now existing are due to the Board of Police Commissioners who date back for some years when the Board was wholly a part of the Government by Organized Labor. For the present conditions these new Commissioners are not responsible. For these conditions the old Commissioners were and are.

Six months have elapsed since San Francisco's great disaster and what is the condition of her streets? The most important of all, Market street, is still encumbered with the debris of last April's fire. Here and there has been partially removed, but it may be said to remain as a whole. Through the middle of this mass there are painfully long lines of wagons, trucks, sand-carts, elephants, automobiles, bicycles, and pedestrians, in the row space left between the two lines of debris. The row on Market street, the principal street of San Francisco, may readily be imagined what is the condition of the streets. In most of them there has been absolutely no attempt at all to clear away the debris. In many places the debris is heaped so high and so wide that vehicles and pedestrians are forced to make detours of several blocks. And every now and again the Board of Public Works of this unfortunate city Governed by Organized Labor bleats and moans and wrings its hands. But the Board has done nothing more.

But space fails us fitly to tell of the condition of this unfortunate San Francisco under a Government by Organized Labor. That any journal, any paper, or any candidate should have the effrontery to advocate Government by Organized Labor for this State with such an object lesson as poor San Francisco stands before the State in the face, passes all comprehension. The men composing the labor unions may, as individuals, be good citizens; but aggregated into unions, workers for political ends, raising class issues, and boycotting candidates on class pretenses, they are a danger to the State. We entertain no unfriendly feelings for the Sacramento Bee, or for the city of Sacramento, but if we did so, we could wish them no worse fate than that city, like poor San Francisco, to fall under the control of a Government by Organized Labor. But that fate is to be feared and dreaded by a city, must it be for a commonwealth?

If, in addition to the hapless metropolis, not only the capital city of the State, but the State itself, we fall under the control of a Government by Organized Labor, then God help California!

Eastern Adjusters on San Francisco.

The Fire Insurance Association of the North was in session in Chicago last week. Many of the speakers took occasion to attack the San Francisco and public for their attitude toward the Eastern adjusters. Some of the papers read were extremely bitter in tone.

The people and the press of San Francisco have as yet been greatly moved by what is said of the Eastern insurance adjusters. As to the opinion entertained of the Eastern insurance adjusters by the people and the press of San Francisco, it could not be lower. Compared with some of the insurance adjusters sent here from the East, a pander would be a Sir Richard, a bunko-steerer would be a veritable Cheyenne Bayard.

There were some other insurance men here and immediately after the disaster whose opinions were more honest than those of these "compromise adjusters." The man who makes his living by trying to scale the claims of people who have been partially or wholly ruined by fire—whose gains are larger the more he ruins—whose commissions grow greater as his clients grow more microscopic—such a human is not the one to whom to look for an honest judgment of any kind. But there were several insurance presidents here who were honest men, and who did not permit the fact that their companies lost heavily to lead them to attempt to swindle policy-holders who had lost all. Among these was A. W. Damon, President of the Springfield Fire and Marine Insurance Company of Massachusetts. Here immediately after the fire, at a time when a number of companies were engaged in trying to carry into effect what was known as the "New York horizontal five per-cent cut." Mr. Damon at that time said:

I make two predictions. One that many of the insurance companies who are trying to settle with their policy-holders on the basis of seventy-five per cent of the face value of the policies will reverse their programme; the other, that it will take San Francisco at least ten years to recover from the effects of the earthquake.

The first prediction is already coming true; the labor and building troubles do not clear up, we fear the second may also come true. Mr. Damon further said:

Two-thirds of the companies having one-third of the business want a sweeping horizontal cut because of the earthquake.

There is no means of knowing what damage the earthquake did or when any of the thirty-two fires had their origin.

Concerning the quality of the San Francisco buildings and their resistance to earthquake shock, Mr. Damon said:

"Many a substantial building was hardly damaged and many of the strongest buildings in sections where there was no fire were damaged, but they generally lost only chimneys, gables, cornices and fol-de-rols.

In short, Mr. Damon, who is an honest man, set down his opinion of conditions in San Francisco exactly as they impressed him immediately after the fire, and like some of his dishonest colleagues, as they pressed his pocket nerve.

Another insurance man who did not look at the situation from the "compromise adjuster" point of view was William B. Medicott, General United States Agent of the Atlas Assurance Company of London. Mr. Medicott represents a company whose losses in San Francisco were over $5,000,000. Like Mr. Damon, he arrived here the week after the fire. Concerning the earthquake damage Mr. Medicott said in print:

"Correct and grossly misleading reports were circulated all the world as to the damage directly caused by the earthquake. The shock was directly responsible for but a very small percentage of the fearful loss. The maximum figure given by the old conservative experts for the direct earthquake damage to property is ten million dollars. When we compare this with the loss, which was probably fully fifty times as much, it is why the San Francisco people so bitterly resent the placing of earthquake before the fire in the estimate of losses. Even if we did believe the earthquake was the cause of the fire, we cannot in any specific instance prove it. To a number of the insurance companies, therefore, it has appeared that they must place the earthquake effects as specific and not general in their contracts to their fire insurance contracts. Other companies take the view that the earthquake was the cause of all the loss. To one of us first mentioned this view appears wholly untenable and lacking in honor.

Another insurance man who did not permit his calling to warp his judgment is Robert Dickson, President of the Southern Insurance Company of New Orleans, and the Armenia of Pittsburg. Furthermore, Mr. Dickson occupied an absolutely unbiased position, for while Mr. Damon's company had lost over millions of dollars, Mr. Dickson's companies had five thousand at stake. He was here at the time of the earthquake and witnessed the conflagration. Here is what he wrote after returning East:

"Two days after the shock I walked various streets of San Francisco and did not see a building razed to the ground by the earthquake excepting two or three old frames. Some were damaged and racks appeared in others, but they were not damaged so as to come within the meaning of the New York standard policy.

"I had a room on the second floor of the St. Francis and remained in bed until after the earthquake was over. The plastering of the walls of my room fell, but the ceiling did not. When the earthquake was over I dressed and walked to the top of the structure. The twelfth floor not even the plastering was cracked. After descending to the grade floor I made an inspection of the building and did not find the walls cracked. In fact, there was only one place that I could see which showed the effects of the earthquake. The failure of the water supply was, of course, responsible for the destruction of the city.

"It is gratifying to be able to print such utterances as the foregoing, and to see that there are honest men in the insurance business. By that we do not mean to say that the honest men are in a minority. We do not. We are glad to be able to say that we think they are largely in the majority. But the 'compromise adjusters' have been making too much noise since their return to the East. If they are not silent they will hear in San Francisco soon, and they will hear in no uncertain tones, and with names, dates and particulars.

Is Gillett a Railroad "Hireling"?

The Republican candidate for Governor, James N. Gillett, is styled by the Sacramento Bee "the slave of the railroad monopoly," and "the mouthpiece of the Southern Pacific Railroad." The Bee also remarks that "the Argonaut is making itself the laughing-stock of a great city by denying these allegations concerning Mr. Gillett."

Very well. We have already asked the Bee certain questions re "railroad slavery," and we ask them again. Is it true that Gillett is the "slave of the railroad monopoly," what is the reason that he did not vote for M. Burns for United States Senator? Col. Burns was generally called "the railroad candidate."

Also we ask the Bee why Gillett worked for Thomas R. Bard for United States Senator? Senator Bard was not looked upon as a "railroad candidate." Furthermore, if Gillett "wears the collar of railroad slavery," what is the reason that he actively supported the Hepburn railroad rate bill in the last Congress? Not only the Southern Pacific Railroad, but every other railroad in the country was known to be opposed to the passage of that law. If Gillett is a "railroad hireling," why did he not oppose that bill? On the contrary, he supported it, and was looked upon by President Roosevelt as one of the tried and trusted supporters of railway rate regulation.

Since asking the Bee the first question we have taken the trouble to look up the record concerning the Senatorial fight over Col. Burns. We find that Gillett on January 9, 1899, nominated George A. Knight, and voted for him until January 19th. Gillett then voted for R. N. Bulla, and steadily voted for him until he dropped out, many weeks later. Knight was certainly not a railroad candidate. Bulla was certainly not a railroad candidate. If Gillett is a "railroad hireling," will the Bee tell us why he voted for these men instead of for Burns, who was generally reputed to be the railroad candidate?

An answer will greatly oblige.

We may add that since the Bee so stoutly asseverates that the Argonaut knows that Gillett was nominated for Governor by "the railroad," we may remark that we do not know it and we do not believe it. We believe that Gillett was nominated for Governor more largely through the personal exertions of his long-time friend, George A. Knight, than through the efforts of any man or set of men in the State of California. Knight was working for Gillett's nomination months before the convention met. If "railroad delegates" voted for Gillett, it was because they believed he was the choice of the convention, and therefore hastened to get into the Gillett band-wagon.

As to the "Argonaut being the laughing-stock of the State" over its political predictions, we can stand it, if true, which we doubt. We continue to predict the election of the Republican banner-bearer.

The Argonaut predicts Gillett.

"Bee" "Bell.

"Argonaut chooses Roosevelt.

"Bee" "Gompers.

Then after the first week in November the Argonaut and the Bee will compare predictions and compare laughs.

He laughs best who laughs last.

Comparative Payments of Insurance Companies.

It is now possible, more than five months after San Francisco's great fire, to survey the insurance situation with reasonable clearness, and to give to the square companies the praise their straight-forward methods merit; and to show on what basis the other companies are settling. The task is not an easy one, however, for between the dollar-for-dollar companies and the "welchers" pure and simple, there are as many conditions, almost, as there are companies. Then, again, the situation is changing continually; some of the companies, for instance, to save themselves from the inevitable day of reckoning with policy-holders elsewhere, are at this late day devising schemes that will enable them to announce that they have acted fairly in the present crisis.

The companies in this first group have, generally speaking, paid equitably adjusted loss claims in full; some have charged from 2 to 3 per cent for immediate cash settlements. They are generally agreed to be the companies that are sound financially, and that have settled honorably:

Aetna of Hartford.
Connecticut of Hartford.
Springfield of Massachusetts.
Liverpool and London and Globe.
Phoenix of London.
California.
Royal of Liverpool.
Queen of America.
Home of New York.

New Hampshire.
Continental.
Scottish Union and National.
Sun of London.
Northern of London.
Atlas.
Hartford.
North British and Mercantile.
Insurance Company of North America.
London Assurance.
Pennsylvania.
Union of London.
Law Union and Crown.
Citizens.
Manchester.
Niagara.
New York Underwriters.
Pelican.
Alliance of Philadelphia.
German Alliance.
German-American.
Glen Falls.
Phoenix of Hartford.
Teutonia.
Michigan.
American Central.
Mercantile of Boston.
St. Paul.
Northwestern National.
New Zealand.

A number of policy-holders state that the Williamsburgh City, on policies that do not contain the earthquake clause, is entitled to figure in the foregoing list. On the earthquake-clause policies, it has been refusing to acknowledge liability, and many suits have been brought against it. During the past fortnight, however, the Williamsburgh City has been making compromise settlements on disputed policies and has had over fifty suits against it dismissed; terms are said to range from 50 to 75 cents.

Companies that are generally reported to be paying from 75 cents up to a dollar are:

Providence-Washington of Rhode Island.
English-American Underwriters.
State of Liverpool.
Orient of Hartford.
London and Lancashire.
Fire Association of Philadelphia.
Caledonian-American.
Caledonian.
Scotch Underwriters.
Delaware of Philadelphia.
Prussia-National.
Phoenix of Brooklyn.
Philadelphia Underwriters.
Colonial Underwriters.
National of Hartford.
Rochester-German.
Western of Toronto.
Queen City.
Federal.
Hanover.
British-America.
British-American of New York.
Northwestern Fire and Marine.
Eagle.
Assurance Company of America.
Aachen and Munich.
Hamburg-Bremen.
National Union of Pittsburg.
Concordia.
Germania.
Buffalo-German.
Globe and Rutgers.
Westchester.
Western Underwriters.
Austin of Texas.

Companies that are generally reported to offer settlements varying from 50 to 75 cents on the dollar are:

Norwich Union.
Palatine.
Alliance of London.

Indemnity.

Commercial Union of London.

Commercial Union of New York.

Williamsburgh City (on earthquake policies).

Companies that have varying standards of adjustment and payment are:

The New Brunswick is said to be paying 70 cents.

The Girard is said to be paying 70 cents.

The Milwaukee Mechanics is said to be paying 70 cents.

The Spring Garden is said to be paying 60 cents.

The North River is said to be paying 65 cents.

The German of Freeport is said to be paying 60 cents.

The German-National is said to be paying 60 cents.

The American of Philadelphia is said to be paying 50 cents.

The German of Peoria is said to be paying 50 cents.

The Nassau is said to be paying 50 cents.

The American of Boston is said to be paying 40 cents.

The New York of New York is said to be paying 33 1-3 cents.

The Dutchess is said to be paying 30 cents.

Companies which have absolutely disclaimed liability are:

Rhine and Moselle of Germany.

Transatlantic of Germany.

Austrian-Phoenix of Vienna.

North German of Hamburg.

North German of New York.

The Atlantic-Birmingham at first refused to pay its losses, going so far as to withdraw its offices from California; it is now reported to be negotiating towards settlement with its San Francisco policy-holders, on what terms is not yet established.

The Fireman's Fund, the Home Fire and Marine, and the Pacific Underwriters were almost overwhelmed by the fire; their risks were nearly all here, their investments were mostly here, and their San Francisco stockholders were many of them ruined. However, they are making an effort to meet their obligations. They have made a first payment of twenty per cent., promise 50 per cent. cash, and the rest in stock. Their stockholders are repairing the impaired capital stock by assessment, and two-thirds of their policy-holders have signed an agreement to accept the foregoing terms.

The Traders of Chicago, and the Security of Baltimore are in the hands of receivers. The first-named made no effort to pay its losses, but sought legal cover immediately after the disaster.

EDITORS ON HEARST.

They Have Failed to Realize that He Is the Greatest American Advertiser.

For years the editors of important daily papers, East and West, have been viewing the continental performances of William R. Hearst with an air of half-amused and semi-detached interest, and have spoken of him infrequently and always with an assumption of immeasurable superiority. He might be interesting to those who cared for that sort of thing, but, really, the matter was not important. He had established and placed on a firm footing a number of daily papers, but they were not in the class of the older publications and not to be considered seriously as rivals. He had gone into politics; had been elected to Congress, and easily, but that was not a disquieting fact. It amused him, probably, and it did not hurt the faintly interested spectators. His name was brought before the National Convention of the Democratic party, and, strange to say, the nomination was supported by a respectable showing, in numbers at least. But that was merely a matter for passing pleasantries with the editors of daily papers not friendly to his aspirations. He had organized a new party in New York, and as its nominee, after a short campaign, had polled a vote that many believe was larger than that received at the time by any other candidate for mayor of the largest city in the United States. But he did not get the office, and what might have been an embarrassing situation was avoided. Now Mr. Hearst is the candidate of two parties, an Independence League and the Democratic organization including and included by Tammany Hall, for Governor of New York. And the editors of the important daily papers outside of Mr. Hearst's chain of publications have suddenly awakened to the fact that the millionaire owner of newspapers is a figure of national importance and not a curious, unclassified creature of freakish tendencies.

The Argonaut expected to note this change in the attitude of the editors. It did not occur as early as it was looked for, but it seems to be thorough and complete. The Argonaut is a disinterested spectator, and purposes to offer little of encouragement to bruin or buzzing assailants. At present the wrecking of furniture and fixtures appears to be generally within the Democratic confines, and it prompts no special admonition. Clippings from the editorial columns of nearly a hundred representative daily papers, all concerned with Hearst or Hearstism, have been made during the past week for possible use in the Argonaut. Their number and their wordiness give the compiler pause. They are varied in style, in temper, and in point of view, but they are as one in declaring that the subject is important. At the same time, two peculiar facts are observed in this mass of testimony—remarkable from a newspaper point of view.

Mr. Hearst's business success and political power are admitted, but they are explained by a superficial statement that should not satisfy even those who offer it. They say these are merely results of Mr. Hearst's lavish use of money and the hiring of able counsel, editorial, legal, and political. That is all there is to it. Anybody with millions and a desire to own daily papers in several cities could do as well. Having secured able editors and energetic business managers, newspaper success of a kind is a matter of course. Going on to another field—that of politics—the same tactics produce the same results. Regarding these achievements, it is not necessary to recognize a notable personality or intelligence in the head of the projects or plans. He may be spoken of as a figure-head only. His lieutenants furnish the brains and do the work. In fact, it is said that the Hearst of popular following is a myth. He is seldom seen, he does not impress one deeply when he is seen, and there is really nothing in him to see.

Newspaper men, managing editors at least, ought to know better than this. They hire many men, many able men, for the several departments of their newspapers, and they endeavor to secure the best service. Their object is the same as Mr. Hearst's—to gain a larger circulation for their papers and ever increasing patronage from advertisers. They know whether the task is an easy one, and whether success is easily won. They know whether it is easy to keep able men or to keep the involved machinery running smoothly and efficiently when the inevitable changes occur. They know whether it is easy to find men who can plan as well as execute, and they know whether it is a question of salary or ability. They know these things, but they do not seem willing to admit or see the unavoidable conclusion. Mr. Hearst has had many chiefs of staff. Men have been tried by Mr. Hearst and dismissed after trial. Men have made reputations on Mr. Hearst's papers and then have resigned to take similar positions elsewhere. But Mr. Hearst's papers, one after another, have gone on increasing in circulation and revenue-producing value. His New York Evening Journal is ten years old, and it has as many readers probably as any evening paper in the metropolis. If a mere figure-head with a deep purse could do this, some newspaper proprietors in New York and elsewhere have no reason to boast of the success they have won.

Another strange fact is observed in this connection, also from the standpoint of the newspaper proprietor. The first article in the creed of the newspaper business manager is the asserted belief, firm and unassailable, in the value of advertising. The practice of most newspaper business managers is a denial of that belief. But Mr. Hearst and Mr. Hearst's managers not only believe in it; they practice it. Hearst is today the best advertiser, the most daring advertiser, in America, the country where advertising was invented. Last week he bought a page in the New York World, his most widely circulated Democratic contemporary, and printed in that page two of his political speeches. He uses the columns of his own papers continually and shrewdly. The New York Evening Post reported Mr. Hearst's recent speech-making tour of that State in a contemptuous strain. His traveling companions, his receptions, his addresses, his manners, his political effectiveness, were viewed with apparently jaundiced eyes. Mr. Hearst's paper reprinted the Post's report calmly and in parallel columns copied the reports printed in local papers along the route, all gratifying even when not enthusiastically laudatory. Mr. Hearst asks no better advertising than that. He asks no better opportunity to convince his readers that his paper is always fair. And the public admires fairness.

It is hardly necessary to say that the Argonaut is not in sympathy with Mr. Hearst's ultimate or immediate political ambition. But it believes that the editors, Democratic or Republican, who affect to look down on Mr. Hearst's ability and knowledge of public wants and weaknesses, will experience in the next two a greater change of opinion than they have experienced in the past.

Hearst as a Candidate.

The following pointed paragraphs are clipped representative daily papers of New York State. They present the gist of the arguments or what is offered in opposition to Hearst and his ambitions.

Sincerity is the basis of confidence. On that all claim to be sincere. A professed friend of the people who is insincere is a pretender, a demagogue. Above all things, voters who Mr. Hearst's candidacy ought to make sure that he is sincere. His newspaper declares that there can not be "any doubt as to where he stands." Would a true and sincere friend of the people ever enter into a bargain according to the terms of the favorites and proteges of the Tammany boss will be named for supreme court judgeships?—New York Times (Rep.).

There is but one issue before the people of New York State that is whether they will take an unprincipled demagogue as a character at his own inflated valuation. The way to find Hearst adherents. Yet Hearst, without his inherited wealth, would be an absolutely insignificant person. Contrast him with McKinley and Bryan, poor men who rose to eminence by sheer force of ability and character—something Hearst never does. Without his money Hearst would not be known outside of his own ward. As a member of Congress he has pitifully useless. He has never given evidence of possessing ordinary knowledge of public affairs. His prominence is the product of "plutocracy." Yet the most bitter enemies of "plutocracy" are shouting for him. It is the strangest case of sycophancy and stultification which the political history of this country affords.—Rochester Democrat and Chronicle (Dem.).

It is one of the mysteries of human nature that the Heavens seem to come principally from the discontented elements continually railing against wealth. Come upon a group of less haters of those who are better off than themselves and you find Hearst adherents. Yet Hearst, without his inherited wealth, would be an absolutely insignificant person. Contrast him with McKinley and Bryan, poor men who rose to eminence by sheer force of ability and character—something Hearst never does. Without his money Hearst would not be known outside of his own ward. As a member of Congress he has pitifully useless. He has never given evidence of possessing ordinary knowledge of public affairs. His prominence is the product of "plutocracy." Yet the most bitter enemies of "plutocracy" are shouting for him. It is the strangest case of sycophancy and stultification which the political history of this country affords.—Rochester Democrat and Chronicle (Dem.).

William Randolph Hearst began his hunt for the governor on the "anti-boss" issue. He continues it as the favorite of four bosses—Murphy, McCabe, McGuire and Conners. He is going to send Murphy to prison. He accepts his nomination in Murphy's hands. He was going to destroy Tammany, now the Tammany candidate.—New York Evening Mail (Rep.).

Should Mr. Hearst be elected, and should he make the kind of Governor that he is a Congressman, the dear people compose their several minds. He won't cut enough ice to melt a cocktail.—Brooklyn Eagle (Dem.).

The size of the Hearst barrel this year is simply astonishing to the old, dyed-in-the-wool Democrats, who have had some experience of "dough" in previous campaigns in the city and State. The absolute prodigality with which money is being poured by the Hearst gang is something amazing.—Brooklyn Times (Rep.).

Not only is Boss Murphy for Hearst, but, despite the denial, he now virtually admits that he is for Boss Murphy. Could it be otherwise, in view of the disgraceful bargain sold to Mr. Hearst the emblems of the Democratic party? Hughes in this juncture is not a partisan, but is the candidate of all the people of the Empire State, who want decent government.—New York Herald (Dem.).

Several cartoons represent Hearst and Tammany, as it were, in arm-in-arm—would not the dog at heel more nearly represent truth? The humor of compelling Cockran to second the nomination was delightful. Remembering the subsequent marriage of Platt's nomination of Roosevelt a deal? The party whitewashed Cortelyou in regard to life insurance contributions to campaign funds and that sets its mark of approval on Mr. Hearst's refusal to have a recount, is not in a position to throw stones at a man who, at least, spends his own money—moreover the party shows the cloven hoof.—Correspondent New York City (Rep.).

Concerning the attacks on Charles E. Hughes, since he became the Republican candidate for Governor, posing Hearst, the papers have dug up the following endorsement of his work, which appeared in the New York American last December:

"No one in New York will question the excellence of the work done by the counsel for the people, Mr. Charles E. Hughes. He has drawn from the management of the companies under his guidance admissions which have damned them in the eyes of the public. He has done perhaps everything that could be done during the time at his disposal. If there should be no extension of his term, Mr. Hughes can retire with the perfect certainty that his work has the approval and aroused the commendation of the people."

Mr. Hughes, in his campaign speeches, charges that Hearst's pages are published by corporations that are not reached in suits for damages, and, further, that the corporations evade taxation by offering affidavits that their liabilities largely exceed the assets:

It appears that the New York American is published by the undersigned Star Company; that the New York Evening Journal is published by the undersigned New York Evening Journal Publishing Company, and the New York Journal is published by the undersigned Das Morgan Journal Association. You can not sue my opponent. If the Journal wagon runs over you, he is not personally liable. It is the property of a corporation, and according to this statement it would seem to be a difficult thing to get anything paid by it, if you got a judgment.

its, it apparently does not pay taxes, for my information the statement the assessment was removed.

of the New York City papers the World is the giving extended reports of Mr. Hearst's meetings and speeches. In one of the World's reports is his recital (made by Hearst in a speech in New York City) of his proceeding by law against the employees of the Herald have been held before the law for circulating indecent literature through the mails. The United States Government is the prosecutor. I had nothing personally and everything to lose personally from proceeding against this powerful newspaper but I did what I thought was right. I do not mind the enmity of the Herald if I shall win the opinion of my fellow-men. I can not expect the Herald to be about me, for the moral idiot who would employ the Herald for the first page of a home newspaper to advertise vice would not hesitate to lie. In Chicago Dunlap was in jail for the identical crime, less flagrantly committed by the irresponsible underlings of the Herald are before the jury for immorality and indecency. I defy Cadet to come home and face the United States authorities as perpetrator of the crime. Mr. Bennett wrote me a letter complimenting my newspaper and saying that he would not let me for my action in this matter. I hope he will be right. I shall be proud to have it remembered that I am a New York Herald from dragging innocent victims of vice and crime. Every word that I have just said, and I have the document here to establish the truth, I doubt if there is any newspaper in New York so true that it will print these facts tomorrow morning. The Herald had insinuated that Mr. Hearst embezzled money, and this statement was denied by Hearst's words:

"I never employed Chinese labor in all my life, and I do not have a foot of ground in Palermo, Cal., either directly or indirectly owned by Chinese labor employed on any property that I own in California or in any other State of the United States. The whole statement is a lie, and the Herald knows it to be so. No one can tell by the obvious effort of the writer to avoid a direct libel."

Alton B. Parker has issued a statement in charge made by Mr. Hearst, one paragraph of which is as follows:

"Nothing more than two years now I have submitted, and I will submit, to the wanton assaults of William R. Hearst. I have paid no more attention to his insulting and malicious speech of last evening than I have to his other speeches. It is not that the necessary and intended inference of his speech constituted an attack upon a great court, a court with which I am not surpassed in this or any other country."

Cleveland made a statement to a New York reporter which closes with this expression:

"I am, every voter of the State must settle with his own conscience in determining his action, in this emergency, but I regard the Democratic situation presented to my old friends in New York as an afflictive one."

The public is the authoritative organ of the radicals of the United States, is published in Chicago, and is edited by Louis F. Post, once Henry George's lieutenant in New York. While advising radicals to vote for the Public nevertheless mercilessly exposes the record in its relation to other radicals and their movements of the past:

"He has no compunction about pushing aside men of whom he stands for causes for which he also professes to stand, who refuse to enter his personal service, or who seem to him unworthy, neither has he any delicacy about bargaining for his ends with corrupt politicians who resist the causes he professes to stand for, but for ends of their own are willing to promote his ambitions."

Denver Post discusses the support Hearst is to Tammany Hall:

"Hearst sympathizers in New York do not seem to be at all over the accusation that he is hypocritical in accepting the support of Tammany. The point is whether he is with Tammany with him. It is plain to most persons, that Hearst would be foolish to refuse the votes of the Tammany people. Whenever the moral line is drawn on the part of the candidates, and candidates must take measures to prevent the votes of people from casting their ballots for them, they will come to a quixotic stage and become as ridiculous as Don Quixote. It is not the voters who go into the ring, but the candidates, and the attempt to draw a line of purity between the candidates is manifestly preposterous and impossible."

The New York Globe, a strong Hughes organ, does not deny Hearst's strength and the strong campaign he is making. It says:

"The public leaders are warning their lieutenants and the danger of over-confidence. They are saying it to assume that because the betting is two to one on the Republicans will have a walk-over. The statement of the Republican county headquarters that unless there is a registration of the anti-Hearst element next week, they will be such as to cause alarm."

"The papers supporting him are not numerous or powerful. Mr. Hearst has placed his newspapers at the disposal of the campaign managers and will publish copies daily to be used as campaign literature."

He has also used sharp methods by renting practically all the public halls in Brooklyn for every night until election in order to shut off mass meetings of Republicans. In very few instances Republicans have been able to procure halls to hold mass meetings in Brooklyn.

OLD FAVORITES.

Lady Godiva.

Not only we the latest seed of time,
New men, that in the flying of a wheel
Cry down the past; not only we, that prate
Of rights and wrongs, have loved the people well,
And loathed to see them overtaxed; but she Did more, and underwent, and overcame,
The woman of a thousand summers back
Godiva, wife to that grim Earl who ruled
In Coventry: for when he laid a tax
Upon his town, and all the mothers brought Their children, clamoring, "If we pay, we starve!"

She sought her lord, and found him, where he strode
About the hall, among his dogs, alone,
His beard a foot before him, and his hair
A yard behind. She told him of their tears,
And prayed, "If they pay this tax, they starve."
Whereat he stared, replying, half amazed,
"You would not let your little finger ache
For such as these?"—"But I would die," said she.
He laughed, and swore by Peter and by Paul:
Then filled at the diamond in her ear;
"O, ay, ay, ay, you talk!"—"Alas!" she said,
"But prove me what it is I would not do."
And from a heart as rough as Esau's hand,
He answered, "Ride you naked through the town,
And I repeat it;" and nodding as in scorn,
He parted, with great strides among his dogs.
So left alone, the passions of her mind,
As winds from all the compass shift and blow,
Made war upon each other for an hour,
Till pity won. She sent a herald forth,
And bade him cry, with sound of trumpet, all
The hard condition; but that she would loose
The people; therefore, as they loved her well,
From then till noon no foot should pace the street,
No eye look down, she passing; but that all
Should keep within, door shut and window barred.

Then fled she to her inmost bower, and there
Unclasped the wedded eagles of her belt,
The grim Earl's gift; but ever at a breath
She lingered, looking like a summer moon
Half dipt in cloud: anon she shook her head,
And showered the rippled ringlets to her knee;
Unclad herself in haste; adown the stair
Stole on; and, like a creeping sunbeam, slid
From pillar unto pillar, until she reached
The gateway; there she found her palfrey trapt
In purple blazoned with armorial gold.

Then she rode forth, clothed on with chastity:
The deep air listened round her as she rode,
And all the low wind hardly breathed for fear.
The little wide-mouthed heads upon the spout
Had cunning eyes to see: the barking cur
Made her cheek flame: her palfrey's footfall shot
Light horrors through her pulses: the blind walls
Were full of chinks and holes; and overhead Fantastic gables, crowding, stared: but she
Not less through all bore up, till, last, she saw
The white-flowered elder-thicket from the field
Gleam through the Gothic archways in the wall.

Then she rode back, clothed on with chastity:
And one low churl, compact of thankless earth,
The fatal by-word of all years to come,
Boring a little auger-hole in fear,
Peeped—but his eyes, before they had their will,
Were shriveled into darkness in his head,
And dropt before him. So the powers, who wait
On noble deeds, canceled a sense misused;
And she, that knew not, passed: and all at once,
With twelve great shocks of sound, the shameless noon
Was clashed and hammered from a hundred towers,
One after one: but even then she gained
Her bower; whence, re-issuing, robed and crowned,
To meet her lord, she took the tax away,
And built herself an everlasting name.

In presenting the name of Harvey E. Turner for the office of State Auditor to the Massachusetts Republican State Convention, Senator Henry Cabot Lodge took occasion to say: "It would be exaggeration to say that the coming elections in New York and Massachusetts will be the Austerlitz of American politics. It is no exaggeration to say that the coming elections in New York and Massachusetts will decide whether the government of these two States for the next year shall be American or Cossack." The New York World very embarrassingly for Lodge recalls that in his speech nominating U. S. Grant for President in 1880, Roscoe Conkling said: "The election before us will be the Austerlitz of American politics. It will decide whether for years to come the country will be Republican or Cossack."

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

James H. Higgins, the "boy mayor" of Pawtucket, nominated for governor by the Democratic State Convention of Rhode Island, will not be twenty years old until the votes are in. If elected, he will be the youngest Governor in the United States.

Tammany is 117 years old as an organization, and many of its leaders have essayed to control the party machinery as represented by the Democratic State Committee. All failed until the present year, and now Tammany is in complete control of the Democratic State organization, remarks the Boston Traveler.

Ex-Governor W. L. Douglas, of Brockton, Mass., the wealthy shoe manufacturer, who is now visiting the Pacific Coast, may be drawn into the gubernatorial race in his home State. He has received word that the Democratic nominee, John B. Moran, the noted District Attorney of Boston, has decided to withdraw, and that party leaders are urging Douglas's name as his successor.

Gov. Kibbey of Arizona has received a letter from President Roosevelt, stating that it has been reported to him that there will not be a fair count of the votes on the question of Statehood. President Roosevelt says that while he does not believe the rumors, as a precautionary measure he directs that representatives of the Statehood people be present when the votes are cast and counted.

The opposition to Senator Bailey is still active in Texas, but the State Democratic Committee has sent out a statement which says: "For the first time in the history of the State a senatorial nomination has been made at a general primary held under the law of the State. In the enactment of this law Texas is a pioneer, and it would be singularly unfortunate if, at this particular juncture, any serious effort were made to disregard this nomination."

Senator Chauncey M. Depew surprised the members of the Executive Committee of the New York Central Railroad by appearing at the weekly session at the Grand Central Station October 10. This was Mr. Depew's first attendance since last March, and the greeting extended to him by J. P. Morgan, H. McK. Twombly, James Stillman and others was most cordial. Mr. Depew took his place as chairman of the committee. He showed considerable spirit and was like his old-time self.

Ex-Congressman Theodore Bell found himself in an awkward situation at Riverside a few days ago. While making a speech urging his claims to the governorship, he asserted that every candidate who received a nomination at the Republican convention "was required to first go before the bosses and show what votes he could control for the head of the ticket." At this point Mrs. Hyatt, wife of the Republican nominee for State Superintendent of Public Instruction, rose and advanced to the platform, where she vigorously denied Mr. Bell's charge, so far as it concerned Mr. Hyatt. The audience applauded Mrs. Hyatt's courageous declaration, and Mr. Bell said that he would accept her statement.

Supreme Court Justice Greenbaum of New York City granted a peremptory writ of mandamus directing the Board of Elections to convene forthwith and give the election advertising to four Democratic newspapers supporting the candidacy of William R. Hearst for governor. Otto T. Hess, attorney for the Daily News, asserted that the Sun, World, Times and Staats-Zeitung, designated by the Board of Elections as Democratic newspapers, do not advocate the principles of that party, and, instead of advocating the election of William Randolph Hearst, the nominee of the Buffalo convention, they advocate the election of Charles E. Hughes, nominee of the Republican convention at Saratoga.

A bitter political fight has been engendered in Solano county by the placing of the name of Miss Irma McCarty on the Republican ballot for the superintendency of schools, as the opponent of the Democratic incumbent, Dan H. White. The teachers in attendance at the annual county institute organized and went about Vallejo, pulling down Miss McCarty's cards. Emboldened by their campaign the women invaded business places and tore down her cards. At one boarding house eleven teachers formed a committee and demanded that Miss McCarty's cards be removed from the office. Public sentiment has been aroused, and Democratic and Republican leaders have combined to elect Miss McCarty, as a rebuke to her vindictive political enemies, reports a news dispatch from Vallejo. The principal objection to Miss McCarty appears to be that she is a woman and her fellow teachers do not want a woman in the office. Miss McCarty taught for several years in Dixon, her home town, and was for a year the principal of one of the Richmond schools.

A VISITATION OF TERROR.

How a Brief Respite Came in an Unending Journey.

Those who were still seated in the inn were greatly surprised to see the outer door swing open, without any hand being laid upon the latch; and it would not be too much to say that they were more than surprised, even dumbfounded, upon perceiving two feet entering the room, slowly, shuffling as they came. Many people, in their terror and amazement, got upon the tables, or endeavored to hide. What could it mean—a pair of feet that walked alone, with no body, not even any legs, attached? After them there poured into the inn many curious and morbid spectators, on whose faces fear, wonder, and intense curiosity appeared. They at first sight believed the thing to be the artifice of some sorcerer, the work of some one versed in black magic.

But as the more intrepid observers drew nearer to the feet, it was seen that they were human, and that, within the worn and tattered shoe, there were two bleeding stumps, cut or hewn off at the ankle. It could be no mechanical contrivance, the work of no sorcerer; rather, the indication of some fearful crime, and the victim, who had evidently been hacked into shreds, was allowed by the Divine Powers to move his mutilated feet and in this way bring the assassination to the attention of those who would hound down the murderer and bring him to justice.

"It is a miracle! A miracle!" cried many of the standers-by. But the words ceased on their lips when they saw the feet shuffle, with their weird dragging motion, toward a wooden table, pausing before a bench, as though one wished to seat himself. At the same time amazement increased upon seeing a vessel of water on the table rise above it and tilt to one side, as though one drank from it. Slowly the vessel tilted more and more, and drop by drop the water entirely disappeared from it. After which the vessel again descended and rested upon the table, as by magic. Then the feet, from the vicinity of which all the spectators began to retreat, began to move toward the door; some one, with a scream of terror, flung it open and ran through it; the feet followed slowly and passed into the street, with those who had sufficient valor following behind at a safe distance. What could the thing mean, and what meant those unnatural, unearthly feet?

Hurriedly notice was sent to the village authorities, and those same hastened to the scene. Upon beholding the feet, the police were instructed to arrest them, being disturbers of the public peace and quiet. But the police feared to do so and ran away. Whereupon the head man of the village himself was called upon to make the arrest. It was to no purpose, for, as he fearfully attempted to lay hands upon them the feet gave such a great, superhuman leap that all the beholders fled, calling out in alarm; and not the slowest to run was the head man himself.

In the meantime the feet, which had been running in seemingly bewildered circles, commenced to flee down the great road. Some men who had arquebuses finally became brave enough to run after them and discharge their weapons; but as well might one have shot into the air. Still the feet went on, running until they seemed to tire; after that, shuffling along in their weird, unnatural fashion.

Seeing which, the people began to cry with one accord: "This is the doing of the Devil! Call the priest! Tell him to fetch book and bell, to exorcise this demon. Tell him to sprinkle this thing with holy water!"

"Exorcise the demon!" echoed all the frightened people, gathering as near as they dared to the feet, which in their supernaturalness seemed to defy gunpowder, and jailers, and all the powers of the world.

Soon the priest arrived and sprinkled the feet with holy water, but to no effect. The feet, ignoring all exorcism and exhorting of the priest, continued to shuffle about and terrify all who beheld them. Upon seeing which the priest ordered that they be driven into the prison near by and shut up, bolted in with iron bolts. His words were seized upon with acclamations, and a picked line of proved men was formed, leading to the prison door. Then the feet, now so tired that they could barely move along, were driven into the jail to the strongest cell therein. The door was bolted and barred with iron, and the priest besprinkled it plentifully with holy water. Then those who had made the capture, feeling that the feet could not now escape, began to disperse, talking and marveling among themselves what manner of miracle this could be.

Meantime, it was necessary to place guards without the prison walls, not only to keep the feet from escaping through the iron-barred windows, but to control excited and maddened people who, having just heard of the miracle, were fighting and crowding each other to the death in their desire to climb to the windows and see for themselves the things of which they had been told.

After a time lines were formed and each man looked through the window in his turn, retiring in amazement after perceiving the mysterious feet reposing in a dark corner of the prison cell.

During the next few days many were the wondering people who journeyed in from distant places to see, and who returned to their homes in amazement, shaking their mystified heads, and unable, one and all, to explain the miraculous occurrence. And, as time passed and no one could understand or explain, people began to lose interest—no one thought more about the worn and shuffling feet except the jailers who had to guard them. Even the jailers themselves lost interest; for what sort of a prisoner was it who needed not food or water, and who had not even a visible body to guard? As the door and windows of the cell were most strongly bolted, and holy-watered, the guards did not even peer into the room where the prisoners were confined; what was the use?

But one day a new jailer who was for the first time on duty received a terrible shock. He had been told in detail of the feet, and, taking his first opportunity to look at them, got such a fright that he almost lost his wits in consequence. For, upon peering into the darkened corner where the feet always sought to hide themselves, he was dumfounded to see that they were feet no longer. That is to say, the miserable, worn and tattered shoes were still there, with their contents of seemingly human flesh; but attached to those feet and ankles were a pair of stout and strong legs, extending upward and ending at the hips.

The terror of the jailer can not be described when he fully realized that he was not the victim of an optical delusion, and that the legs, as well as the feet, were actual realities! And as he stared, in his fright unable to move hand or foot, he saw the feet move out of their corner; the legs began to swing themselves, and the supernatural Thing stride out into the cell and toward the window where he stood. That roused him from his terror stricken trance, and with loud yells of fright he fled the spot.

Hearing his screams, the whole jail, and indeed the whole village itself, hurried to see what was wrong, and upon hearing what had occurred, to witness the phenomenon.

And phenomenon it was, verily. Never before or since has such a thing been seen! Moving about on the floor of the cell were the feet, and their legs, measuring off step after step. Measuring, indeed, for the legs resembled nothing more than a huge compass, such as was never used by earthly engineer. First one foot planted itself upon the floor, then the other one lifted and swung about the other, which was lifted and planted in its own turn. Never, as was said before, had the people seen such a sight to equal this—a thing not to believe, unless seen with one's own eyes.

Guards and jailers were trebled and kept before the windows by both night and day; and they, with the people who daily stood in line, could see how this terrible Thing went on forming, stomach, flanks and thighs; its flesh forming like that of the zoophytes. The matter of this stupendous reincarnation was noised far and wide, and colossal was the sensation. From far and wide came those who had heard of the Thing, and the people trembled in terror of the moment when the body should reach its entire growth—trembled with terror and curiosity at the same moment. All, even those who most feared, wondered what manner of head and face the already forming shoulders would take upon themselves, the priest and his followers declaring that it would surely have horns, and many others predicting that several heads would grow, instead of one.

Time passed on, and the head began to form. It was a great disappointment, being only a single one with one face and no vestige of horns. To be sure, the face was of a peculiar and unusual hideousness, the eyes red and glaring, and the nose hooked, enormous, truly Jewish!

Seeing that the Thing now had a face, a human face, and a mouth and tongue, the people speculated wildly as to whether he could or would speak. And whether if he, "the Reincarnate," as they called him, would be able to speak their language, in case his nearly created tongue could make intelligible words at all.

Great was the speculation, and many were the learned men who came from far and near to hear the first words, whether intelligible or not, of the strange and wonderful creature.

Intelligible they were! A voice, faint as it was fraught with anguish, came one morning from the cell: "Open—open—for pity's sake!"

People trembled and fainted; a quiver of fear shook the entire assembly of men and women who had waited for this very thing. The head men deliberated among themselves as to what they should do, and finally concluded to open the prison door; for the faint and anguished voice led them to believe that their prisoner was at best a poor miserable human, entirely at their mercy. So, very carefully, some clothing was passed to him through the window, and the head man, with new-born confidence, went to the window to speak.

"My friends," at last exclaimed this personage, turning from the window to the assembled multitude miserable man (for he is merely a man) declared if we will allow him to go away in freedom he us who he really is, and how his marvelous creation was caused. Shall we do this?"

"We consent. Bring him forth!" cried the multitude. The door of the dungeon was opened, and one tottered forth once more into the light of a medium stature, he was well-built and muscular, unkempt beard and sinister, melancholy countenance. His skin was yellow, waxen; and his gloomy aspect but heightened by the enormous nose which projected above the sorrowful mouth, with its dolorous, painful expression.

It was not possible for all to see him, the place was unable to contain so tremendous a multitude, and the people there came a mighty cry: "Take the plaza of Calvary!" "Stand him on the high cross!"

But such was the convulsion of fear into which the stranger fell upon hearing these words, such screams and shouts of protest that he uttered, that he was obliged to seek another spot. Therefore they went to the outskirts of the town and, mounted on a hill of the great wall, he uttered, amidst the most profound silence, the stupendous words which told the multitude who he was.

"Eighteen miserable centuries of existence gone through, supported by these same feet which have given you cause for so much fear. My body has perished many thousands of times, though never completely; for my feet, like my unhappy soul, continue to eternal existence upon the face of the earth, assisting thousands of deaths. From them has sprung the new body, in my corporeal reincarnation, impelled always by His words to journey on and the end of all the centuries.

"My last death occurred there in the mountain which you see, snow-covered, in the far distance. My never-ending wanderings I was overcome and devoured by a pack of wolves who made an earthly coverings, but refrained from devouring me. So it has always been; so it will always be! I have once more survived, as they must continue to do through countless centuries, and from them will come up time after time a new body, to pass through the same cycle of ages. Until He comes! The re-birth of the body, which you witnessed with horror, is ordained because my steps must never end upon the earth. I alone may hear urges me ceaselessly, repeating: 'Wander, Ahasuerus! Wander, Ahasuerus!'

And the people, now understanding who this terrible being was, fell away from his vicinity in vicious anger and loathing; making the sign of the cross and with sprinkling of holy water, they cried cord: "Wander, unhappy, thrice-cursed Wander!"

And the Jew errant, the accursed Ahasuerus, with long wail of anguish and horror, fled from the into the darkening night, wandering—wandering.

Many Chicago lawyers who were found by United States investigators to have looted the Cook County courts to conceal divorce cases threatened with contempt proceedings. John I. charge of the chancery record writers of the Court, has ordered 125 Chicago lawyers to return the vaults the official records of divorce cases for they gave receipts, but which they never returned. Some of the court records were taken from the files as sixteen years ago, and scores of them, some of the noted divorce cases, are said to have been lost. The action taken is the first to cure an evil with which the courts have been burdened for several years.

With the repatriation of the army, excepting the permanent garrison, Russian commercial and industrial activity in Manchuria appears to have collapsed. The latest information is that Harbin has been deserted by a majority of its former inhabitants. The demand for population for the purpose of commerce has been reduced to modest dimensions in comparison with the days of the war. The streets are empty and restaurants not patronized. Nothing flourishes, except robbery and pillage. The flour mills established during the war seem incapacitated for peaceful competition with Japanese millers. The Japanese are busy in Manchuria and north China.

The new policy of separating the races on street cars went into effect at Savannah, Ga., a short time ago. Reports from there say that the colored folks as a result of being mortally offended, and disposed to boycott the cars. They are given places on the same cars, but are lined up in the back seats. They admit that they should feel greatly offended if given the front seats; it is the distinction or separation which angers.

A MIDNIGHT SUPPER.

In the City That Was.

last week I saw the following paragraph in a Boston newspaper:

Marie Jansen, or Johnson, the actress, who has been contrary to the will of her step-father, Benjamin Johnson, who had her in that document, was in court yesterday when the will was read. The will was upheld, and she will take nothing from the estate. Miss Jansen while on the stand testified she was born in 1857.

to this more than middle-aged litigant, asking the Massachusetts courts to give her some of the money left Benjamin Johnson, is little Marie Jansen who was the first of the comic opera stage some years ago. Let me say "many years ago," even if Marie was born in 1857. That would make her today forty-nine years old. And who that saw that diminutive brunette as Olivette in the early eighties can tell her now as a more than middle-aged woman doubling the half century cape in life.

Let me see—when was it that Marie Jansen made her first appearance in San Francisco? It must have been about 1882. At that time Nat Goodwin was playing "The Member from Slocum," followed by "The Bells," with an imitation of Henry Irving, which he enjoyed immensely because we had never seen him do it. At that time Nat Goodwin had a new wife—Mrs. Eliza Weathersby. Nat always had a weakness for young women. I will not say new wives, as is the habit with many of his actor friends. His weakness has been criticised in that regard. She had been the star in one of the troupes of "British Blonde Burlesques," which—survivors of the Lydia Thompson time—then occupied the American stage. Nat's present wife is also very pretty, perhaps entitled to be called beautiful. The former wife was a brilliant blonde; the present wife is an equally brilliant brunette.

At the same time Ernesto Rossi was playing "Cello" at the Baldwin, then a new uptown theatre in the City That Was. Nat Goodwin was playing town at the Bush Street Theatre. Bush and Nat were then the night centre of the city. At the San Theatre Frederic Haase was giving Shakespeare's plays in German. At the old California Theatre was the Comley-Barton troupe, in which Marie Jansen was the prima donna. She opened as Madame Riche, and I remember that John Howson, as the Marquis de Ponsable, was a marvel of squeaky voice. Not only John's voice, but his very joints cracked. Digby Bell played Favart, while his then wife, Laura Joyce, played the Countess. At that time Marie Jansen was new to the stage—big and tall, but a handsome woman. "Patience" followed with Marie Jansen in the role, with John Howson as Bunthorne, James Cavanagh as Col. Caverly, and Laura Joyce as Lady Jocelyn.

John Howson as Bunthorne presented a perfect replica of Oscar Wilde, who was then lecturing in San Francisco, imitating even Wilde's stiff-kneed, tight-toed walk, and the caressing gesture with which he would put back his long locks.

Next the troupe gave "Olivette," which had an enormous vogue at that time. It was about the last of the comic operas, in my opinion. The torch which had been handed down from Offenbach to Audran was extinguished when it fell from Audran's stiffeners, and no one has been able to light it since. I eat many promising young men think they write comic operas, and a great many thousands of people would listen to them and doubtless think the composers composed comic operas. But they are neither comic nor are they comic.

"Olivette," although Marie Jansen's voice was really very charming. Her costume certainly was the limit. The Comley-Barton troupe, although they played twenty years ago, were pioneers in nudity. Nothing has since surpassed them. The young women who represented aides-de-camp to the noble wore cocked hats, sleeveless uniform coats, corsets, low-cut corsages, and tights. This combination of male and female dress was very droll. They used to go through an elaborate drill which was like a "silent Zouave drill," so called because no orders were given. It was the most perfect drilling of its kind I ever saw. Oddly enough, women are much more apt to do things than men. It is true that ballet masters and stage managers at rehearsals are sometimes forcibly restrained from falling on the stupid new girls in the second row and clubbing them to death. But these girls are intellectual marvels compared with their militia in learning the goose step or the manual of arms. John Howson, by the way, played Ponsable delightfully. He was as senile as Mezieres, but not so salacious. The French comedian was salacious as well as and salacious senility is unpleasant. I always believed that Richard Mansfield patterned some of the salacious sides of his Baron de Chevalier on the Ponsable of Mezieres.

I said but now that John Howson had modeled his Bunthorne on Oscar Wilde. That peculiar person was at the time visiting San Francisco. I met him twice: one evening at a dinner at the Bohemian Club—not given in his honor, by the way, but merely the regular club table d'hôte, to which he was invited by a member; on another occasion at a supper given in the old Maison Doree. Now be it understood that in the way of restaurants there was more than one entitled "Maison" in the old City That Was. There was the Maison Doree. There was the Maison Riche. And there were others. The Maison Riche, by the way, was so baptized by Marie Aimee on her first visit to that restaurant at the urgent request of John Somali, the proprietor. John was one of the characters in the old City That Was. He always had an uneasy fear that something would happen to the city, so he carried around with him never less than a thousand dollars in bills and gold, preferably gold. But when the terrible something happened John was quietly resting where the quake doth not shock, though the fire may afflict. How extremely useful would he have found his thousand dollars on April 18, 1906!

The Maison Doree was one of the few French restaurants which was considered quite proper. The aristocrats of the time were in the habit of lunching and dining there, and even "upstairs" was not considered tabooed, for a young member of the jeunesse doree could there give a luncheon or a dinner to a young person of the opposing sex, if they were properly safeguarded with chaperons. Thus was it on the night in question. The midnight supper was given by Eugene Dewey, a man of infinite charm, a prince of hosts, prematurely gray, but with "no wrinkles on his heart," as the French proverb runs. To this repast were bidden the stars of the Comley-Barton troupe, among whom were, naturally, Marie Jansen, and others already mentioned. There was also at the supper Helen Dineon, who herself subsequently became a comic opera singer of note. At that time she was merely a promising amateur. Helen was the daughter of Leon Dineon, the proprietor of the Maison Doree, a jolly old chap with torrents of white hair cascading over his brows, and bright, black, twinkling eyes, well known to the Four Hundred in the City That Was. Thus in addition to the companions whom some of the comic opera stars brought with them as chaperons—and as chaperons they were highly trained—we had with us "the daughter of the patron." The daughter of the house being with us, it is quite evident that the affair was entirely respectable. In short, it was "for the good motive," as the French say, and we were quite European.

Among the men seated at the host's right hand was Barton Key, the manager of the company, whose chief claim to fame rested on the fact that he was the son of the man who had been shot by General Sikes. Then there were John Howson, Alfred Cellier, a certain number of local good fellows, and Oscar Wilde. The latter gentleman came in shop attire, as he had done at the Bohemian Club, with his long hair freshly perfumed, his sunflower, his velvet knee-panties, and his silver-buckled shoes. I remember thinking him at the time the most astounding ass I had ever met. In this I was wrong. He was playing the buffoon for money merely.

Looking back through the mist of years, I remember that supper began at about half after midnight when most of the guests had "done their work." It lasted until about half-past four. Although Marie Jansen was the star of the opera, Helen Dineon was the star of the supper. She would sit at the piano, sing, and accompany herself; or she would play accompaniments for others to sing; or she would play waltz music for others to dance; or she would suddenly leap from the piano stool, put some one else there, and execute a few steps to illustrate what she was saying or singing, and then return to the piano. She sang songs in English, French, Italian, German—even some delightful Spanish canzonetas. Many of the local jeunesse doree looked at Helen with amazement when they saw how she had eclipsed the visiting stars.

What a night it was! What interest, what amusement, what merriment compressed into a few hours! Chorus followed story, story followed song. What a group of interesting men! What a lot of pretty women! Marie Jansen in those days was one of the prettiest women on the stage. Perhaps the only one to compare with her was Lillian Russell, who was playing (as I remember) in Willie Edouin's "Fun in a Photograph Gallery." Lillian was then married to a fiddler. She always had a weakness for fiddlers. This was her second fiddler, I believe, but his name I have forgotten. I do not mean the third fiddler. I think the third fiddler was Solomons. In those days Lillian was prettier than one of Watteau's marquises, and Marie Jansen was almost as pretty as was Lillian.

Among the interesting men at supper was Alfred Cellier, one of the most charming and accomplished men

I ever met. He was the composer of "Doris," "Dorothy," and other operas; a musician, a brilliant talker, a jolly story-teller, and had seen much of life in the great capitals of the world. He was half an Englishman and half a Frenchman; his father French, his mother English. He spoke both languages with equal fluency; he was perfectly bi-lingual, and he seemed to be half Saxon and half Gallic. When Helen Dineon did not accompany her own songs at the piano, Cellier accompanied her or any one else. She had no music; neither had he; nobody had any music. To Cellier it made no difference whether he had ever heard a melody before, he would play an accompaniment to it which even at first was not a halting or uncertain one, and which would evolve into rich and bizarre harmonies as the melody progressed. When Joe Redding sat down and played his own composition entitled "Opus Einst"—an immortal symphony now entirely forgotten—we frantically encored him. Joe Redding was then youthful and shy, with the shrinking timidity of the wood violet. He hesitated in responding. Cellier rose timidly, bowed deeply, modestly accepted the encore, and went to the piano. Although he had heard "Opus Einst" but once, he played it through exactly as the composer had done, and then repeated it in a Niagara of harmonies, through which occasionally and contrapuntally "Opus Einst" could be heard plaintively tootling like "Yankee Doodle" on a flute.

How can you remember all these names and all these incidents after the lapse of so many years? the reader may ask. To which I would reply: Do you not think that they are worth remembering? But I will add that I have all my life had the habit of keeping theatre and concert programmes, menu and dinner cards, and all manner of paper records of trifles. Thus I have kept many menu cards of dinners with the names of the guests written on the back, frequently in autograph. Such a card I found the other day, and it brought back the memory of this midnight supper of so many years ago. This card had been misplaced, which is why I found it; it had been used as a book-mark. But all the rest of my programmes, dinner cards, and similar souvenirs, which were carefully arranged and filed away, were burned in the great fire of last April. This shows the advantage of being methodical and of saving things.

There is no climax to this narrative. It is merely a jotting down of the fleeting recollections of an event of years ago. Probably the reader may say it is commonplace. Perhaps he may say the boys of today have as good a time as the old boys had.

Perhaps they do.

And then again perhaps they don't.

Considerable disparity of opinion has resulted from the presence of an African Bushman pygmy boy in a large cage provided for monkeys in the Bronx Zoo, New York. The little African, whose name is Oto Benga, visited the St. Louis fair, and, liking the country, came back with Dr. Verner, a traveler. When he arrived there was difficulty about providing lodging for him. Benga was too wild for hotel life, even at the Astoria, and not being used to civilization, required attentive guardianship. Finding that wild creatures are made comfortable in the Zoo, Dr. Verner saw Director Hornaday, who said he would take care of Benga, and gave him quarters at the Zoo. Benga was happy there, but the Colored Baptist Ministers' Conference took the view that Benga was giving a degrading exhibition of a human being in a cage with apes, and appointed a committee to do something about it. Benga, who speaks the Hottentot language, was then taken out of the cage and will soon go to North Carolina, where Dr. Verner will send him to school, and qualify him to disclose even more impressively than now how immeasurably far apart is the lowest grade of human creature from the highest grade of ape.

A Canadian Pacific Railroad survey party is said to have left Vancouver for an exploration survey of the country between Comox and Alberni, on the coast of Vancouver island. It is thought that the purpose of the company is to establish a Pacific terminus for its railway and fleet on the west coast of the island and transport its trains across the stretch from the mainland by ferry. Comox is nearly in the direct line from Vancouver, and Alberni lies practically due west. It is near the head of a deep gulf running into the coast, which would afford shelter for a large fleet. Should the plan suggested be carried out one day's sailing would be saved on the voyage to Japan.

A German sanitary expert points out that the reason why beer is often sold at a temperature so low as to be injurious to the stomach is that at that temperature it is difficult to tell stale beer from good beer.

VERSATILE "HANS BREITMANN."

Master of Gypsy Lore, Pioneer of Industrial Education, Prince of Letter Writers.

A biography of Charles Godfrey Leland, one of the most picturesque figures and strongest individualities in American literature, has appeared. The author is Elizabeth Robins Pennell, his niece, who was "Hans Breitmann's" companion in the last period of his career. Leland's life was spent in a continual quest of the strange, the odd, and the mysterious. In the French revolution of '48 "le citoyen" Charles commanded a band of Latin Quarter students at the barricades; in the Civil War days he had remarkable adventures in the backwoods of Tennessee and West Virginia, being the only white allowed at the secret ceremonies of the negroes; in '67 he was initiated with wild incantations into the Kaw Indian tribe; he was the discoverer of "Shelta," the language of the vagabond tinkers, which had its origin in the ancient Celtic tongue; as the possessor of the famous Black Stone of the Voodooists, he was a high-priest of Voodooism; he was called Master by Continental witches, and was welcomed by Gypsies in every country as one of their own; and he knew more than any one of what he jocularly called "the folk-lore at first hand among niggers, Romanys, Dutch Uncles, hand-organ men, Injuns, bar-maids, tinkers, etc." A small library of scholarly volumes by the Rye (the title by which Leland was known to his friends, and every Gypsy on the roads) attests that his interest in these queer subjects was not that of a dilettante or faddist. But fate ludicrously decreed that he should be best known to the reading public as "Hans Breitmann," the hero of a series of comic ballads in German dialect, which Leland wrote at odd moments for pastime. The creator of the bibulous Hans thought very little of him, but when Leland journeyed to Europe, shortly after the publication of the ballads, he was everywhere greeted as the philosophical German of the verses. Mrs. Pennell writes of the author's distaste of this notoriety.

When the Rye arrived in London, he was received as Hans Breitmann; the "one thorn in his cushion," for he resented nothing so much as being identified with the disreputable old adventurer who was no more like him than the Heathen Chinee was like Bret Harte. "Breitmann has become my autocrat and has imposed his accursed name on me—and thou helpest him!" he wrote as late as 1895 to Mr. Fisher Unwin, who had published his photograph and labeled it "Hans Breitmann," in a little volume called "Good Reading." And I remember his disgust, at much the same period, when the editors of a magazine objected to his choice of the photograph of himself for which they had asked him: "I suppose they want a Hans Breitmann with a beer mug!"

Charles Godfrey Leland was born in Philadelphia, August 15th, 1824. Of Puritan ancestry, he graduated from Princeton in his twenty-first year, as unversed in the ways of the world as "most boys in the United States are at the age of twelve or thirteen." But the spirit of some restless forebear was working in him, and when he sailed for Heidelberg to complete his education, adventure followed fast on adventure. The years spent in Germany, France and Italy made a cosmopolite of the young student, but on his return Philadelphia did not take kindly to his German mysticism, and Leland's beginnings in active life were attended by discouragements. Mrs. Pennell writes of the first promising offer for his journalistic work, which came from New York:

It was Barnum who made it, as it always pleased the Rye, with his love of the "queer," to remember. Of Barnum's extraordinary performances, surely the most extraordinary was the launching of Hans Breitmann as an independent journalist.

Barnum was then in the first flush of notoriety, prepared to run all creation when necessary, and, in the meanwhile and in partnership with the Brothers Beech, to run a big illustrated weekly. Barnum had asked Dr. Rufus Griswold to be editor of the "Illustrated News," and Griswold—"journalist, literary critic, discoverer, and monitor of poets and poetesses"—had accepted, partly in order to oppose the post of assistant to the "young Leland."

Some of his friends might be shocked at the very idea of even speaking to "the showman," to say nothing of working for him. The Rye appreciated Barnum's kindness. "Uncle Barnum," he says in one place, "was always good as gold to me." Moreover, in Barnum there was the oddness, the picturesqueness, that never failed to attract him in people, as in art and literature.

To the Rye, the lover of the odd, he was "a genius like Rabelais, but one who employed business and humanity for material, instead of literature, just as Abraham Lincoln, who was a brother of the same band, employed patriotism and politics. All three of them expressed vast problems, financial, intellectual, or natural, by the brief arithmetic of a joke." This was the sort of "arithmetic" his sense of humor helped him to tackle. He has left a pleasant picture of proprietor and assistant editor preparing together the humorous column which was a feature of the paper, the proprietor deferring to the assistant "as a small schoolboy defers to an elder on the question of a game of marbles or hop-scotch," the two editing their puns, reading their good things to each other, as happy as boys at play. A book of jokes "By Barnum and Hans Breitmann" would, the Rye adds, "have been a very nice book indeed."

But the Prince of Showmen found it more difficult to publish a financially successful illustrated weekly journal than to exploit his "fifty million unparalleled moral wonders," and the paper "died a-borning." The future loomed brighter for young Leland, however, and he rapidly made many friends in the literary set. Of Hawthorne, Leland writes:

He is "a moody man who sat by the stove and spoke to no one." N. P. Willis, pointed out to the boy years before as a celebrity—a young gentleman then with curly hair and very foppish air—was still a shining light in New York, still by sheer swagger and dangerous "Hurry-Graphs" forcing the public to accept him at his own estimation, even while the few laughed at "Niminy-Piminy Willis," and his own sister slanged him as "Jenny Jessamy." Bryant, the popular poet he will never be again; the Misses Warner, scarcely known by name now, but classics to the generations brought up on "Queechy," and "The Wide Wide World;" Alice and Phoebe Cary, gentle and ladylike as their verses; John Godfrey Saxe, another of the neglected; Henry Ward Beecher, his notoriety yet some distance ahead of him—these and many more made a literary group as important to themselves, if not to the world, as the Boston Club or the Brook Farm philosophers.

Throughout his life Leland maintained a striking dual personality. Leland, the philologist, the translator of Heine, the author of many well-read volumes, was the intimate of Tennyson, Bulwer-Lytton, Browning, Lowell, Holmes, Besant; Leland, the chum of the nomad, and strange folk generally, from whom no secrets were withheld, was not above joining in the tavern celebrations of their kind. Of his introduction to the Gypsies, Mrs. Pennell says:

At the age of forty-five, the Rye found himself free for the first time to order his life and choose his company, and straightway, he fell among Gypsies and became the Rye in earnest. The Gypsies, however, did not fill all his life or form all his company. He would not have liked them so well if they had. Half the charm was in the sort of dual existence that came of devoting part of his time to them, part to conventional society and pursuits—the Jekyll-Hyde combination in its romantic aspect.

Of this love for the Gypsies I can speak from my memory of the old days. And as, since his death, all his Gypsy papers and collections have been placed in my hands, I now know no less well—perhaps better than anybody—just how hard he worked over their history and their language. For, if "Gypsying" was, as he said, the best sport he knew, it was also his most serious pursuit. There were notebooks, elaborate vocabularies, stories, proverbs, songs, diaries, lists of names, memoranda of all sorts; there are great bundles of letters, a few from Gypsies, the greater number from Romanys; for nothing, I do believe, ever united men as closely as love of the Gypsy—and it happened that never was there a group of scholars so ready to be drawn together by this bond, borrow their inspiration, as they would have been the first to admit.

Of all the little group not one got to know the Gypsies better, loved them more honestly, and wrote about them more learnedly, yet delightfully, than the Rye—the name by which they, as well as I, knew him best.

If at home, up to 1869, he had never fallen among Gypsies. Fate so willed it that he should spend much of his time in England in the town of all others where to escape them was impossible for the few who did not want to escape, though most people there would not have known a Gypsy had they seen one. This was Brighton, middle-class and snobbish, still too dazzled by the royalty that once patronized it to have eyes for the Romanies who, however, were always to be found at the Devil's Dyke, but a few miles off. It was another piece of luck that chief among these Romanies should be old Matty Cooper, in his way as remarkable a personage as the Regent had been before him. Matty is effectively described in a letter to Mrs. John Harrison from Brighton (October 28, 1871): "There is a very romantic and extraordinary place, six miles from here, called the Devil's Dyke. It is a very large old Roman encampment a mile long, around a very high hill from which one can see sixty steeples and several interesting places. I walked over there one Sunday, and while there, asked for Old Gentilia, the Gypsy who tells fortunes, whom I had not seen for a year. I found a Gypsy man in Romanys rig, i. e., with red and yellow neckerchief, knee breeches, and cut-away coat—her brother. So I accosted him with Sarishan! (Greeting), to which he replied, Cushto divvus (Good day). And I, (How've you been beshe sore acovar tatten?) (How have you been all summer?) And he said he had been picking hops and earned shilar chindis, or four shillings, a day. For I am getting quite fluent in Gypsy, which is very queer, for they always refuse to talk it or teach it—but I verily believe that I have some magic power over them, for they really seem to teach me all they can. I am told that I am probably the only man in England except Borrow who has learned it."

And it was another part of the charm the Romanies had for the Rye that, thanks to them, he could travel nowhere and not find friends waiting for him. All his journeys during these years meant so many chapters for his Gypsy books. He went to Russia for the winter, and the record is in his papers on the Russian Gypsies who sang to him in St. Petersburg and Moscow. He attended the Oriental Congress in Paris in 1878, and he might have forgotten it himself, but for his meetings with the Hungarian Gypsies who played for him at the Exposition. He wandered over England, here, there, and I, for one, could not say where, were it not for the Gypsies, who, in each new place, gave him fresh material for his books. He spent a summer in Wales, Palmer with him, that would be a blank in the story of his life, but for the discovery of Shelta, the encounters with some of the deep, wild Welsh Gypsies, and the strange legend that grew up among them of his passing.

He loved them as a friend, he studied them as a scholar, and to such good purpose that, when they have vanished forever from the roads, they will still live and wander in the pages of his books. Even if Borrow had never written, the Romanys would be immortalized in "The English Gypsies," and "The Gypsies."

His discovery of Shelta, or the "tinker's talk" is told in the following characteristic incidents:

One summer day, in 1876, on the road near Bath, he met a tramp, but a tramp in whom he read the "signs," and who, after the first interchange, confided "We are givin' Romanes up very fast—all on us is. It is a-gettin' to be too blown. Everybody knows some Romanes now. But there is a jib that ain't blown." He further confided that this jib is "most all old Irish, and they calls it 'Shelter,'" though confidence stopped here. If "Shelter" too was ever to be "blown," he, anyway, was not the man to blow it.

Another year (1877) and the Rye was in Aberystwith with Professor Palmer. No Romanys ever yet went to Wales who did not return the richer for many strange adventures, from Borrow and Groome to Mr. John Sampson, the latest of the company. And the Rye and Palmer were not the men to prove exceptions. They could not go out together, in the streets of the little town, or by the sea, or in the beautiful wild country all around, and not meet with the Romanys. Sometimes the Romanys was a tinker less troubled by scruples than the tramp near Bath, and ready to reveal how much more there was in Shelta worth "blowing" than the name.

"One morning" in Philadelphia three years later—I tell it in the Rye's words—"as I went into the large garden which lies around the house wherein I wone, I heard by the honeysuckle and grapevine a familiar sound, suggestive of the road and Romanys and London, and all that is most traveler-esque. It was the tap, tap, tap, of a hammer and the clang of tin, and I knew, by the smoke that so gracefully curled at the end of the garden, a tinker was near. And I advanced to him, and as he glanced up and greeted I read in his Irish face long rambles on the roads."

This tinker at work in the pretty old Philadelphia "back-yard" was Owne, to whom the world owes by far the larger part of the vocabulary of Shelta published in "The Gypsies."

"There you are, readers!" is the Rye's summing up, at the end: "Make good cheer of it, as Panurge said of what was beyond him. For what this language really is, passeth me and mine." "The talk of the old Picts—thim that build the stone houses like bee-hives," was Owen's conjecture. To this, the Rye added in comment, "I have no doubt that when the Picts were suppressed thousands of them must have become wandering outlaws like the Romanys, and that their language in time became a secret tongue of vagabonds on the roads."

Leland's interest in educational work, especially in industrial arts, was sincere and disinterested. He was the author of "Leather Work," "Elementary Metal Work," "Wood Carving" and kindred manuals which are still represented in the publisher's list. In 1881 he introduced the study of hand-work in Philadelphia's schools. Mrs. Pennell says that he considered this the greatest achievement of his life. She continues:

He found himself chief instructor in drawing, carving in wood, working in metal and leather. His own work and innumerable interests more personal might be clamoring for him. Spring might be in the air and Gypsies on the road. But, with nothing to gain, he shut himself up deliberately in the stuffy school room, going regularly from boy to boy, from girl to girl, setting copies, presiding, directing, encouraging. And I might as well say here that he never failed when he was wanted—that from the first class held in 1881, until he left Philadelphia, in 1884, he always did teach and never was paid for it, and that, from beginning to end, he missed not more than a half a dozen lessons, if that many.

There is a bibliography appended to the biography, which is in two volumes. The illustrations consist of two frontispiece portraits of Leland and facsimile reproductions of letters from famous personages.

Ballade of Heroes.

Tarkington's bucks are of courtly stuff
Major's knights, at a pinch, will do;
Howell's heroes are well enough;
Hopkinson Smith's have a healthy hue
Barrie's Scots are a kailsome brew;
Parker's Canuck very likely drinks;
Give me the man with his mind in kink (Benedict be he, or squire of dames
Who tells what he thinks he thinks he thinks
Give me the hero of Henry James!

Wister's cowboys are slightly tough;
London lands but a truculent crew;
A little too much inclined to bluff
Is Harding Davis's civilized Sioux;
Hall Caine's sufferers wear their rue
With little indifference. Each one slin
Away, and the dazzled reader blinks, When some psychic problem he tackle tames—
From mental muddles he never shrinks—
Give me the hero of Henry James!

Garland's grangers are gritty, if gruff;
Hope's smart bachelors wittily woo;
Weyman's worthies are up to snuff,
Conan Doyle's never lack a clue;
But, alas! at a glance you can look through!
No matter in what gay clothes he prinks
Who cares for a character full of chinks;
Such transparency, his make-up shames;
Cards and spades he can give the Sphinx
Give me the hero of Henry James!

ENVOY.

Ho! Sir Critic, with eye of lynx
That sleeps not ever, nor even winks,
Scan me the field with its clash of c
Then take your choice; as for me, i-jinks
Give me the hero of Henry James!

Frederick Cole Fairbanks, son of the President of the United States, eloped with Nellie Scott of Pittsburgh to Steubenville, where he was married contrary to the wish of his parents. Parental objections to the marriage of the part of Vice-President and Mrs. Fairbanks are said to have been the cause of the elopement. The young people have been forgiven and returned home was welcomed.

The Pacific liner, Mongolia, recently in danger of loss through striking a reef at Miay Island, arrived in San Francisco harbor October 9. For five days all efforts to get the big steamer off the rocks were futile, but at last the vessel floated, and after the tugging at the wires had been temporarily suspended. The cost of the mishap will amount to more than $1 million dollars.

The orange and lemon growers of Southern California will get $10,000,000 to $12,000,000 net for their product for the season of 1906.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Richard Croker is reported by a cable dispatch to be bringing an action for libel and claiming heavy damages against the proprietors of a London magazine in connection with an article dealing with Croker's relation to Tammany Hall.

Mrs. Agnes Lewis, of England, is the only woman who has received the degree of D. D., which has been conferred upon her in recognition of her labors in deciphering some ancient manuscripts of the Bible which were discovered in a cave on Mt. Sinai. She is the most famous woman Bible scholar in the world.

General Nogi of Port Arthur fame is paying the penalty of popularity at the hands of auto-graph seekers. The form which this has taken in Japan has about it a touch of sentiment, inasmuch as the relatives of soldiers who fell before Port Arthur are seeking the general's autograph in order to place on the tombstones of the dead.

Camille Du Gast, the celebrated French actor, is tall and powerfully built, but with a manly face always wreathed in smiles. When on stage he wears bifurcated garments. After thirty-six years of life she has had more adventures than fall to the lot of most male actors and is now on a tour of the interior of Mexico.

William Treloar, a City of London alderman since 1892, has been elected Lord Mayor in succession to Walter Vaughan Morgan. Sir William has been known as the "Children's Guardian" because of his many benefactions to the children of the slums. He was largely instrumental in securing the opening of the British Museum on Sundays. He was born in London in 1843.

Director Rogers of the Navy has recently designated to succeed Paymaster-General Harris. President Roosevelt, in looking over the list of eligibles, was impressed with the fact that Director Rogers had not applied for the position, and at once caused a letter to be written asking him if he would accept. The letter was the first intimation Rogers had that he was being considered.

Mrs. Bullock Workman, the intrepid explorer, has won fame by her climbing feats in the Andes, now holds the world's record for mountaineering. She has scaled a height of 23,000 feet in the Nun Kun range. The ascent was continued by cutting steps in an ice wall. Mrs. Bullock-Workman left her husband at 22,800 feet and continued the ascent accompanied by a guide and a porter.

The Kaiser has appointed Herr Dernburg, a Berlin business man, head of the German colonial office in place of Prince Ernst Hohenlohe-Langerberg. Herr Dernburg started his career as a clerk and rose to be a bank official with a salary of $62,500 a year. This he has now given up for a salary of $4,500 and an official residence. He was a director of several banks and the leader in a number of industrial enterprises. His father is a journalist connected with the Berliner Tageblatt.

Truman Newberry, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, is a popular official because he is a sailor himself, knows the needs of the men, and has, besides, been an officer in the navy. A newspaper man who likes to get to the bottom-most pit of things in general asked the genial Mr. Newberry: "When, Mr. Secretary, did the United States begin to make preparation for intervention in Cuba?" "Immediately after the United States left Cuba to herself some years ago," quietly replied Mr. Newberry.

Mrs. Bertha J. Burch is a new "lady statistician" whose specialty is cotton. She has entered into her new field after a thorough course of training in the Bureau of Statistics at Washington, where she was for several years the confidential secretary and assistant of John Hyde. Wall street at first was inclined to make light of "lady statisticians," as it sneeringly called them, but has revised its estimate. Mrs. Burch is employed by a firm of New York brokers. Her estimate of last year's cotton crop stands out clearly as the best issued.

Information comes from France, where George Gray Barnard is working on the marble groups which are to be the chief adornment of the new State capitol at Harrisburg, that the sculptor has told intimate friends that he will wreck his creations before he will let them be taken across the ocean without a fair compensation for his several years of labor. He was to have $100,000 for the work, but the payments have been delayed. An order to prepare replicas of his statues for exhibition at the opening had been nearly completed when it was countermanded, although Barnard had expended $4000 upon it.

The passing of Lieutenant-General Henry C. Corbin, United States Army, to the retired list, and the introduction of Lieutenant-General Arthur MacArthur, his successor, is another step toward the abolition of the rank of lieutenant-general. The only one in active service now holding that rank is General MacArthur, and he will have only a brief service as ranking officer of the army before following his predecessors into retirement. Then the rank of lieutenant-general, which in the few years since the Spanish-American war has been held by three officers still living, besides Corbin, Miles, Chaffee and Bates, will lapse.

Norvert Weiner, son of Professor Weiner of Harvard University, seems entitled to the distinction of being termed a successor of "The Admirable Crichton," who, toward the close of the sixteenth century, was sent to college at St. Andrews when he was ten years old, and took his master's degree at fifteen. Young Weiner at eleven years of age is a freshman at Tufts College and is supposed to be the youngest college student in America. At the age of three he could write with perfect ease, and at eight he was studying the Darwinian theory. It was the intention of the boy's father to send him to Harvard, but the college authorities refused to admit him on the score of age.

Charles E. Hughes, the Republican candidate for Governor of New York, is of Welsh extraction, and was born forty-four years ago in Glens Falls, N. Y., the son of the Rev. David C. Hughes, a Baptist minister. He entered Colgate University, but after a time was transferred to Brown at his own desire, and had won two degrees, A. B. and M. A., at the age of 19. In 1882 he entered the Columbia Law School, from which he was graduated in 1884. He married in 1888 Antoinette Carter, a daughter of Walter S. Carter, a member of a law firm. He was occupied with teaching and the holding of a prize fellowship in Columbia Law School until 1891. He is now a member of the firm of Hughes, Rounds & Schurman, with offices at 96 Broadway. He is personally a man of great charm of manner. He is fond of walking and tramping, principally with a view to health. It was by his work as attorney for the Armstrong committee of the New York Legislature, which investigated the business methods of the large life insurance companies, that Mr. Hughes came to be best known. Before that he had been counsel for the Stevens Assembly Committee, which investigated the charges made by gas companies. For his services as inquisitor in the insurance matters, Mr. Hughes received $25,000.

VANITY FAIR.

For the benefit of its patronesses, among whom are included many of the most prominent women in New York society, the day and night bank has perfected arrangements that will make its safe deposit vaults an important adjunct of the local opera season, which coincides with the reopening of social activities.

According to the New York Press, spacious retiring rooms have been installed by the side of the vault chambers where the women may array themselves in their jewels and where, after they have worn them they may replace them in safety, without the risk of secreting the valuables, in their vaults.

Nor is another feature of the new financial institution of lesser importance, which has to do with the establishment of an entirely separate banking department for women. To the rear of the present offices in Forty-fourth street, a complete equipment is being put into position which will be given over exclusively to the use of women.

It is believed that the new system with its relief from the danger of robberies will go far toward making the wearing of jewels, particularly the more costly sets, usually left in the vaults except on state occasions, commoner than it has heretofore been.

The following paragraphs from a New York "society column" show that acting as house-keeper for a hotel is not incompatible with moving in what Jeames Yellowplush called the "hupper suckles":

Mrs. Mercer Pell, of New York, who has made a success of the Grand Hotel this season at Harrogate, an English seaside resort, has declined an offer to manage a winter hotel at Cannes.

Gen. Nelson A. Miles went all the way from London, 200 miles, to escort Mrs. Pell to the Doncaster races. The gallant general gave several dinner parties there, among his guests being Lady Claude Hamilton.

Mrs. Pell's sister, Marcela Eccleson, has been staying with her and finishing her first novel, "When King Became Brigand."

Another clever American woman, Virginia Wood, the artist, a great friend of Amelia Rives, is at Harrogate on the way to Holland.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank Jones, of Cincinnati, and their daughter, Miss Frances, visited the Duchess of Manchester, who was Miss Zimmerman, of Cincinnati, at the Tanderagee Castle, and are enthusiastic over her lovely children. They are to return soon to America, and Gen. Miles is booked for the same steamer.

Lord Yarmouth was at Harrogate for a time. His countess, who was Miss Thaw, of Pittsburg, is in Switzerland.

The following criticism of the American woman found in an anonymous volume called "The Secret Life" has the charm of novelty: "My observation leads me to think that American women hold a position far inferior to the women of Europe," says the writer, adding, "Why is American social life composed almost exclusively of women? What is the cause of our superfluity of women's clubs and classes? What place has the middle-aged or elderly woman in America save as the mother of her daughters, or the dispenser of her husband's hospitalities and charities? After the period of sex-attraction has passed women have no power in America. Who ever sees here, as is so often seen in Europe, an elderly woman's drawing rooms filled with politicians, financiers, artists, who come for the refreshment and stimulation of her ideas and conversation? Mentally the American woman does not interest the American man."

There is a practical-minded millionaire who has invented a substitute for valuable pictures which it is hoped will not commend itself to others, remarks London Truth. He has had a large number of bank notes framed, and these are hung upon the wall where the pictures should be.

In the drawing-room is one frame that contains a bank note for a hundred thousand pounds, and he says, "There is the money in case I find a picture which is sufficiently valuable to pay that price for it. Meanwhile, the note tells its own tale, and saves me from explaining to my visitors that 'this picture cost so much,' as most other rich men do."

"The chief pleasure of these collectors appears to arise not from the beauty of the work, but from the cost of it; then why not have checks or bank notes for a large sum hung on the walls as I do? Besides I find that it is much more interesting to my visitors, for most of them look long and carefully at the bank notes who would but glance at the work of art!"

This eccentric man recently gave a dinner on the same principle. In the soup plates there was no soup, but sovereigns; for fish were served five-pound notes; for game, checks, and for sweets, shares in a thriving company, and there was not a guest who did not enjoy this entertainment more than any he or she had ever before been present at.

It has remained for the American Duchess de la Rochefoucauld to revive the stately, gorgeous hunting parties of long ago in the forests that surround her husband's chateau at Montmirail.

The duchess (who was Miss Mattie Mitchell, accompanied by her mother, the widow of the late United States Senator Mitchell, of Oregon) has joined the Duke de la Rochefoucauld at the ancient chateau. There the duchess, an enthusiastic sportswoman, will pass the autumn in hunting and shooting.

But, enthusiastic as she is, the duchess studies her outdoor diversions from an aesthetic and artistic standpoint. With a scholar's fervor, she scans ancient volumes describing the majestic hunts of centuries ago and patterns her own expeditions after those kingly excursions of long ago.

Wearing a riding habit like that of some famous huntress queen, the duchess canters through the ducal forest with the traditional falcon perched on her wrist and held captive by a long gold chain. Her equestrian, wearing elaborate liveries and mounted on luxuriously caparisoned horses, follow her at the exact distance prescribed by the ancient rules of the chase.

Already it is whispered that this American duchess, whose husband is of the most ancient French nobility, will enthusiastically assist in restoring the monarchical hunting pageants which the Duchess d'Uzes proposes to revive next year.

Mrs. Clara Ruge is an art critic who has made a special study of costumes. She talked at the Hotel Astor, in New York, recently before the Art Workers' Club on the "Origin, History and Development of Costume." William M. Chase, the artist, lent her some of his gorgeous costumes that she might illustrate her talk by dressing live girls up in them and giving living pictures. Mr. Chase also posed the young women, who were pretty professional models.

Mrs. Ruge devoted several minutes of her talk to trousers, and the women, who formed a large majority of the audience, listened with interest. They had a right to, comments the New York Sun, in its report of the entertainment. If it hadn't been for women's aprons, first worn in Egypt, there wouldn't have been any trousers. These are but aprons of a larger growth. "Men have always been more sensible about their dress than women," said Mrs. Ruge. "At times they have become foolish and worn things to show off their handsome figures, or let vanity run away with them, but in the main they have been saner than women, so far as clothes go."

"Trousers, the distinctive feature of men's dress, were worn in Egypt for the first time. Both women and men had been wearing aprons. Aprons were the very first attempt to ornament and decorate the person. Before they appeared, men and women wore skins and furs—plain, severe and simple. The aprons were a fanciful frill. The women of Egypt got to wearing them long, and imperious fashion required the men to do the same. It was difficult for the men to move freely, though, wearing these long aprons. A genius appeared. He cut holes in the apron, stuck his legs through, and behold, he had the rudimentary trousers. Little by little something was added behind or in front until today we have the perfect pattern."

Until the present time, Mrs. Ruge said, the caprice and whim of women threw common sense to the winds, and the result was the most outlandish dress conceivable.

"We have progressed," said Mrs. Ruge. "We have found that it is foolish to submit to the slavery of fashion. Today whatever is beautiful is fashionable. Formerly it was whatever is fashionable is beautiful. I consider, though, that the periods in which the most beautiful costumes were worn by men and women were in the time of the Greeks and during the Renaissance."

Hats have always indicated ideas, said the costume expert. The felt hat, broad-brimmed, free and easy, has always stood for liberal ideas, freedom, hatred of tyranny, and manliness.

"The first felt hats were worn by Wallenstein's soldiers during the thirty years' war," she said. "The Hollanders wore them to show they had thrown off the rule of Spain. The Puritans wore them, and so did the Quakers, making a fashion of soft hats, which indicated their formality and sternness. Today the rough rider hats and the cowboys' sweeping hats stand for the same thing—love of liberty."

History tells us that Confucius liked sharks' fins and sea-slugs and birds' nests. Well and good, comments Harriet Quimby in Leslie's Weekly. If a man with an intellect like that of the great Chinese philosopher found these, to us, unusual foods palatable, they must be worth trying. Then there are the preserved grape leaves, the pickled squash, and the dried okra of the Syrians. These people of the Orient were civilized long before America was even thought of being discovered, so there is no reason, argues the epicure, why their knowledge and choice of foods should not be well worth investigating.

Other countries have their special delicacies which, if they are sought out, appeal to the universal taste and form an agreeable and inexpensive addition to the daily menu of the average mortal who must eat. Bear steak, from the West, kangaroo tails pickled, which come from Australia, preserved gold-fish from the Nile, canned abalone from California, and dried goose from Sweden are only a few of the queer foods kept for sale in the New York markets and sold in quantities every day.

Until recently people who relished snails were regarded with sentiments which savored of disgust, but that notion has changed, and at the present time that delicacy can be procured in almost any of the first-class hotels and cafes in New York. In order to meet the growing demand, one of the largest caterers in the city imports 25,000 snails every week from Brittany, where the best snails are grown.

Recent news dispatches in Eastern papers report a change in Parisian regard of transatlantic visitors in one view at least. Americans are upsetting the current idea that they do not attend church when visiting the gay capital. "Sunday last," said John Hanen, sexton of Holy Trinity, "I calculated that not less than 1,000 Americans in Paris attended divine services in the American churches. There were 500 in this church in the Rue Berri and St. Luke's in the Latin quarter."

"I have studied the Americans for twenty-seven years and I know they are a most devout, reverential people in spite of what people may say. They are so quiet during services that one can hear a fly buzz."

The craze for Scottish dances to the tune of the bagpipes has never before been so much a feature of the Scottish season as this year, notes a correspondent of the Chicago Chronicle. At Glenquoich, the splendid highland residence leased by Henry Phipps, reels and flings afforded the chief amusement for all his guests every night after dinner. The old pipers lined up in the great hall and the men in kilts led out the daughters of the host and the other American girls staying there.

The eldest daughter, Mrs. Frederick Guest, is by far the best dancer of the eightsome reel, while Mrs. Jay Phipps has mastered the intricacies of the Strathspey dance better than any or her rivals for Scottish dance honors.

But the most lissome figure in the great ballroom was Miss Gladys Grace, the youngest and only unmarried daughter of M. P. Grace of Battle Abbey. Miss Grace has been the constant partner of Lord Lovat, who is conceded to be one of the best sword dancers in all Scotland. As head of the Frasers he wears the tartan of his clan. Lady Craven dances the reels gracefully and her little son, Lord Uffington, proved to be one of the most expert two-sword dancers in Invernesshire.

Young Mrs. Bradley Martin has had 18 lessons in the eightosomes and Strathspeys, but she has not been able to attain the proficiency of either Miss Grace or Mrs. Jay Phipps. Duchess of Roxburghe has taken a series of lessons from an old piper at Dunbar, but has yet mustered up courage to attempt any of the reels or flings at the castle.

Dr. Edith S. Brownell, a physician who lectures to the California University girls on hygiene, is a graduate of the class of '99, spoke in Hearst Hall recently to the fresh women, and there denounced peek-a-boo as an article of clothing which no university or other girl, who desired to be thought womanly, should wear. She said:

"There is no one in the world who loves to see the graceful curve of a full bust so much as I do, but that is as much as should be shown. No before have such beautiful waists been worn this year, with their low neck and short sleeves and their laces and embroidery, and never before did they enhance so well the charm of a figure. But no one has any right, who considers herself womanly, to expose the shoulders, the chest to the gaze of the public. I know it is a great temptation for girls to wear decoy evening gowns, but it causes comment which is unfavorable, and girls who wish to be admired by the other sex should not do it."

"The worst kind of waist that has appeared so far is the so-called peek-a-boo waist, of thin, gauzy material that it has lost the purpose of a waist. Of course, no girl in college would wear such a thing. They cause undesirable marks and talk among the men that is anything but desirable. If a proper sort of underwear were worn with them there would be no objection, but they are often as flimsy and gauzy as the peek-a-boo waist itself."

The appeal of the Spanish Countess of Bu Vista in her damage suit against Major-General John R. Brooke, which was recently decided against her by the Federal District Court in New York, has been docketed in the Supreme Court of the United States. The New York court held that while the Countess had cause of action against the Government of the United States or that of Cuba, she had none against General Brooke, and it is asserted in the appeal that this ruling is erroneous. The result of the suit is found in the abolition by Gen. Brooke while he was Governor-General of Cuba in 1899 of the Countess's right to slaughter the cattle killed in Havana. This right had been exercised by her family since 1727 and she asked damages in the sum of $250,000.

Dramatic Notes.

David Belasco announces that the attraction to succeed Blanche Bates in the "Girl of the Golden West" at the Belasco Theatre in New York will be "The Rose of the Rancho." This another play by a California playwright, Richard Walton Tully, and has been played on the Pacific Coast under the name "Juanita."

Viola Allen appeared for the first time as Iogenie in "Cymbeline" at the New National theatre in Washington a few days ago. Her success, shared by her support, is said to be distinctly notable.

Much had been said about Lillian Russell's change from comic opera and burlesque to the intimate drama before the event occurred last week in New York, and speculation on its result is now realized. The play chosen for Miss Russell was "Barbara's Millions," an adaptation by Paul M. Potter from a French piece by Francis de Croisset, and it is said to have interested. Miss Russell failed to make a good impression, her efforts seeming to be centered in an attempt to display handsome costumes. Ferdinand Gottschalk was the most prominent member of the supporting company.

An endowed theatre, the only one in the United States, was opened last week in Chicago, and a company made up of players of no great reputation entertained a brilliant audience including many prominent people of society. The play was composed of three pieces. Ernest Hervilly's one-act Japanese piece, "Sainara," came first. Gilbert's comedy, "Engaged," not tried before professionally in Chicago for nearly thirty years, was the principal offering, and a new playlet, "Marse Covington," by George Ade, rounded out the evening. French, English, and American stage art was thus presented. More than $50,000 has been pledged to the support of the theatre, and only the best plays will be given.

Barred out of Baltimore by the theatrical trust, E. H. Sothern and Miss Julia Marlowe play in a church. A number of local gymmen have been interested, and unless something unforeseen occurs they will appear in one of two performances of Hermann Sudermann's "St. John," a mystical religious tragedy. Sudermann wrote "St. John" as a mystery play and intended that it should be performed in a church or monastery, as the mystery plays of the Middle Ages were performed. It differs entirely from the dramas ordinarily played in theatres and, in its performance, an effort will be made to keep in mind the sacredness of the place which it is given.

Hall Caine's "The Bondsman" is reported as a huge success at Drury Lane Theatre, London, and it is said to be very much like his preceding melodramas.

Some of the cleanest, wittiest dialogue heard on the New York stage this season was spoken in the new comedy, "Nurse Marjorie," presented by the famous Robson's company at the Liberty Theatre, says the New York Globe. Situations novel and as neatly conceived as the most led playgoer could wish were interspersed throughout the comedy. And character acting of a sort to make Broadway rub its eyes and applaud delightedly was done at every stage of the four acts by a group of players from whom excellent playing was to be expected.

H. B. Irving, son of England's great actor-manager, has made a success in New York in Stephen Phillips' "Paolo and Francesca." Irving is pronounced a worthy successor of his father, inheriting and making effective many of his mannerisms. He has a well-balanced company, and the scenic appointments of the play are praised. All the stage pictures are said to be worthy of the best period of the London theatre.

George Clarke, one of the most prominent actors of the old school and for years with the Lyric Company, died at Norwalk, Conn., October 4. Clarke began his professional career in 1855 as juvenile man in Portsmouth, Va., played in many of the old stock companies, and was leading man for Fanny Davenport and Clara Morris at times. He toured the country in "When We Were Twenty-One" after going on in New York, and his last appearance was as the Senator from Oregon in Augustus Thomas's "Embassy Ball."

Of William Vaughan Moody's play, "The Great Divide," in which Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin have eclipsed all their former successes, the New York Mail says: "Not since Arthur Campbell's 'My Partner' has a Western play of such breadth of plan and trenchant text been brought to Broadway. Without delay plunging his characters into a tragic problem, commingling the most divergent emotions, Mr. Moody keys their temperaments to a concert pitch and plays havoc with them with marked dramatic skill." The same critic declares that Mr. Miller has never been seen to better advantage, and that Miss Anglin gives "a wonderfully adroit, flexible, and fervid exhibition of acting—running through every phase from grave to gay."

The Marchesa del Grillo, better known as Adelaide Ristori, the celebrated Italian actress, died in Rome, October 9, of pneumonia. Ristori was born in 1822 and at an early age took a prominent position on the stage. She played in Paris in 1855 in "Francesca da Rimini" before Emperor Napoleon III, then went to England, and afterward made a tour of all the principal countries. She made several tours to this country, achieving great success. As a tragic actress no one in her generation equalled her. Her Medea, Lady Macbeth, and Queen Elizabeth, were roles in which her power was seen at its best, and were said to be revelations of the resources of the tragic actress. All Italy recently observed the eightieth anniversary of her birthday. Gala performances were given in many cities in her honor, and kings, princes, and other notables sent her gifts and messages of regard and affection. Ristori had lived in retirement for fifteen years, though she occasionally took part in representations for charitable purposes. She had no sympathy with present theatrical tendencies, and regarded the plays now given to the public as devoid of beauty, vital significance, and artistic merit.

Musical Notes.

Professor Herman Genss, who has been successful in San Francisco during the last eight years, both as a concert pianist and as a teacher, has received an offer from Eugen Stern, one of the impresarios of Germany, for a concert tour through Germany, France, and Italy. Mr. Genss is now on his way to Berlin.

The Royal Welsh male choir of twenty-one voices arrived in New York a few days ago for an extended tour of the United States and Canada.

Emily Soldene, once a noted figure in comic opera in America, is still a favorite in Australia and New Zealand. Notices of a benefit matinee recently given for her appear in Australasian papers.

The engagement of Caruso at the Ostend Kursaal proved an immense success, the huge building being packed to its utmost capacity. Although the great tenor received 10,000 francs a performance, the Casino, as usual, was the chief gainer, the popular singer being credited with having lost the whole of his fees at the tables, reports Lloyd's Weekly, of London.

Mme. Sembrich arrived in New York last week in advance of the season to arrange for the distribution of a fund of $10,000 which she raised at a matinee recital last May at Carnegie Hall. This money will be expended to buy new instruments for the players who lost their own in the disaster in San Francisco last spring.

Jean de Reszke once said that music did not exist for him except so far as it is emotional. What made him great was, above all things, his intense emotionalism. The same trait characterized that king among German tenors, Albert Niemann.

Fritzi Scheff was a famous prima donna at an age when the average girl is still at school. She was less than 18 years of age when she sang the exacting role of Juliet, and for several years thereafter she was looked upon as a prodigy at the Imperial opera house in Berlin, the National opera house, Paris, Covent Garden in London, and when she was brought to the Metropolitan opera house in New York and opera-goers, accustomed as they were to seeing only middle-aged, mature, stolid, heavy women singing the leading roles, saw this young and pretty girl, they could scarcely believe that it could be she who had attained such celebrity in the great capitals. Since her appearance in comic opera she has been no less a success, as was foreseen by the critics.

Vienna is to hear four new operas this season—Humperdinck's "Heirath wider Willen," Erlanger's "Der Polnische Jude," Schilling's "Moloch," and Zemlinski's "Der Trauerzug."

The most remarkable concert ever heard on the sea was enjoyed by the passengers on the Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, which landed in New York a few days ago from Bremen, Southampton and Cherbourg. Dr. Karl Muck, first conductor of the German Imperial Opera; Leoncavallo, composer; Arturo Vigna, conductor;

Yvette Guilbert, Elisabeth Parkina, R. Hageman, and Mme. Rosina Hagemann-Van Dyk, were the participants. Although only between $500 and $600 was raised for charity, such a concert ashore would have cost more than $2,000.

Yvette Guilbert and Albert Chevalier appeared at Carnegie Hall in New York last week in a song recital.

The Orpheum.

The six Glinsereitis, marvelous acrobats, will head the bill at the Orpheum this Sunday afternoon. A feature of their performance is an original bounding table novelty, attempted by no other athletes. The Misses Hanson and Nelson will make their first appearance in San Francisco. They are devotees of the terpsichorean art and have excellent voices. Burton and Brookes, comedians who originated "More Work for the Undertaker" and other tuneful ditties, return after a successful trip to England. They will present their unique conceit entitled "The Limit." Junie McCree and his company have captured the city with "The Man from Denver," and will appear for the last times. The Waterbury brothers and Ernest Tenney will introduce new selections in their musical skit, and Bresina, the European artiste, promises, for her third and farewell week, a complete change of French chansons. Fred Watson and the Morrissey sisters, Raffayette's acrobatic dogs and Orpheum Motion Pictures will complete a varied programme. Every form of amusement conceivable is to be found on the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located.

LITERARY NOTES.

A Tale of Boarding School Rivalry.

There is a manly ring to Arthur Stanwood Pier's new story of schoolboy life in America, "Harding of St. Timothy's." "St. Timothy's" is a typical boarding school of pretence, with its cliques and jealousies. Rupert Ormsby, the hero of the tale, is a courageous youngster who steadfastly refuses to join the school's exclusive secret society. Rupert is a boy of strong personality, a leader in athletics and at the head of his class. He organizes the students who are not members of the select "Crown" coterie into a burlesque Greek letter fraternity, with the intention of breaking down the spirit of snobbishness, which is interfering with team work in class room and athletic field. There is a long struggle for the control of the school, and sportsmanlike means are used to win control. Harding, captain of the "exclusives," is also an admirable young fellow, and in the end acknowledges that Rupert's motives were unselfish and correct, and the "Crown" is disorganized. The author presents President Roosevelt as the central figure in the closing scene, pronouncing the final judgment, on field-day, on the two equally plucky American schoolboys. Mr. Pier drives home some wholesome lessons in "Harding of St. Timothy's," that will not be lost on the boy in his teens who is about to enter college or private school. There is no "cant" in the book, and the morals are not labelled. The illustrations are unusually striking.

Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; $1.50.

A New Edition of Meredith.

Four more volumes of the new pocket edition of the works of George Meredith have been published. They are: "Evan Harrington," "One of Our Conquerors," "The Shaving of Shagpat," and "The Tragic Comedians."

There is every sign of a revival of interest in Meredith's work. This is as it should be. The humble "average reader" has too long been restrained from the enjoyment of this great artist's books by the constant statement that Meredith is only for that nondescript coterie, "a select few." He may be, indeed, the "novelists' novelist"; Mrs. Humphry Ward called him "the greatest of us all"; and Stevenson said of "The Egoist": "From all the novels I have read (and I have read thousands) it stands in a place by itself." But there is little in any of his novels that we of lesser understanding, if of equal devotion to the story-writer's art, may not read with entertainment and instruction. The Philistine should not deny himself Meredith's beauty of phraseology, sympathetic insight into man and nature, and "serviceable satire," because he will meet in "Diana of the Cross-Ways," "The Ordeal of Richard Feverel," or "The Egoist," an occasional phrase that even one of the elect would be hard put to it to explain and define.

Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $1.00 each.

The Revolt of the Harems.

There is discontent in Constantinople's harems; the twentieth century Turkish maiden is restless, rebellious; she would drop her veil and converse with whom she chooses; she would select her own husband as do the girls of the West, of whom she reads in the latest novels from Paris and London and New York. And Pierre Loti is her champion in "Disenchanted," quite the most serious, sincere, and pathetic romance of the brilliant French author. The three dainty revolutionists of the story are, like most of the higher class young women of Turkey, thoroughly cultured, readers of Kant, Baudelaire, and Shakespeare, in the original, their minds inflamed by the contrast of Western freedom, and their own humiliating state. Andre Lheroy, a French novelist, receives a letter from the girls, appealing to him to write a romance revealing their miseries. Clandestine meetings are arranged, and the author is told of their longings and their plaints. Picture in your strongest colors the emptiness of harem life, they beseech him. Tell of our wretched marriages; say that while our husbands may at any time bring to our homes a new favorite, we may not even converse with a gentleman, unless he is one of our closest relatives; we wish to be considered as responsible beings. It was Lheroy's first meeting with Turkish women of rank, and he was surprised at their breadth of view and their earnestness. For their part, "he treated them as his equals, as intellects, as souls, and the effect on them was a sort of mental intoxication such as they had never experienced before." Love is awakened in the heart of D'enan, the elder of the girls, for the sympathetic novelist, but she does not speak of her affection, until his return to France, when, before swallowing a suicidal draught, she reveals her soul in a pathetic letter.

The book abounds in beautiful word-pictures; the description of the courtship and wedding of a Turkish noblewoman, in the manner prescribed by the prophet, is extremely picturesque. Clara Bell has done the work of translation very well. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York; $1.50.

New Publications

George P. Upton has translated a series of biographical romances from the German for young readers. These "life-stories" retain the story form throughout, and each chapter contains a mild element of historical information, as well as first-class entertainment. Included in the series are also the stories of great legendary personages. The first volumes are "William of Orange," "Barbarossa," "The Nibelungs," and "Gudrun." Published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago; 60 cents net each.

"Blackie: His Friends and His Enemies," by Madge A. Bigham, is a book of old stories in new dresses. Miss Bigham has taken some of the fables of La Fontaine, and has rewritten them for children of eight or nine years. Published by Little, Brown & Co., Boston; $1.50.

Harry Smith has illustrated a new edition of "Mother Goose, Her Book." Published by Duffield & Co., New York; 75 cents.

A new edition of Mrs. Georgiana Burne-Jones's "Memorials of Edward Burne-Jones," her distinguished artist-husband, has appeared in one volume. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York; $4.00.

Mrs. Steele Mackay has dramatized Jane Austen's novel, "Pride and Prejudice." Mrs. Mackay has skilfully reproduced the stilted phrase, the genteel mannerisms, the quaint comedy of the novel, but it is doubtful if haughty Mr. Darcy, old-fashioned Elizabeth, wicked Mr. Wickham, or meddlesome Mrs. Bennet, will appeal to twentieth century audiences. Published by Duffield & Co., New York; $1.25.

Florence Kimball Russel, the wife of Mayor Edgar Russel, and daughter and sister of army officers, has written a charming story of army life on the plains, "Born to the Blue." Although the hero is a boy and most of the characters are children, lovers of military stories will read the tale with delight. Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston; $1.25.

The tale of an over-energetic grocery clerk who was not satisfied with the slow-going methods of his employers, is funnily told in "Breezy," by J. George Frederick. Published by McClure, Phillips & Co., New York.

A quaint allegory, "Two-Legs," is a translation from the Danish of Carl Ewald, by Alexander Teixeira De Mattos. Two-Legs and his wife come naked and unarmed to the forest, gradually outwit and subdue the animals for whose skin or flesh or strength they have use, and as a crowning insult and show of power, cage the mightiest beasts for their amusement hour. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $1.00.

"Stories from Scottish History," based upon Scott's "Tales of a Grandfather"; "Tales from Herodotus," short narratives of the Greek struggle for liberty; and "Stories from Dickens," tales of the novelist's most famous boys and girls, are the latest volumes in the Children's Favorite Classics series. Published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York; 60 cents each.

"Recollections of a Gold Cure Graduate," by Newton Kirk, is a hodge-podge of bibulous prose and verse. Its humor is mostly concerned with the antics of vari-colored animals of fantastic shapes. Published by the Colonial Press, Boston.

"Books, Culture and Character," by J. N. Larned, is made up of seven lectures on the subjects. Practical hints to systematic reading of the best literature are given. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; $1.00.

Mrs. Jane Newkirk, who many years ago was a writer of popular stories, died at Laporte, Ind., a few days ago at the advanced age of ninety-three, and it is recorded that after she had attained her eighty-third year she published two books. One, entitled "The Captive," gave an account of the enslavement of her father in Algiers previous to the French occupation of that country. The other book, "Tripoli and Tunis," gave the story of American negotiations with Barbary for the abolition of piracy. Mrs. Newkirk's father, James Leander Cathcart, was United States consul in Africa for many years.

Commercial candor still exists in the literary world, remarks the London Tribune. "At any rate, a popular monthly has the following announcement stamped on its cover: 'This magazine opens flat.' The gifted author who supplies the opening contribution is consulting his solicitor."

Woman in Recent Literature.

As an illustration of the present interest in feminine personalities and reminiscences the following list is taken from a single column of announcements by London publishers:

"Court Beauties of Old Whitehall" deals with the lovely women of the Restoration. "A Revolutionary Princess" tells of the life of Christina Belgiojoso-Trivulzio, an unblushingly unconventional Italian "grande dame." "From the Old Regime to the Restoration" will tell the story of four distinguished French women, the Marquise de Montague, Madame le Brun, Madame Tallien, and the Comtesse de Genlis.

The beauties of the court of Napoleon III will be described in the pages of "Women of the Second Empire," by Frederic Loliee, translated by Alice Ivimy. Real love-letters written and sent surreptitiously by Anne of Austria to her lover, Cardinal Mazarin, will be included in "Queen and Cardinal." "A Queen of Indiscretions" promises to revise the opinion held by many concerning Caroline of Brunswick. It is the history of "the persecution of Caroline by King George IV." "Beauties of the Seventeenth Century," by Allan Fea, "St. Catherine of Sienna and Her Times," "Queen Louisa of Prussia," "Nelson's Lady Hamilton" and "Famous Beauties of Two Reigns"—written by Mary Craven, with a chapter on "fashion in femininity," by Major Martin Hume, are others. The last book is an account of some fair women of Stuart and Georgian times, and its chief claim to consideration is the excellence of its reproductions of paintings by Romney, Gainsborough, Lely, Reynolds, and other famous portrait painters.

The mysterious disappearance of the noted author and hermit naturalist, Dr. Felix L. Oswald, from the time his hut was burned near Springfield, Mass., last December, was cleared up recently, when papers found on the body of a man killed in the central station in Syracuse N. Y., revealed the identity of the missing naturalist. From the papers it appears that since Dr. Oswald's valuable library and even more valuable manuscripts were burned in his hermit hut, he had been traveling about the country extensively. Dr. Oswald was 61 years old.

LITERARY NOTES.

A Tale of the Sioux Country.

Ralph Parrish has written a fine Western story in "Bob Hampton of Placer." Shortly after the Civil War Captain Robert Hampton is by circumstantial evidence sentenced to ten years' imprisonment for the murder of Major Brant, his commanding officer. After serving his sentence, he wanders through the mining camps of Wyoming and Montana, as Bob Hampton, gambler. Hampton has a three-fold purpose in life: to hunt down Brant's real murderer, to have his own name re-entered on the Army List, and, that accomplished, to find his child. No danger is too great to interrupt Hampton's ceaseless quest, and his adventures in the Indian country are many and thrilling. The story opens at the beginning of the Sioux uprising, and culminates in the Custer Massacre. The author closes the tale, with splendid dramatic effect, by a graphic description of the battle of Little Big Horn, with Hampton, his mission ended, fighting by Custer's side, as a volunteer cooper.

There is an earnest love story woven into the narrative, and plenty of humorous relief for the sterner happenings.

Published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago; 1.50.

A Fascinating Life of De Soto.

Frederick A. Ober's "De Soto and the Invasion of Florida" realizes Stevenson's ideal of romance: a narrative that fills our mind "with the busiest, kaleidoscopic dance of images"; a story that "repeats itself in a thousand colored pictures to the eye." Mr. Ober is a painstaking and accurate biographer, who is careful not to sacrifice historical verity for rhetorical effect, but the unembellished chronicle of De Soto's life-story, from his first passage-at-arms at Darien to his burial beneath the waters of the Mississippi, has all the elements of exciting romance. Here is high-hearted adventure and appalling cruelty, here is the quest for treasure-trove and offers of pearls, here is hand-to-hand conflict with brave foes, here is high aim and lofty purpose, basest perfidy and vilest treachery. In contrast to his brutal and merciless fellow conquistadores—Cortes, Pizarro, Pedrarias—De Soto was a humane and chivalrous conqueror. His terrible four years' journey through Florida, 1492-1543, will ever rank with the famous marches of history.

Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; 1.00 net.

A Colonial Romance.

Alice Prescott Smith's "Montlivet," a tale of five days when the French and English methods of colonization were on trial in America, is a romance of distinction. The advent of a young Englishman into a French garrison; the demands of the Huron tribe that he be given up to torture; his flight with Monsieur Montlivet, an ambitious adventurer; the confession of the captive that "he" is a woman of noble family; his pursuit by the Indians and Lord Starling, his cousin; the adventures of the English lady and Frenchman, on what now becomes a perilous elopement, are elements that go to the making of an exciting love-story.

Mrs. Smith has given us a heroine as attractive as she is unusual, and her portrayal of the French gentleman of fortune is also finely drawn. The author employs a strikingly vivid and fresh style in the narrative. The publishers serve a word of praise for the book's handsome binding and printing.

Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; 1.50.

A Critic on Singing.

Every large city has its quota of super-natural opera singers who teach, at fancy prices, the methods of singing which destroyed their own voices. In "The Art of the Singer," W. J. Henderson, musical critic of the New York Sun, is a protest against these and other ignorant tutors who have given us a generation of tuneless shouters. Back to nature as close as we can go should ever be the singer's ideal, says Mr. Henderson; her methods are all simple, and others are all complex. The book is a plea for thoroughness, for perseverance, and for devotion. None of the four and forty jarring tools of music will find much to quarrel with Mr. Henderson's volume. His dominant note common sense. He gives the result of twenty years of study of authoritative works on the subject, as well as valuable information received from Sembrich, Nordica and Jean de Reszke. The book is simply and clearly written.

Published by Charles Scribner's Sons; $1.25.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

The new novel by Eleanor Gates, the author of "I am well known in California as Mrs. Richard Talton Tully," is said to be a notable success already. It is entitled "The Plow Woman," and appeared first as a serial in a magazine.

Joseph Conrad's latest book is called "The Mirror of the Sea," and it contains, it is said, besides stories, much autobiographical material relating to the score of years which the author spent going about the world in ships as seaman, mate, and master.

A new volume of Richard Watson Gilder's verse, entitled "A Book of Music," is to be issued this fall. It will contain those of Mr. Gilder's poems, published and unpublished, which relate to music either directly or symbolically.

George Moore's autobiography, "Memoirs of My Dead Life," did not cause much stir in England, but its American publishers found it—well, unconventional, and cabled to inquire if Mr. Moore would object to an abridgment. Mr. Moore cheerfully gave his consent in a humorous note, but craved permission to set forth in an introduction his own ideas of such expurgations. When the introduction arrives "Memoirs of My Dead Life" will be published.

An Eastern review of Wallace Irwin's "Chinatown Ballads" concludes with this plaint: "One wishes that a man of Mr. Irwin's undoubted ability would not try to lead the Six Most Writing Poets."

Parts 5 and 6 of Prof. Angelo de Gubernatis's "Dictionnaire International du Monde Latin," have followed each other so quickly that the work is completed in less than two years since it was begun. It contains over 1,500 double-column quarto pages, carrying some 10,000 biographical sketches.

It is said that Gabriele d'Annunzio has wearied of literature and now aspires to become a great inventor. His discoveries up to date are a new system for bicycles which does away with the rubber tire and a sure cure for baldness. The discoverer is still very bald.

"Fishes," by President David Starr Jordan of Leland Stanford University, and "Insects," by Prof. Vernon L. Kellogg, also of Stanford, are to be volumes in a new "American Natural History" series.

It is now publicly announced that the Countess von Arnheim is the author of "Elizabeth and Her German Garden." The latest story by the countess, "Fraulein Schmidt and Mr. Anstruther," is appearing as a serial in a fashion magazine.

A strange comedy and tragedy was woven into the lives of Ibsen and Bjornson. As young men they were great friends; then politics flung them apart; they quarreled, and never met for years and years. Strange fate brought the children of these two great writers together, and Bjornson's daughter married Ibsen's only child. The fathers met after a quarter of a century of separation at the wedding of their children. They became grandfathers in common.

A Chicago novelist, Stanley Waterloo, wrote a prehistoric novel entitled "Ab, a Tale of the Time of the Cave-men," that was given high rank. The heads of the Smithsonian Institution, at Washington, sealed it with their official sanction, and its scientific value is so great that it has been adopted as a text-book in schools. This is recalled by the advance notices of Jack London's story, "Before Adam."

From London comes the announcement that Mr. and Mrs. Israel Zangwill are being congratulated on the advent of a son. Mrs. Zangwill, who was Miss Edith Ayrton, daughter of Prof. W. E. Ayrton, a well-known electrical engineer and inventor in England, is an author herself to the extent of several short story magazine contributions.

Kipling is not the only author who finds pleasure and profit in writing for youthful readers. The Macmillan company has published two stories for children, "Merrylips," by Beulah Marie Dix, author of "The Fair Maid of Graystones," "The Making of Christopher Ferringham," etc., and "The Railway Children," by E. Nesbit, author of the "Literary Scense."

Darwin had no respect for books, and would cut a big volume in two for convenience in handling, or he would tear out the leaves he required for reference.

Irving Bacheller, author of "Eben Holden," and Hamlin Garland, author of "The Captain of the Gray Horse Troop," are planning to make a joint lecture tour this coming winter.

There seems to be perennial interest in "The Rubaiyat of Omar." A. C. McClurg & Co. have in press for early publication an entirely new version, prepared by George Roe, a distinguished Omani scholar. Mr. Roe has just received a letter from Nathan Haskell Dole saying that M. Fernand Henry, the well-known French author, has written him from Le Muy, France, concerning the forthcoming translation. The little book is to be issued in beautiful style, uniform with Shirazi's "Life of Omar," published last fall, and will be brought out simultaneously in England and America.

The original of Dickens's Pecksniff is said by a London press correspondent to have been identified in the late Samuel Carter Hall, author of "A Book of Memories of Great Men and Women of the Age, from Personal Acquaintance." Mr. Hall wrote many other books, and was well known to readers forty years ago. A letter written by Dickens in 1853 has been discovered, in which Hall is pronounced a terrific humbug, and Charles C. Osborne, in a long article in the Independent Review, cites many personal resemblances noted in Hall which tally with descriptions of Pecksniff in "Martin Chuzzlewit."

It is reported that the Duke of Argyll, while looking over some old papers at Inverary Castle, the other day, discovered some verses by Lady Byron. They were written by way of retort to the poet's well-known "Fare thee well, and if forever." Of this the lady speaks with scorn as "mimic woe." Naturally, the duke will endeavor to verify the authenticity and trace the history of this poem, before publishing it.

A correspondent of the New York Sun reports this trial of the magazines with "a well-known story of Kipling's." "A non-literary friend and myself decided upon a test. One of Kipling's most popular short stories was selected, and the scene was easily transferred to America. An entire change of names of characters was also accomplished. When type-written it was sent to the following publishers: Collier's Weekly, Harper's Monthly, Scribner's, Ainslee's, Century, Munsey's, Lippincott's, Metropolitan, Cosmopolitan, Outing Magazine, McClure's, Frank Leslie's, Everybody's, Saturday Evening Post, Smart Set, Broadway Magazine. In the case of each of the above-mentioned publishers the story was returned to us accompanied by a note in which the editorial soul breathed forth its appreciation and regret, but nothing more. Finally, the manuscript was forwarded to Kipling's original publishers of the story. After an interval of about seven weeks we received a letter containing a check and acceptance. The check was returned by us, with the explanation that the story was to be amplified into a novel, and in due time we received our manuscript back." The comment elicited by this publication appearing in The Sun included that of one writer who thinks the sixteen editors recognized the tale as a clumsy imitation of the Kipling story and sent the printed slips of regret to avoid opening a debate with the contributor on the subject of plagiarism. He says: "My experience has been that editors are far too busy to engage in correspondence unless it be really necessary—a rule which obtains in all properly conducted business, whether literary or other."

THIS is Ridolfo of the Baglioni, like the angel of darkness in sinister beauty and lack of soul. Mr. Egerton R. Williams, Jr., has written a wonderful romance of the redemption through love of this ruthless war-lord. The scenes are laid in Fifteenth Century Italy, and this novel will have few equals in power, interest, and literary distinction.

James, Mrs. J. B. Adams, Mrs. C. R. Hall, and Mr. C. E. Weil.

Commenting on a court decision that the Marquis Townshend was not of sound enough mind to take care of his own affairs, Swift MacNeill, writing from Dublin, drew the attention of the London Times to the extraordinary fact that the noble marquis might nevertheless go on attending the House of Lords, capable of taking care of the affairs of the empire, though not of his own. Mental imbecility is a disqualification for a seat in the House of Commons; but there would appear to be no legal bar to a writ of summons to an imbecile peer to attend the House of Lords.

It is expected that the introduction of dredges will greatly increase the output of gold in the Klondike. In 1905 this was reduced to about $7,500,000, as against $10,350,000 in 1904, $18,000,000 in 1901, and $22,275,000 in 1900.

Lieutenant Samuel W. Bryant, U. S. N., and Mrs. Bryant (formerly Miss Caroline Merry), are rejoicing in the advent of a little son on Monday of last week.

An heir of Mrs. David D. Colton, widow of General Colton (who was a partner with Collis P. Huntington, Leland Stanford, and others in building the first transcontinental railway), has begun an action in Washington to test the validity of the will in which Mrs. Colton disposed of an estate of more than $1,000,000. Mrs. Colton lived in Washington, D. C., up to the time of her death in February, 1905. She had two daughters, one of whom, Mrs. Caroline Dalgreen, is still living. The other daughter was Mrs. Helen Thornton, now dead, whose daughter married Siegfried Sacher, by whom she had a daughter who is now six years old. The child, the great-granddaughter of Mrs. Colton, was left $1,000 by Mrs. Colton, who left the balance of her estate to Mrs. Dalgreen and her two children by a former marriage. Sacher, on behalf of his young daughter, has instituted the proceedings now being taken.

The executive committee of the Board of Fire Underwriters of the Pacific has determined to oppose the erection of frame dwellings within the fire limits, if permits for such structures should be granted by the city authorities. A few weeks ago Mayor Schmitz recommended in a communication to the Board of Supervisors that owners of lots in the fire limits who wished to construct frame residences for themselves should be given the privilege of doing so. As the laws of the city prohibit the erection of wooden structures within the fire limits, it was pointed out at the time that the city officials had no legal authority to grant such permits, and that such buildings, if put up, would have to be torn down whenever the process of court was invoked. The Underwriters will take action on any violation of the building laws.

The Emporium Company has about concluded negotiations for the square block bounded by Van Ness avenue, Hayes, Franklin and Grove streets, the site of St. Ignatius's Church, for its future home, reports the Chronicle. This is the result of a failure to induce Mrs. Abby Parrott to rebuild the Emporium building on Market street, opposite Powell, for the accommodation of the big department store in its former location. Should the new location be secured and a building go up it will be the second time that the store has occupied the former site of St. Ignatius's Church, as the Parrott building on Market street replaced the church of early days.

Two San Francisco carpenters, brothers-in-law, parted fifty-seven years ago on the completion of a building at Montgomery and Clay streets. A few days ago C. H. Swain, one of the men, who is still active and strong at 76, was employed on a new temporary structure going up on the same spot. While at work he was approached by another old man, not so hale and hearty, and was surprised to recognize in him his brother-in-law, A. M. Adlington, whom he had not seen since they had worked together there.

Mrs. Mary Fair, wife of Andrew Fair, died at her home in San Jose October 3. Mrs. Fair was a native of Ireland and was in her 65th year. For nearly twenty years Mrs. Fair, with her husband, who was a brother of Senator James G. Fair, had resided in San Jose. Mrs. Fair is survived by her husband and six children.

Half a dozen or more fifteen-gallon tanks of newly carbonated water and about forty crates of filled syphon bottles were turned on flames at Howard and Fifteenth streets recently with immediate effect. The proximity of the soda water factory and the prompt use of its products prevented what might have been a destructive fire.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Harry B. Young, (formerly Miss Louise Whitney of Santa Barbara), has been brightened by the advent of a son.

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy people who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Brigadier-General Frederick Funston, U. S. A., accompanied by his aides, Lieutenant Burdett J. Mitchell, U. S. A., and Lieutenant Edward C. Long, U. S. A., is expected to arrive here today from Cuba.

Brigadier-General Stephen J. Jocelyn, U. S. A., who arrived here early last week, en route to Vancouver Barracks, left ten days ago for north, where he goes to assume command of the Department of Columbia.

Colonel Charles Morris, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been relieved from the command of the artillery district of San Francisco and of the presidio post, and ordered to the command of the Artillery district of Portland, Maine, with headquarters at Fort Williams, Maine, of which he will also be in command. Colonel Morris will not leave for about two months, as Colonel John A. Lundeen, U. S. A., who has been ordered to succeed him as commander of the Presidio post and of the Artillery district of San Francisco, has two months' leave. Colonel Lundeen, who was promoted on October 1st to present rank, came here to relieve Colonel Morris, U. S. A., as Inspector-General.

Colonel John A. Darling, U. S. A., retired, and Mrs. Darling were recent arrivals in London.

Colonel George S. Anderson, First Cavalry, U. S. A., is detailed as a member of the general staff corps and there is a possibility that he may be appointed chief of staff of the Pacific Division.

Lieutenant-Colonel Lea Febiger, U. S. A., acting-inspector general, is in Oregon on a brief of inspection.

Lieutenant-Colonel George L. Anderson, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., has been detailed to a vacancy in the inspector-general's department, vice Colonel John A. Lundeen, Artillery Corps, relieved from detail in that department.

Lieutenant-Colonel John R. Williams, Artillery Corps, Presidio of San Francisco, has been granted two months' leave with permission to apply for an extension of one month. Commander A. C. Almy, U. S. N., retired, and Mrs. Almy, have been the guests of Lieutenant and Mrs. Graham at Mare Island en route to Commander Almy's station at San Francisco.

Major Henry M. Morrow, Judge Advocate, U. S. A., is relieved from duty in the Department of Colorado and ordered to proceed to Manila for duty as Judge Advocate in the Department of Luzon, relieving Major Walter E. L. U. S. A., who is assigned as Judge Advocate of the Philippine division.

Major Ira A. Haynes, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who has been recently promoted to his present rank, is ordered to fill a vacancy in the military secretary's department and will proceed at once to Atlanta, Georgia, for duty as military secretary of the Department of the East.

Captain Kirby Walker, Fourteenth Cavalry, Presidio of Monterey, is granted two months' leave of absence to take effect about October 20th. Captain Carroll D. Buck, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., has arrived from the East and reported for duty at the Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco.

Captain Frank D. Webster, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., has been granted two months' leave of absence which took effect on October 1st.

Lieutenant Emory Winship, U. S. N., has been detached from duty at the Union Iron Works and granted three months' leave. He and Mr. Winship will spend some weeks in the East. Lieutenant John M. Craig, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., has had San Jose, California, designated as his station, instead of Martinez, California, while on duty in connection with the Progressive Military Map of the United States.

Lieutenant Edmund L. Bull, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., has had Ramona, California, designated as his station while on duty in connection with "The Progressive Military Map of the United States."

Lieutenant Edward W. Terry, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., has been granted one month's leave of absence.

Lieutenant Sidney W. Brewster, U. S. M. C., had his order to report for examination for promotion revoked, and is ordered detached from Mare Island Barracks and to duty at the Marine Barracks, Navy Yard, New York.

A general court martial which was appointed to meet at Camp A. E. Wood, Yosemite National Park, early this month, consisted of Captain Ernest A. Greenough, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Captain Charles C. Pulsis, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Lieutenant Tilman Campbell, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Lieutenant Albert C. Love, Medical Department, U. S. A., Lieutenant Arthur G. Fisher, Fourteenth Cavalry, U. S. A., Lieutenant James R. Pourie, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., Judge Advocate.

The home of Captain Harry Roosevelt, U. S. M. C., and Mrs. Roosevelt (formerly Miss Ennor Morrow), who are at present living in Washington, D. C., has been brightened by the birth of a son.

The members of the Bohemian Club and those non-members who have been fortunate enough to enjoy the club's hospitality in its famous "Red Room"—now, alas, no more—will have a kindly recollection of Steward Johnson, who catered for the club so long. He is recalled to recollection by the announcement that "A. H. Johnson, manager and steward of the Bohemian Club for eleven years, has taken charge of the Tavern at Tamalpais, succeeding the late Gen. R. H. Warfield." Beyond question the culinary department of the Tavern will be perfect under Mr. Johnson, and doubtless the other departments will share its excellence.

A man with a fractured skull sprinted at full speed down Van Ness avenue with a hospital surgeon in full chase one day last week. John Ferrari, a railroad track worker, had been taken to the Central Emergency Hospital to be treated for a fractured skull. He pleaded to be allowed to go home without treatment, but his injury was so serious that the hospital attaches demurred. He was finally headed off and brought back to the hospital. Ferrari and a fellow worker were engaged in striking a spike with heavy sledge hammers when Ferrari allowed his head to get in the line of descent of his partner's hammer.

J. Fred Schultz and Dorothy Miller were married a few days ago, but not in haste. The records show that Schultz procured a license to marry Miss Miller in December, 1897. What came as a barrier between the two neither will tell, but Miss Miller remained so until Monday when the pair appeared before Justice Van Nostrand and the ancient document was produced. Though much the worse for wear, it had lost none of its legal efficacy. "I would have taken out a new license," said Schultz, "but the old one has associations which are now pleasant to look upon."

Reports from Calexico tell of the partial success of the Southern Pacific Company and the people of the Imperial Valley in their efforts to turn the Colorado River back into its old channel and out of New River, which has been carrying the most of it into the Salton Sink. The companies have nearly a thousand men at work with three big steam shovels and big steel dump cars. The water has been raised three feet by the work and the stream is lessened to about 500 feet. It is claimed that the river will be turned back into its old channel within a short time.

The records show that during September 106,075 misdirected letters were received at the San Francisco postoffice. Twelve clerks under a superintendent were constantly employed in handling them. Oakland and Los Angeles streets were used in many of the directions, while on many others no street was given, the addressees being former residents of the burned district. Of the 106,075 letters, 24,113 were returned to senders, 9976 were corrected and forwarded, and 20,336 were held for postage. Tons of second and third class matter were burned.

It was "23" for Miss Margaret Schidu's party in Cleveland, Ohio, September 23. The young woman had planned to celebrate her twenty-third birthday in a manner befitting her name, but the weather was cold and instead of 23 guests only seven attended. The trip to the farm of an uncle of Miss Schidu was abandoned. Miss Schidu lives in West Twenty-third street and the number of her house was changed to "23" in large figures for the occasion.

Mr. and Mrs. T. S. Brandegee, the well-known botanists of San Diego, have donated their entire botanical collections and library to the University of California. As a result of this munificent gift the facilities for research at the State University are practically doubled and it now possesses the most complete representation extant on the Pacific Coast of its flora.

Thornwall Mullally, assistant to the president of the United Railroads, gave a luncheon a few days ago on a street car to a party of friends. The luncheon was served by the St. Francis Hotel cuisine. A table was fitted up in one of the cars, and the guests ate as they were whirled along the routes through the ruins.

Returns for Los Angeles county for the general election November 6th show a total registration of 88,092. Los Angeles county is now the most populous politically in the State. San Francisco county, which formerly was in the lead, gave total registration returns of 51,733 voters.

In excavating for the foundation of the new building for the Bank of California, at the northwest corner of California and Sansome streets, the workmen came upon the remains of an old wharf. The piles were remarkably well preserved and even some of the old floor timbers were intact. The former bank building was built in 1864, but sixteen years before that time the waters of the bay came up to that spot, and a wharf, known as California-street wharf, was built there in the summer of 1849.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Lund, Jr., has been brightened by the advent of a daughter.

MR. DOOLEY ON THE PRESS.

He Tells What the Papers Do to Presidents, Potentates, and the Public.

Everybody, nearly, has laughed with Mr. Dooley, the philosopher of Archey Road, and though the reflections of the sage with the brogue were looked for vainly during the past year, they are once more to delight the public. F. P. Dunne, the real Dooley, is now one of the editors of the American Magazine, and in the October number he returns to the style of work that made him famous when he was a Chicago newspaper reporter. The following extracts from the magazine article give some of Mr. Dooley's views on the power of the press:

"People tell ye they don't care what is said about him in print. They don't if it's pleasant. If ye said a man was a greater pote thin Shakespeare, a greater gin'ral thin Napoleon, a gr-reater statesman thin Thomas Jefferson, he'd have a feelin' that ye done him scant justice on'y because if ye didn't ye'er readers wud indignantly stop th' pa-aper. Ye never read iv annybody writin' in that his attintion has been called to a paragraph praisin' him an' regrettin' that stuff has been published about him that shud be kept f'r his tombstone. But if ye print a squib down in th' right hand corner iv th' twelfth page followin' pure advertisin' mather to th' gin'ral effect that his past life in Missouri is known to th' iditor he'll be around that mornin' with a gun an' a lawyer."

Where the public get their opinions of people they do not know is explained:

"I take all th' pa-apers an' read thim fr'm end to end. I don't believe a bad thing they print about anny iv me frinds, but I believe ivrything about annybody else. Many a man I don't know'd be surprised to hear I wudden't speak to him on account iv what I think I know iv him. I'm personally acquainted with ivry prominent man in the wurruld through th' pa-apers, but I cudden't swear there was iver such a person as Tiddy Rosenfelt. I never see him. So far as I'm concerned, Hinnissy, th' man that's prident iv ye an' me an' sivinty million others was made in a newspaper office be some bright young fellow in his shirt sleeves and smokin' a corn cob pipe. He happened to be feelin' good so he made an attractive character. But th' rale Tiddy Rosenfelt instead av bein' a short, thickest man, with rows iv flashin' teeth, a cheerful demeanor an' a pugnacious disposition, may be a long, lean man with red side whiskers, no teeth at all an' scared to death iv Secretary Shaw. Some day th' young fellow that made him may make him over an' thin I'll have another busted idol. It's th' same with William Jennings Bryan, with th' Czar, King Edward, or annybody else. They're all made out in newspaper th' way ye'er little boy makes a cocked hat an' thin turns it into a boat. Desthroy th' newspapers an' they'd disappear like th' figures off a kinoscope screen. They're alive while th' ink lasts; they're dead th' minit the iditor says: 'We pass on to the next cage.' Be hivens, Hinnissy, if I can't believe what I read about people I don't know, I'm a lost man."

This is Mr. Dooley's impression of a magnate "all spattered and torn":

"Th' printed wurruld! What can I do against it? I can buy a gun to protect me against me inimy. I can change me name to save me fr'm th' gran' jury. But there's no escape f'r good man or bad fr'm th' printed wurruld. It follows me wheriver I go an' strikes me down in church, in me office, in me very home. There was me frind Jawn D. Three years ago he seemed insured against punishment ayether here or here-after. A happy man, a religious man. He had squared th' ligislatures, th' coorts, th' pollyticians, an' th' Baptist clargy. He saw th' dollars hoppin' out iv ivry lamp chimbley in th' wurruld an' hurryin' to'rd him. His heart was pure, seein' that he had never done wrong save in th' way iv business. His head was hairless but unbowed. Ivry Mondah mornin' I read iv him leadin' a chorus iv 'Onward Christyan sogers marchin' f'r th' stuff.' He was at peace with th' wurruld, th' flesh, an' th' divvle. A good man! What cud harm him? An' so it seemed he might proceed to th' grave whin, lo an' behold, up in his path leaps a lady with a pen in hand an' off goes Jawn D. f'r th' tall timbers. A lady, mind ye, dips a pen into an inkwell! there's an explosion, an' what's left iv Jawn D. an' his power wudden't frighten crows away fr'm a cornfield. Who's afraid iv Rockyfeller now? Th' prident hits him a kick, a country grand jury indicts him, a goluf caddy overcharges him, an' whin he comes back fr'm Europe he has as many polismen to meet him on th' pier as Doc Owens. A year ago, annybody wud take his money. Now if he wanted to give it even to Chancellor Day he'd have to meet him in a barn at midnight."

Mr. Dooley thinks that our public men must resort to the political "intelligence" office. He says:

"Whin a State wants to illicit a governor or a city a mayor they don't go as wanst they did to th' most graceful tax dodger in th' community f'r advice but apply to th' Pollytickal Intelligence Office set up by me frind Lincoln Steffens. No wan can get a job without a charackter fr'm him: 'Grover Cleveland, honest but grumpy; don't get along with other servants an' is disposed to lecture his masters; induthrees but not very bright; wud make a good judge in a probate court; since lavin' his last place has been keepin' bad comp'ny.'"

"Thaydore Rosenfelt; excellent man iv all wurruk, honest, sober, but a little quarrelsome. Sometimes thries too hard to please all his employers at wanst; wants to do too much f'r thim at other times an' has been known to compel thim to take a bath when they didn't need it. Wud make an excellent watchman f'r th' front dure but doesn't pay much attention to th' back iv th' house. Very well satisfied with his present position but may have to make a change.' 'Willum Jennings Bryan; has been a second man f'r ten years, a position to which he is well suited. Wud like to improve his condition. Cheerful, economical, but not to be thrusted with silver.'"

"No, sir, as Hogan says, I care not who makes th' laws or th' money iv a country so long as I run th' presses. Father Kelly was talkin' about it th' other day. 'There ain't annything like it an' there niver was,' says he. 'All th' priests in this diocese together preach to about a hundred thousand people wunst a week an', he says, 'all th' papers preach to three milyun wanst a day, aye, twenty times a day,' says he. 'We give ye hell on Sundahs an' they give ye hell all th' time,' he says. 'Tis a wonderful thing,' he says. It's got Death beat a mile in levelin' ranks. No man, be he king or potintate, or milk-man, is anny bigger or anny littler thin what ye see iv him in th' papers. Ye say it invades our privacy. But so does th' polisman, on'y he carries a warrant an' th' press nabs us f'r crimes that are too intelligent f'r th' polis to understand. It rules be findin' out what th' people want an' if they don't want annything it tells thim what it wants thim to want it to tell him. It's against all tyrants but itsel' an' it has th' boldest iv thim crookin' th' knee to it."

Mr. Miggles at the Phone.

Mr. Miggles was trying to call up a friend who lived in a suburban town. Mr. Miggles looked up the number, then got Central. "Hello!" he said. "Give me Elmdale two-ought-four-seven."

"Elmdale? I'll give you long distance."

Long distance asked: "What is it?"

"Elmdale two-ought-four-seven."

"Elmdale two-ought-four-seven?"

"Yes."

"What is your number?"

"I just told you. Elmdale two-ought—"

"I mean your own house number."

"Sixty-five Blicken street."

"Oh, that isn't what I mean. Your 'phone number."

"Why didn't you say so?" asked Mr. Miggles, who is noted for his quick temper.

"I did. What is it?"

"Violet Park eight-seven-seven."

"Violet Park eight-double-seven?"

"I reckon so."

"And what number do you want?"

"Elmdale two-ought-four-seven."

"What is your name?"

"My name is John Henry Miggles. I live at 65 Blicken street, Violet Park; my house 'phone is Violet Park eight-seven-seven or eight-double-seven, as you choose; I am married, have no children; we keep a dog and a cat and a perpetual palm and a Boston fern and—"

"All that is unnecessary, sir. We merely—"

"And last summer we didn't have a bit of luck with our roses. I tried to have a little garden, too, but the neighbors' chickens got away with that. The house is green, with red gables; there is a cement walk from the street. I am forty years old; my wife is younger and looks it; we have a piano, keep a cook and an upstairs girl; had the front bedroom papered last week and I want to—"

"Did you want Elmhurst two-ought-four-seven?"

"Yes!" gasped Mr. Miggles.

"Well, the circuit is busy now. Please call again."

But Mr. Miggles wrote a letter.

—New Orleans Picayune.

"We can't get all at once into the exclusive circles, ma. We haven't got the prestige." "Well, law sakes, Sairy, can't we buy some?"—Baltimore American.

"Ah!" sighed the rich old widower, "I would willingly die for you." "How soon?" queried the pretty but practical maid.—Chicago Daily News.

A Gridiron Elegy.

Now comes the megaphoneless hour of day—
The hoarse-voiced crowd begins to twenty-three;
The rooters homeward plod their weary way,
And leave the field to doctors and to me.

In yonder ambulance, that rumbles o'er the hill,
Full many a senseless giant, bleeding, lay;
And to the hospital went battered Tom and Bill,
To count the many bruises of the day.

For them no more the umpire's whistle calls,
No more the megaphones will bid them kill;
No more they'll have those thrilling dives and falls,
That have their sequel in the doctor's bill.

Perhaps to this neglected ground there creeps
Some chap who last year played the game;
He takes one look—ah, how the poor chap weeps—
Across the field where he lost gore and fame.

Full many a star of purest ray serene
The white beds of yon hospital now bear;
Full many a player's born to groan unseeo
And waste much arnica—likewise much swear.

Far from the madding crowd's ignoble cheers
Hereafter they will limp their way along,
And play high-five, or shake the dice for beers—
Or stick to that most quiet game—ping-pong.

Elder Members of the Skidoo Family.

No philologist will ever trace the origin of many grotesque expressions, nor fathom how they were ever made susceptible of expressing an idea. "Skidoo" is a modern example that is just as expressive as "Get out," but where it came from and who were its sponsors is not clear, to say nothing of its development into a full-rounded word.

Following is a partial list of other phrases and words that have the same meaning but lack the present novelty and force of "skidoo":

Absquatulate. Vamoose the ranch. Shake your dusties. Light out. Shunt off. Beat it. Retire. Get out. Go away. Leave. Hit the trail. Hike. Skeddaddle. Make your escape. Twenty-three for you. Scoot. 'Raus mit 'em. Blow. On your way. Trot along. Back to the mines. To the tall timber. Get a move on. To the grass. Take a run for yourself. Clear out. Go along. Get. Ta-ta. So long. Brush by. Shut the door from the outside. Dig.

"A man in public office should not be indifferent to this world's goods." "No," answered Senator Sorghum, "but it is not always wise to let himself be caught with them."—Washington Star.

"Look here, waiter, where are those soft boiled eggs I ordered?" "De cook boiled 'em too hard, sah, so he had to boil 'em over again."—Milwaukee Sentinel.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

ne very slippery day "Mark Twain" was wing down Main street in Hartford. A portly cken fell just in front of him with a thud. Lying calmly down, "Mark Twain" drawled: "You'll have to hit it again and a little harder. I think you'll break through." The fat man with a purple face told Mr. Clemens to go there is always a successful corner on ice snow. Mr. Clemens walked on, saying: "That is the very last time that I'll ever encourage a man to get up when he is down in."

Hey!" yelled the stevedore, "handle that gun-der careful." "What's wrong wid it?" demanded Finnegan. "I had hold of it." "Don't you know," replied the stevedore, "that of that same powder exploded last year an' ed up ten men?" "Shure, that couldn't happen now," replied eegan, "fur there's only two of us here."

very rich and Socialistic Deputy, who had ed a property by the sea, closed his park to strians, and excluded the public from a part e shore, which he reserved to himself. "What!" says one to him; "you a Socialist, to is!" "Oh, pardon," replies the Deputy; "my cons-ns are enjoying a vacation."

ole, the English comedian, once gave the wing as his idea of a bright, short play to piring young dramatist who had submitted to a laborious drama in six acts: hen the curtain goes up two persons are dis-ed on a sofa, one a pretty young woman, the a nice-looking young fellow. ell, what did you tell her?" "I worldly smile lit up the face features of the er, as he said: "I told her that Dr. Blank had been a zealous ate of immersion from his youth up. We t allow theological hair-splitting to reduce ubscription list."

Vile Archbishop Trench was dean of West- man. he delegated Canon Cureton to preach il abbey on a certain saint's day. On such ays he boys of Westminster school attended ery, and afterward had the rest of the day as he lay. While Mr. Cureton on the morning t day he was to officiate was looking over is non at the breakfast table his son asked in to vibrating with anxiety:

"I her, is yours a long sermon today?" "Jimmy, not very." "I how long? Please tell me." "Well, about twenty minutes, I should say. y are you so anxious to know?" "I ause, father, the boys say they will thrash ully if you are more than half an hour."

I late Archbishop of Canterbury was for ears fearful of a stroke of paralysis. d at the right of the Countess of Warwick illiant banquet, he startled the guests by and remarking: "Then, it has come at last—that which I ared for forty years, a stroke of paralysis. I have been pinching my knee for the last twenty minutes and can't find the least sensation there."

"Pardon me," said the countess, "but it was my knee that you were pinching."

Chevrolet, the automobilist, was talking of American railways.

"They are superb," he said. "Abroad we have nothing like them. But the expense! On my way down to Florida I said to the porter as the time drew near for us to part:

"Porter, you have been very attentive and I want to give you something, but I have no change."

Then I took out a $20 bill from my wallet. "Certainly, sir," the porter answered, pulling out a large roll of money. "How will you have it, sir? In fives?"

The king, who was Prince of Wales for a longer period than any of his predecessors, is said to speak a few words of Welsh. There is a story told of a Chicago girl, the daughter of a millionaire, who, in the days before his majesty had ascended the throne, had determined to visit England. A friend found her studying Welsh, and in reply to a question the girl said: "I'm going to be presented to the Prince of Wales when I'm in London, and I should like to be able to speak to him in his real native language."

A stately and venerable professor one morn- ing, being unable to attend to his class on account of a cold, wrote on the blackboard:

"Dr. Dash, through indisposition, is unable to attend to his classes today."

The students erased one letter in this notice, making it read:

"Dr. Dash, through indisposition, is unable to attend to his lasses today."

But it happened a few minutes later that the professor returned for a box he had forgotten. Amid a roar of laughter he detected the change in his notice, and, approaching the blackboard, calmly erased one letter in his turn.

Now the notice read: "Dr. Dash, through indisposition, is unable to attend to his asses today."

A lawyer from one of the interior counties of Pennsylvania went to Philadelphia on some professional business. When he returned he told his neighbors about it.

"I stopped at one of them taverns," he said, "and they charged me $3 a day for my room and meals. Just think of that; $3 a day! But I got good and even with them. I ate oysters three times a day."

Some years ago, when the route of a railroad to Atlantic City was being surveyed and the men were driving stakes through the premises of an old farmer, he addressed the leader of the gang as follows:

"Layin' out another railroad?" "Surveying for one," was the reply. "Goin' threw my barn?" "Don't see how we can avoid it." "Wall, now, mister," said the worthy farmer, "I calkerlate I've got sumthin' tew say 'bout that. I want you tew understand that I've got sumthin' else tew dew besides runnin' out tew open and shet them doors every time a train wants to go through."

Madison C. Peters, clergyman and author, was talking to a group of young men.

"Half the wrong things you chaps do," he said, "you do only because they are forbidden. If you didn't know they were forbidden, if you didn't know they were wrong, they would only seem to you disgusting and repugnant."

"I strolled one spring morning in a beautiful park.

"'Look here,' I said to one of the guards, 'why do you have "Keep off the grass" signs all over the park? You don't seem to enforce the rule.'

"'No, sir,' said the guard. 'The object of the signs is to cause the people to enjoy more thor- oughly being on the grass.'"

A young English farmer, wishing to have his banns published, went to see the parish clergy- man. The reverend gentleman asked him several questions, all of which he was able to answer with the exception of one.

"Is your intended a spinster?" the clergyman asked.

He paused in thought. Then he replied, "No, sir; she's a dressmaker."

John Fiske, the American historian, was an ardent lover of music and himself no mean musi- cian. Furthermore, he was extremely corpulent and felt the hot weather painfully. He was once delivering a course of lectures at a summer school in a small city of the middle west. The heat was terrific and adjoining the house where the lecturer stayed was a church where an ill-matched but zealous "quartet" practiced and performed during all hours of the torrid afternoons and evenings. One evening, seeing the famous man sit for a time unoccupied and apparently op- pressed by this combined affliction, the young daughter of his hostess attempted to divert him by offering him a new novel, then just becoming popular.

"I think 'The Choir Invisible' is perfectly splendid, Mr. Fiske," said she. "Wouldn't you like to read it?"

The historian put the book aside. "My dear young lady," said he, "the only choir in the world in which I could feel any interest at this moment would be the choir inaudible."

This Number of the Argonaut

Is sent to a certain number who are not on its subscription lists. If it should happen to fall into the hands of those who already are subscribers or readers, they are asked to hand it to any person who in their opinion may be interested in such a journal. There are many pressing topics in these stirring days. In this issue we discuss National politics, California politics, and the interesting campaigns now progressing in the various States. Likewise the questions so vital to San Francisco in her present needs---insurance, relief, rehabilitation, rebuilding, labor---all these and many kindred topics are now being discussed in the Argonaut. Our regular readers know that this journal has not missed an issue, and that practically all of the time since the disaster it has been issued in its old form. Others may not know it, hence some of these issues are sent free to strangers.

The Argonaut will be sent free up to Jan. 1st, 1907, to all new subscribers who send in one year's subscription during November and December.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"Under what circumstances," asked the chief examiner, "would you call in another physician for a consultation?" "When I didn't want the patient to die on my own hands," promptly answered the medical student.

Chesterfield, during his last illness, was driving. A lady overtook him. "How glad I am," said she, "to see you driving out." "Madam," said Lord Chesterfield, with a smile, "I am not driving out. I am simply rehearsing my funeral."

Miss Gaysett (after every other means has failed)—"I've named my new saddle horse after you, Mr. Ankerd." Mr. Ankerd—"Hah—Ah—Deuced flattered—really—." Miss Gaysett—"Yes; it's so dreadfully hard to make him go."—Puck.

American Cousin—"I reckon the sons of some of our millionaires have a pretty hard problem to solve when they can't decide whether to go into business and live up to their fathers' reputations, or go into society, and live them down."—Punch.

"Little boy," said the judge, "do you understand the nature of an oath?" "Makin' a swear?" "Yes." "I know all about it, judge," answered the youthful witness. "I sell papers right in front o' de gas company's office."—Chicago Tribune.

"Why," asked the agitator, "should the wage-earner be at the beck and call of his employer?" "I'm not," said the auditor, who was yawning. "I've got my employer so that he minds every word I say and asks no questions. I'm a chauffeur."—Washington Star.

Wife—"But, my dear, you've forgotten again that today is my birthday." Husband—"Listen, dearie; I know I forgot it, but there isn't a thing about you to remind me that you are a day older than you were a year ago."—Translated for Tales from Le Journal pour Tous.

Grudge—"That will be a fine marriage, a splendid alliance. The bride's father is rich. She just rolls in gold. The bridegroom is rich, too; he made a fortune in copper." Bridge—"That's not an alliance; it's an alloy."—Translated for Tales from Le Rire.

"Well, Willie, I suppose your nose is completely out of joint since your little brother came." "No, it hasn't made any difference with mine; but pa's is. He bumped it against the door when he got up in the dark to hunt for the catnip, night before last."—Chicago Record-Herald.

"Wealth has its disadvantages," said the philosopher. "Yes," answered the man with sporting inclinations. "It must be very monotonous for a man to be able to bet five or ten thousand dollars on a horse race without caring whether he loses it or not."—Washington Star.

De Long—"So you didn't get anything out of your rich uncle's estate, eh?" Shortleigh—"Not yet, but I expect to get most of it some day; I am engaged to the daughter of the attorney for the estate." De Long—"Good! Let me congratulate you."—Chicago Daily News.

Attorney—"Have you formed any opinion on this case?" Prospective Juror—"No, sir." Attorney—"After the evidence on both sides is all in, do you think you will be able to form an opinion?" Prospective Juror—"No, sir." Attorney—"Good! You'll do."—Chicago Daily News.

Bishop Potter credits to Bishop Williams the saying that the Puritans upon landing in New England, "first fell on their knees and then fell on the aborigines." Most of us have heard the remark attributed to Dr. Oliver Wendell Holmes. There is a tendency, however, to allow the reputation to remain where it is.

Tourist in Highlands (who has eaten about four-pennyworth)—"What do I owe you for this meal?" Guidwife—"Aweel, it's the Saw-bath. So we'll no charge ye anything." Grannie—"Na, na, we wunna charge ye anything. But ye can just gie the bairns saxpence apiece!"—Punch.

The Lady—"Do you clean houses?" The Vacuum Cleaner Man—"Yes, ma'am. We have a four-cylinder machine, and we'll take away every atom of dirt." "All right; my husband has just been spending his vacation on a second-hand auto, and I wish you'd start on him at once."—Life.

Dr. Levi Bull, when presiding over the diocesan convention of Pennsylvania, put a resolution to vote and heard a loud response of "aye." "The resolution is carried," he declared. "But, doctor," said a grave divine, rising in his place, "you have not called for the noes." "Oh, well," said Dr. Bull, "we don't want any noes!"

Right Rev. Chauncey B. Brewster, D. D., Bishop of Connecticut, told a story the other day which he says is Mrs. Brewster's favorite.

It seems the Bishop had caught a small boy stealing apples in his orchard; so, after reproving him severely for some time, he said: "And now, my boy, do you know why I tell you all this? There is One before whom even I am a crawling worm; do you know who?" "Sure," replied the boy, promptly, "the missus."—Harper's Weekly.

A Permanent Postal Tribunal.

During the first week in October there sat in New York a special Congressional commission to hear the complaints of periodical publishers, postal employees, and others concerning postal problems. The Postoffice Department has shown signs of saddling the whole postal business on the periodical publishers. The publishers claim that this would be unjust and unwarranted, and we think they have proved their case. The Postoffice Department charges newspaper publishers one cent a word for transporting newspapers as second-class matter under many rigid restrictions. The express Companies transport the same kind of matter for half a cent per word under practically no restrictions at all. If the express companies can do this business at a profit, how is it at the Postoffice Department at double the charge, do it at a loss?

The subject is too complicated to discuss in detail, but, having a point dwelt upon insistently by many newspapers—the very high rate paid by the Postoffice Department to the railways for transporting the mails—there are innumerable other factors which cause the postoffice deficit. One among them is that the Postoffice Department is burdened with the free transportation of all of the letters, documents, publications, office furniture, freight, and what we may generally call "truck" of all the other departments of the United States Government. It may be said that the Postoffice Department ought to do this. Even if that be so, Uncle Sam would only transfer his cash from one pocket to another. But why should the postoffice pocket be drawn upon by the other departments? Then there is no reason why newspaper publishers should make up to the Postoffice Department a deficit caused by transporting roll-top desks, office chairs, and tables for the Department of Agriculture, or coin and bullion for the Treasury Department. Yet that is what is done.

Some years ago the Treasury Department desired to transport twenty-five million dollars in gold from the Sub-Treasury in San Francisco to the Sub-Treasury in New York. The way they did it was simple. They sent a Treasury postal frank to the postmaster at San Francisco, told him to stick it on to the twenty-five millions in gold, and deliver it in New York. This that unfortunate official, under the law, was obliged to do. No further effort or worry on the part of the Treasury Department was necessary. Incredible as it may seem, the postmaster at San Francisco carted the twenty-five million dollars in gold under armed guard to the Southern Pacific Railway station. There it was loaded on a special train, each car of which was equipped with guards, heavily armed. This train was then sent across the continent by a circuitous route, and with all information concerning its route and time sedulously concealed from the newspapers in order to avoid the danger of an attack from highwaymen. After a certain number of days this train arrived at Jersey City. The boxes containing the twenty-five millions in gold were taken across on the ferries, and New Yorkers were mystified by the extraordinary spectacle of many vehicles loaded with boxes, upon which were perched guards with rifles and pistols. This procession finally ended at the Sub-Treasury, where the Postoffice Department was released from the custody of the coin by the receipt of the Treasury Department.

This little bit of Treasury transportation cost the Postoffice Department many thousands of dollars and cost the Treasury Department nothing at all. Should such a sum be saddled on the Postoffice Department? It so, should a resulting postal deficit be saddled on the newspaper publishers? We do not see why.

Another source of the postal deficit is the transportation of "equipment." This means shipping fifty or sixty pounds of heavy mail sacks, locks, metal tags, etc., with two or three ounces of letters therein, and then shipping the "equipment" back empty on fast trains at high railway mail rates. It could just as well go back as freight.

Without entering further into this subject—and we assure our readers that it is a very fruitful one—we desire most warmly to approve the suggestion of the periodical association following the session in New York. It is that this postal commission should recommend to Congress the creation of a permanent postal tribunal on the lines of the Interstate Commerce Commission, to deal with problems in postal classification as the other commission deals with railroad rates. Such a commission, in our opinion, would do much to remove the causes for friction now existing between the Postoffice Department and the periodical publishers. Probably both sides believe they are right, but we know that the periodical publishers are right in this contention, at least, that the Postoffice Department should make such rulings and such constructions of these rulings that they can be understood. As at present, they can not be understood even by the postal employees, let alone by the employees of the publishers.

We do not believe that any reputable periodical publishers countenance a dishonest use of the postal laws. But as the Postoffice Department persistently refuses so to construe its own laws that they can be understood, many honest publishers are at times held up by the department when they are quite innocent in intention.

Vote for this Amendment.

We hope that voters generally will cast their ballot in favor of Constitutional Amendment Number Five (voting number 1) on Tuesday, November 6th. It declares that the Cogswell Polytechnical College shall be exempt from taxation. The purpose of this institution is to give to the boys and girls of this State "a practical training in the mechanical arts and other industries, with the object of fitting them successfully to engage in the different pursuits of life." This school has been created, constructed, and endowed by the money of private individuals. Its Board of Trustees serves without compensation. It is a public school, all training is free, and it is non-sectarian. The total value of its property is only about $400,000, and the loss of revenue to the State would be small. The gain would be great, for scarcely anything is needed more in California than training in the mechanical arts and industries for young men and women.

The Crooked Sauerkraut Companies Again.

For some time the Argonaut has been forced to ignore the crooked sauerkraut companies. We regret it, but the crooked cockney companies have engrossed our time and space. Besides the crooked sauerkraut companies have had little to say for themselves, contenting themselves by getting out of the limelight and refusing to pay. However, the policy holders in the crooked sauerkraut companies are determined to get their just dues and have organized and sent representatives to Germany with that end in view. Hence the crooked sauerkraut companies are beginning to see that they had better make some sort of a showing, no matter how poor it may be.

The North German Insurance Company of Hamburg, which is in a way the dean of the crooked sauerkraut companies, now comes forward and makes a plea, through Attorney W. S. Goodfellow, its counsel. The company contends through its counsel that it is not liable on its policies here, as its policy form contains an earthquake clause. We have before remarked that most of the earthquake clauses in the policies we have seen do not on their face exempt the companies from liability. Almost all of these clauses seem to us calculated to exempt the companies from earthquake damage, but not from fire damage. The attempts of the companies to claim that they are not liable for fire damage when caused by earthquake damage seems to us not to be borne out by the language of their policies. Furthermore, in all of these earthquake clauses there is intrinsic evidence that the men who drew them meant to hold their companies free from earthquake damage, and that the thought to hold their companies free from fire damage when caused by earthquake damage was utterly remote from their minds. When one considers how carefully these policy forms are drawn up, and how minutely the wording is studied by expert actuaries and conveyancers, it is impossible to believe that they failed to express their meaning clearly. It is incredible that they did not express themselves with sufficient precision as to make it clear what they meant. It is, in effect, quite plain what they intended their words to mean. It is also quite plain what they are now trying to make their words mean. Yet if their original meaning and their present construction of their clauses are plain, why are they afraid to test them in the courts? In the few cases where these clauses have been before the California courts the companies have been held liable. Yet all the other clauses in these policies except the so-called earthquake clauses are so clear and so unmistakable that no two intelligent men, whether lawyers or laymen, could disagree as to their meaning.

The foregoing remarks refer to those earthquake clauses where apparently by a very strained construction there might be some slight shadow of doubt as to whether the insuring company is liable for fire damage caused by earthquake damage. The policy form of the North German Insurance Company, however, is different in its wording. We print a clause copied from its contract:

This company shall not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by invasion, insurrection, riot, labor strike, civil war, or commotion, or military or usurped power, or by order of any civil authority, to prevent the spread of fire, whether such order be legal or not, nor in consequence of any neglect or deviation from police or municipal laws, rules or ordinances where such exist; or by theft at or after a fire; or by neglect of the insured to use all reasonable means to save and preserve the property at and after a fire or when the property is endangered by fire in neighboring premises, or (unless fire ensues and, in that event, for the damage by fire only) by explosion of any kind or from any cause, or the bursting of a boiler, or earthquake, or hurricane, or lightning; but liability for direct damage by lightning may be assumed by specific agreement hereon.

Attorney Goodfellow, counsel for the North German Company, contends that his company is not liable on its policies under this earthquake clause. We do not see much ground for his contention. This is one of those curious clauses so peculiarly drawn that the company seems to be liable under its terms for fire when caused by earthquake and not for any other earthquake damage than for earthquake-fire damage! Under a careful construing of the language, there is no other meaning possible.

The clause says plainly: "This company shall not be liable for loss," following which are a number of clauses under which the company is not liable. The next to the last clause reads: "(unless fire ensues, and, in that event, for the damage by fire only) by explosion of any kind or from any cause, or the bursting of a boiler, OR EARTHQUAKE, or hurricane, or lightning." Reading this clause by the ordinary rules construing an English sentence it means: "This company shall not be liable for loss by earthquake unless fire ensues, and in that event for the damage by fire only."

This proves plainly what we have been contending: That the earthquake clauses in both the crooked cockney and the crooked sauerkraut companies are entirely devoted to saving the companies from earthquake damage; that these policy forms mean that the company is liable for fire damage when caused by earthquake damage; is not liable for fire damage when caused by any expected factor; when earthquake is not one of these expected factors the company is liable for fire damage when caused by earthquake damage.

This is the only possible construction to be put on the earthquake clause in most of the crooked cockney companies and in most of the American companies which are patterned after them. In the case of this crooked sauerkraut company, however, the clause goes further, and, as we remarked above, says explicitly in set terms that the company is not liable for earthquake damage unless fire ensues, and then for damage by fire only. Attorney Goodfellow reads this clause with a hop, skip, and a jump in this way: "This company shall not be liable for loss caused directly or indirectly by earthquake." By picking and choosing words in that manner you can make almost any clause in any document mean anything at all. By so picking and choosing words from the Sermon on the Mount one could justify Judas's betrayal of his Lord. But we fancy Attorney Goodfellow will not find jurors to agree with his hop-skip-and-jump method of construing.

It is matter for rejoicing that these crooked companies, sauerkraut and cockney, are gradually being put on the defensive. A few months ago they were attempting to browbeat and bluster their unfortunate policyholders. Now they are on the run. They are beginning to see—such is the wide dissemination of news nowadays—that it is not easy for a man to be a rascal in California and an esteemed citizen in London, or a welcher in San Francisco and a worthy burgher in Berlin. If the managers, directors, and adjusters of these crooked companies think that the world is not watching them, they are very much in error. If inquiries pour into other newspaper offices as they have poured into the Argonaut during the last few months, there is no lack of information being furnished to the world. Only last week this office was requested to wire certain particulars concerning the insurance situation, to which we replied that it would cost fifty or sixty dollars. Reply came, "Never mind what it costs." So the wire went. We hope it did some good.

California Once Ruled by Organized Labor.

This journal has been accused of "hostility to Organized Labor." We have replied that we are not hostile to Organized Labor, but that we are hostile to Government by Organized Labor. And so we are. We are uncompromisingly opposed to Government by Organized Labor in this republic. No class is entitled to rule in this country. What Organized Labor most bitterly opposes is class government. And so do we. Government by the Rich, Government by Corporations, Government by the Trusts—to all these class governments Organized Labor is opposed. So is the Argonaut. And the Argonaut is also opposed to another class government, that of Government by Organized Labor.

This republic of ours is a government of the people, for the people, and by the people. It is not a government by any class. It is not a government by any part of the people. It is not a government by organized corporations, or by organized lawyers, or by organized merchants, or by organized employers, or by organized labor, or by organized anything. It is a government by the whole people.

"Organized Labor" as a class has no special God-given prerogative that we know of that makes it superior to any other class in this republic. But if there be those sufficiently weak-minded to think so, then let us recall to them an experiment in Government by Organized Labor recent enough not to be forgotten, bitter enough to be long remembered.

It was in 1894 that the State of California temporarily passed under a Government by Organized Labor. The cause was something with which the people of California had nothing to do. This remoteness of cause—which would deter an ordinary government from using it as a centre of civic strife—did not at all impress the California Government by Organized Labor. It took up a foreign controversy and made it a domestic quarrel. The seizure of government by Organized Labor in California arose from a dispute over wages in Illinois. On May 10th some 3000 Pullman employees there struck. Thereupon, a new labor organization, known as the American Railway Union, forbade its members from working on or in connection with any train hauling Pullman cars. As the lines running into California hauled Pullman cars, the American Railway Union demanded that they cease to haul those cars. The railway officials, being obligated by the law of common carriers and by their contracts to haul Pullman cars, naturally refused. Thereupon the Railway Union members struck, and the entire railway system of California was paralyzed. Passenger and freight transportation and postal communication were completely severed between San Francisco and other California cities and between this Coast and the East.

The paralysis of transportation was followed by the paralysis of regular government in California. H. H. Markham, then Governor of California, shirked his duties, left the capital, and hid himself in the southern part of the State. The strikers were backed up by the daily press. Many of the State officials and the municipal officials of the leading cities were as tools in the hands of the strikers. The railway officials were practically deprived of the power to operate their trains by reason of the refusal of the State and municipal authorities to accord them protection. Failing the ordinary police protection, they called upon the militia. Organized Labor thereupon passionately declared that "there was no necessity for calling out troops to coerce peaceful and law-abiding citizens." Yet there was coercion—no striker was ordered to work—the railway officials were only endeavoring to operate their trains; this, under their mail contracts with the United States Government and their common-carrier contracts with passengers and shippers, they were obliged to do.

Emboldened by their seizure of a supine State government, the strikers entered by force the private premises of the railway companies for the purpose of obstructing their business. As the Brotherhoods of Locomotive Engineers and Firemen were not involved in the strike the trainmen belonging to the striking unions boarded their engines to "persuade" these non-strikers to leave their work. When they failed to induce the engine or firemen to leave their cabs, they forcibly dragged them from their engines and often beat them. The strikers occupied the railway stations in large and threatening mobs, thus excluding railway officials, railway employes and railway passengers. They obstructed the railway tracks with empty cars. They "killed" engines and railed cars. They destroyed the semaphore connections. They "borrowed" engines and trains and used them to travel about the State in order to fight the lawful authorities.

For many days these acts took place freely and interruptedly in California under a Government by organized Labor.

To the north, to the east, and to the south, through trains were stopped. Railway passengers in East desiring to travel to California were sold tickets to the ticket agents there, but with the proviso that passage was not guaranteed west of the Rocky Mountains. Hundreds of Californians were tied up at various railway stations across the western half of the continent. The writer, who was in New York, found it impossible to purchase an assured passage to California north of El Paso, east of Ogden, or south of Portland. As it was important for him to reach his home, he was obliged to go north to Montreal, thence west over the Canadian Pacific lines to Vancouver, and then south over the Pacific Ocean, thus going completely around his native country to reach his native State. He crossed the continent under the flag of another country, in order that he might travel unimpeded to his own. And when he had reached California by way of the foreign railway and the high seas, he found his State was ruled by Government by Organized Labor. Such of the trains around San Francisco as were permitted by Government by Organized Labor to run, carried men with loaded rifles. Companies or squads of men filled the railway stations around the bay, and accompanied ferry boats on their trips. As it was midsummer thousands of people were scattered over the Coast in various summer resorts. Most of these were forced to remain where they were, with an almost total inability to receive or communicate news concerning themselves or their families. Fruit men, shippers, farmers, and merchants in the interior suffered great losses. Business of nearly every kind was paralyzed for weeks.

It must not be supposed that this Government by Organized Labor was continental in its character. There were strikes and industrial disturbances further East, but there the State and municipal authorities retained control. The Federation of Labor, the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, and the Knights of Labor refused to order out their men in this sympathetic strike. The American Railway Union was the only body actively interested, and it was only on this Coast that even this body seized control of the government. Eastern members of the American Railway Union were wise enough not to attempt to usurp governmental power.

This usurping Government by Organized Labor was encouraged throughout by the daily press. The Call, the Examiner, the Bulletin, and in a less degree the Chronicle said that the strikers' case was righteous and confidently predicted their triumph. The Bulletin of that period was not controlled by the present owner. It led the journalistic band in its attempts to give aid and comfort to the forces of Organized Labor. It stood odium against the railroad men by calling them rapacious and greedy," and "ex-brigands"; it warned them that they were "showing the pride which goes before a fall." When the United States soldiers fired at the accomplices of the murderers of Engineer Clark, the Bulletin asked with indignation whether "citizens be shot down by men in uniform and no questions asked."

Let us interject a word here about this incident under Government by Organized Labor. United States troops had been sent to Sacramento, where the overturn of the regular government was most pronounced and where the mob was most disorderly. The strikers at Sacramento determined to interrupt the regular running of trains, which had been resumed under the protection of the regular troops. So they derailed a train. Had they wished merely to destroy the property of the railway company, they could have derailed the train in any level spot where there would have been little chance for loss of life. But with devilish malignity they laid a trap for the train in such a spot that the resulting wreck was an awful and a fatal one. Their dastardly act resulted in the killing of the veteran engineer, Sam Clark, several regular soldiers, and the wounding of seven more men. These murders aroused so bitter a feeling on the part of the regulars that they did not hesitate to fire on the assassins and their accomplices when ordered.

Prior to this time the California militia had been organized to maintain order in Sacramento by reason of the paralysis of the State and municipal governments. The militia was afflicted with the same strange inertia.

General W. H. Dimond was then in command, but he resigned. The command was turned over from him to another. General Sheehan at one time led the militia, at another time General Dickinson. These various devolutions of command from one to another resulted in nothing but emboldening the mob. They went up and took the cartridges from the belts of the militiamen. Some of these fraternized with the strikers and flung their rifles in the river.

This is the story of how a Government by Organized Labor practically took control of the State capital, practically seized the larger cities of the State, and paralyzed the avenues of communication.

And why? Because some workmen two thousand strong as away had quarreled with their employers over a question of wages.

What brought an end to this arrogant usurpation of the government of a sovereign State? What was it that checked this rebellion against the lawful authorities? What was it that put an end to Government by Organized Labor in California? It was the interference of the Federal troops. The moment they appeared upon the scene the Government by Organized Labor fell.

After the heavy hand of the Federal Government was laid on California, law and order were again restored. During the time when California lay cowering at the feet of a Government by Organized Labor, tracks were torn up, trains were wrecked, freight cars were burned, railway stations were destroyed, engineers, firemen, train hands and yard men, police officers, and soldiers were stoned and beaten, and finally a train was killed and some of the soldiers of the United States army were wantonly and cowardly done to death.

These, then, are the reasons why we are opposed to Government by Organized Labor. This State has had no government by the whole people for over half a century. During that time it has thrived as scarcely any community has ever done. It had for three weeks a government by Organized Labor. During that time commercial and social intercourse was cut off, transportation was held up, all trade was paralyzed, and mobs and murder rioted at noonday.

We do not like a Government by Organized Labor. We do not like that kind of a government as shown in California in 1894, as shown in San Francisco in 1906.

Mr. Bell is the nominee of the Union Labor party. His name stands at the head of its ticket. His name, as its nominee has been officially recognized by the secretary of State. He stands for government by a class. He stands for a Government by Organized Labor.

Mr. Gillett is the nominee of the Republican party. That party is not a class. In it there are all classes. In it are found faculty and scholars, workingmen and employers, merchants and clerks marching side by side. It represents the whole people. It typifies the whole people. It is the party of the whole people. And Mr. Gillett, its nominee, stands for a Government by the Whole People.

Choose.

Sweet Bells Jangled.

Rarely do we read our musical exchanges. We receive a number of them, all printed in the highest style of the art, and doubtless edited with musicianly enthusiasm. Still, so much of our time and thought has been devoted of late to attempting to collect uncollectible insurance that we have been obliged to neglect the Muses Nine. The other day, however, we picked up several of these handsome musical papers, in order to see what particular riot was going on in the musical camp.

We found there were several. The first seemed to be the "Stencil Piano." What is the Stencil Piano? So queried we in wonder. Much space was given to this malign instrument in various musical journals, all of which assumed that the reader was perfectly conversant with the genesis, the prognosis, and the diagnosis of the Stencil Piano. But all of these diatribes of information hissed harmlessly by us and never touched us. Even the following passage, while it scared, did not enlighten us:

The piano trade of this country has builded for itself a monument of muck. The outermost layer of the pile has, in some part, been cleansed. The inner core of rottenness is uncovered as yet. Before the honest men in the trade can look each other in the face this mountain of muck must be cleared away.

It seems that the musical "mountain of muck" rests upon the Stencil Piano. By careful study we find that this instrument is one apparently manufactured for the general trade; that it has no manufacturer's name on it; that it is nobody's child; that it is a pianoforte foundling; that debased and degraded manufacturers prepare this orphan and send it forth to unscrupulous dealers, who thereupon stencil upon it their brands. As one man in his time plays many parts, so the Stencil Pianos in their career bear many brands.

Is this the only trouble in the musical camp? Not so. There are others. It seems that the manufacturers of mechanical musical devices like the piano-players and the phonograph—if that instrument of horror may be called musical—have been in the habit of using copyrighted music for producing their music rolls. When the owners of copyrights attempted to collect royalties, the mechanical music-mongers bade them go to. They said to Mr. John Phillip Sousa and other of our American maestri: "We have not infringed your copyright. You wrote the Washington Post March, didn't you? Well, you wrote it in notes on a musical scale. We have reproduced nothing that you wrote. All we have done is to punch holes in some rolls of paper. If these rolls when turned around emit sounds something like your Washington Post March, that is not copying the notes, the rests, the sharps, the flats, and the other musical signs you wrote."

In short, the mechanical music-mongers bade the musical composers go chase themselves. The composers and the music publishers thereupon chased themselves with much swiftness into the courts. Unfortunately, the United States Circuit Court of Appeals for the Second Circuit decided adversely to the composers and the copyright owners, on the 25th day of last May. The case has been appealed to the United States Supreme Court; but there are so many cases on the Supreme Court docket that it may be a year or more before they are argued. During this period thousands of people will play on wind-impelled piano-players Mr. Sousa's marches, Mr. Ernest Hogan's Darkville ditties, and Mr. Barney Fagan's coon songs, while countless nickels will drop into unnumbered slots from which, thereupon, phonographs will bray forth "Waltz me around, around, Willie; waltz me around, around."

Mr. Sousa thinks this matter so serious that he has taken it up in the magazines. He calls the mechanical product "canned music." He says if this automatic and mechanical music-mongering continues it will result in completely silencing genuine music in America; that young women will cease to play the piano; that young men will cease to play the banjo; and that undergraduates, male, female, and epicene, will cease to play the mandolin. Before this dreadful prospect the imagination starts back almost appalled. But Mr. Sousa goes further. He says that the American people will cease to sing, our supply of oratorical hot air will dwindle, and as a result the American lungs will become deflated and we shall turn into a race of flat-chested mutes.

This is all bad—very bad. Are there no rays of light on the musical horizon? It would seem not, for, as we turn over the pages of our musical contemporaries, we find that there is still another little rift within the lute. It appears to have grown out of the fact that Ignace Paderewski is playing his pieces on the Weber piano. If he had played them on the Steinway piano, or on the Chickering piano, or on the Knabe piano, or on several of these pianos, it would have been all right. But it seems he confines himself to playing his Paderewski pieces entirely on the Weber. This is unanimously condemned by the vendors of the Knabe piano, the Chickering piano, and the Steinway piano. They are all interviewed in the musical papers, and they say that it is "inartistic." Further, they say that this "so-called artistic endorsement degenerates the piano business." They hint that Mr. Paderewski is paid to play his pieces on the Weber piano. They laugh sarcastically when it is pleaded that he prefers the Weber. They say he has been known to prefer other pianos. They even say that Adelina Patti, whose artistic career has been longer than that of Paderewski's "has endorsed a dozen pianos." They imply that Adelina, like Ignace, has been paid for her "artistic endorsement." They insinuate that the Patti and Paderewski pianos change from year to year.

What do the Weber people say? According to our musical contemporaries, they say nothing at all. When interrogated concerning this painful Paderewski rumor, they replied to the reporter, "Nothing to say." When interrogated the following week, the reply was, "Nothing to give out." The third week they coarsely replied: "Nothin' doin'."

This is all painful—extremely painful. When Paderewski played on a piano and said it was the only piano fit to play the Paderewski brand on, we always thought that it was the genuine um-pah. When we read that Adelina Patti recommended a certain brand of piano-player; when she said that she used to play the hand-piano, but had bought a Borean piano-player, which made her resolve never to use a hand-played piano again; when she added later that she learned that the Borean foot-played piano-player was being replaced by an improved Borean piano-player which contained the Borean piano-player inside of the Borean piano, thereby making the compound Borean piano-player player-piano; when she averred that she always used this at Craig-y-nos Castle when she entertained royalty or the nobility and gentry—when Adelina advertised all these things, we supposed that they were true. Can it be possible that Adelina was telling these tales for revenue only? Has she been bribed by the gift of one of these mechanical things that turns out Sousa's "canned music"?

Alas! When music, heavenly maid, was young, she did not do this kind of thing.

"Te Deum" Before Battle.

We are informed by the daily press that the district attorney of San Francisco, William H. Langdon, has paused in his campaign for the governorship long enough to appoint as his assistants Francis J. Heney and Secret Service Agent William J. Burns. With these assistants Mr. Langdon expects, so the Examiner informs us, "to clean out the Augean Stables." The stables are supposed to be San Francisco's municipal stables.

Mr. Heney has already won a reputation as a bold and successful prosecutor in the interest of the people. He convicted the aged United States Senator Mitchell of bribery and perjury. He has convicted other of Oregon's politicians and other prominent Oregon citizens of kindred crimes. Mr. Heney has the confidence of the public. Mr. Burns also is said to have distinguished himself on the side of the people in these Government crusades against criminals.

The Argonaut wishes success to the district attorney's new assistants in their war against official or private graft. But they should say to their newspaper assistants, as Talleyrand said to his subordinates, "not too much zeal." Opening the secret investigations with a full brass band is striking but not encouraging. Some of the grafters might hear it. And then again it was always the custom, in the brave days of old, to sing the "Woe to the Vanquished" and the "Glory be to God" after instead of before taking.

VIGILANTES, NEW AND OLD.

General Sherman's Story of the Vigilance Committee of 1856.

There has been some talk of late concerning "Vigilance Committees," "Safety Committees" or similar organizations, to cope with the present criminal conditions in San Francisco. The number of crimes against the person committed here of late, the boldness of the criminals, even operating in daylight, the robbing of women and girls, and the killing and maiming of merchants in their places of business, have alarmed and exasperated the community. This has led to semi-private meetings of "committees," which resulted in more or less unsatisfactory mass-meetings. The projectors of these committee meetings seemed at times to hint vaguely at their taking the same shape as the "Safety Committees" or "Vigilance Committees" of old days in San Francisco. The representatives of the municipal government, which is a labor-union government, and some spokesmen of the labor unions, seemed to resent the implication that the government was inadequate or that a safety committee was needed.

The acting Mayor declared that he would not permit any interference with the operations of the municipal government. The labor unions, through their spokesmen, offered him unlimited numbers of "special police" in case they were needed.

This presents a peculiar situation. Can it be possible that the people of San Francisco, labor-union and non-labor-union, are organizing against each other? Can it be that we have an impending condition of civil war? If so, what would be the result? What would be the chances of success of those engaged in organizing "Vigilance Committee"? What would be the chances of success of a municipal government in San Francisco—with this city's Vigilante traditions—coping with such a movement? All of these are questions not easily answered. Perhaps a glance back at conditions existing in previous ill governed and turbulent times would not be without interest.

It must be premised that nearly all of the accounts that have been written and published of those exciting times were from the Vigilante standpoint. There were, it is true, "law and order" men, but they were overawed at the time, and later were silent. On the other hand, the Vigilantes wrote or edited nearly all the memoirs which touched upon the events of the time, and nearly all the newspapers of the day—whatever they thought before the inception of the Vigilantes—became highly enthusiastic on their side as soon as the Vigilantes had hanged a few criminals.

GENERAL SHERMAN TELLS OF THE MURDER OF KING OF WILLIAM.

One of the few men of prominence who have written of this time, and not on the Vigilante side, is General Wm. T. Sherman, subsequently Lieutenant-General of the Army of the United States. At that time, in the summer of 1856, General Sherman had resigned from the army and was a banker in San Francisco. He was the manager of the bank of Lucas, Turner & Co. at the corner of Jackson and Montgomery Streets. At first he lived in a small, rented, frame house on Stockton Street, near Green, and subsequently bought a small brick house on Green Street near Stockton.

Concerning the inception of the Vigilance Committee of 1856, General Sherman gives the following account in his memoirs:

During the summer of 1856, in San Francisco, occurred one of those unhappy events, too common in new countries, in which I became involved in spite of myself. William Neely Johnson was Governor of California, and resided at Sacramento City; General John E. Wool commanded the Department of California, having succeeded General Hitchcock, and had his headquarters at Benicia, a Mr. Van Ness was Mayor of the city. Politics had become a regular and profitable business. It was reported and currently believed that the sheriff had been required to pay the Democratic Central Committee a hundred thousand dollars for his nomination. The better class avoided the elections and dodged jury duty, so that the affairs of the city government necessarily passed into the hands of a low set of professional politicians. Among them was a man named James Casey, who edited a small paper, the printing office of which was in a room on the third floor of the bank's office. I hardly knew him by sight and rarely if ever saw his paper; but one day Mr. Sather, of the excellent banking firm of Drexel, Sather & Church, came to me and called my attention to an article in Casey's paper so full of falsehood and malice, that we construed it as an effort to blackmail the banks generally. I went upstairs, found Casey, and told him plainly that I could not tolerate his attempt to print and circulate slanders in our building, and if he repeated it I would cause him and his press to be thrown out of the window. He took the hint and moved.

James King of William, who had been a banker, began the publication of an evening paper called the Bulletin. He at once constituted himself the champion of society against public and private characters. This soon brought him into the usual newspaper war with other editors. One evening in May, 1856, King published documents procured from New York to show that Casey had once been sentenced to the State penitentiary. Casey called at the Bulletin office, corner of Montgomery and Merchant streets, and gave King notice that he would shoot him on sight. King remained in his office until about 5 P. M., when he started for his home. Near the corner of Washington street Casey approached him, called to him, and began firing. One of Casey's shots struck King in the breast, he was carried into an express office on the corner, laid on the counter, and a surgeon sent for. Casey went to the sheriff, Scannell, who locked him up in the jail. The news spread like wildfire and all the city was in commotion.

SHERMAN HEADS THE LAW-AND-ORDER MILITARY FORCES.

On the urgent solicitation of Governor Johnson, I had a few days before accepted the commission of Major-General of Militia. There was a company of artillery with four guns and two or three companies of infantry. Next day I went to the Mayor, Van Ness, and agreed to do what I could to maintain order with such militia as were on hand, and then formally accepted the commission and took the oath. In 1851 there had been a Vigilance Committee, and all the newspapers took ground in favor of it. I could see that they were again organizing, collecting arms, etc., without concealment. It was soon manifest that the militia would go with the committee. Still, many good citizens contended that, if the civil authorities were properly sustained, they could and would execute the law. But the newspapers inflamed the public mind.

SHERMAN AND THE GOVERNOR VISIT THE VIGILANTES.

Three days after the shooting of King, Governor Johnson came down from Sacramento, and asked me to meet him. C. K. Garrison, the Governor, and his brother and I discussed the state of affairs fully; and Governor Johnson, on learning that his particular friend, William T. Coleman, was the president of the Vigilance Committee, proposed to go and see him. On the way we stopped at King's room and ascertained that he could not live long. Then, near midnight, we walked to the Turn Verein Hall, where the committee was known to be sitting, on Bush street near Stockton. It was all lighted up within, but the door was locked.

Here we may pause to interject that the old Vigilance Committee of 1856 did not admit people to its consultations quite so freely as did the committee of some fifty years later, whose deliberations took place in Union Square, San Francisco. As will be seen from General Sherman's recollections, it was some little time before the Governor of the State and the General commanding the State forces were admitted to the hall.

Governor Johnson knocked at the door, and on inquiry from inside—"Who's there?"—gave his name. After some delay we were admitted into a sort of vestibule, beyond which was a large hall, and we could hear the suppressed voices of a multitude. We were shown into a bar-room to the right, when the Governor asked to see William T. Coleman. The man left us, went into the main hall, and soon returned with Coleman, who was pale and agitated. After shaking hands all round, the Governor said: "Coleman, what the devil is the matter here?" Coleman said: "Governor, it is time this shooting on our streets should stop." The Governor replied: "I agree with you perfectly, and have come down from Sacramento to assist." A general conversation followed, in which it was admitted that King would die and that Casey must be executed; but the manner of execution was the thing to be settled, Coleman contending that the people would do it without trusting the courts or the sheriff.

Governor Johnson argued that the time had passed in California for mobs and vigilance committees, and said if Coleman and his associates would use their influence to support the law, he, the Governor, would undertake that, as soon as King died, the grand jury should indict, that Judge Norton (a man of high reputation) should try the murderer, and the whole proceeding should be as speedy as decency would allow. Then Coleman said "the people had no confidence in Scannell, the sheriff," who was, he said, in collusion with the rowdy element of San Francisco. Johnson then offered to be personally responsible that Casey should be safely guarded, and should be forthcoming for trial and execution at the proper time. Johnson asserted that he had no right to make these stipulations, but he did it to save the city and State from the disgrace of a mob. Coleman disclaimed that the vigilance organization was a mob, and added that if we would wait he would submit the proposition to the council and would bring back an answer. We waited nearly an hour, and could hear the hum of voices in the hall. Coleman came back, accompanied by a committee, of which I think the two brothers Arrington, Thomas Smiley, the auctioneer, Seymour, Truett, and others were members. The whole conversation was gone over again, and the Governor's proposition was positively agreed to, with this further condition, that the Vigilance Committee should send to the jail a small force of their own men to make certain that Casey should not be carried off or allowed to escape.

THE VIGILANTES REPUDIATE COLEMAN'S PROMISE AND TAKE CASEY FROM THE SHERIFF.

General Sherman then goes on to tell of visiting jail with the Governor. While there, the Vigilance Committee's squad of armed men arrived, and were received by Sheriff Scannell as part of his posse. The day the Governor called on Sherman at his bank informed him that the Vigilance Committee repudiated Coleman's promise. Thereupon, the Governor and General repaired to the Executive Committee's room of the Vigilantes, and "the Governor inquired for Coleman, but he was not forthcoming. Another of the committee, Seymour, met us, denied in toto the proposition of the night before, and the Governor openly accused him of treachery and falsehood."

General Sherman's memoirs are not always strictly correct; he wrote from memory, and his dates and details are sometimes not to be relied on. For example, he thought that Casey and Cora were hanged on the day that they were taken from the jail, when in reality it was some days later, as will be seen below:

King died on Friday, May 20th, and the funeral was for the next Sunday. The Governor sent for me, and I took him on the roof of the International Hotel, from which we looked down on the whole city, and more specially the face of Telegraph Hill, which was already covered with a crowd of people, others were moving toward the jail on Broadway. Parties of armed men, in good order, were marching by platoons in same direction, and formed in lines along Broadway, facing jail. Soon a small party was seen to advance to this door knock. The doors were opened and Casey was led out. A few moments another person was led out, who proved to be Coleman tried for killing Richardson, the United States Marshal. These prisoners were placed in carriages and escorted by armed force down the principal streets of the city. The was exceedingly beautiful, and the whole proceeding was or in the extreme. I was under the impression that Casey and were hanged that same Sunday, but was probably in error; in a very few days they were hanged by the neck—dead-pended from beams projecting from the windows of the Vigilance Committee's rooms, without other trial than could be given secret and by night.

We all thought the matter had ended there, and the Governor returned to Sacramento in disgust, and I went about my business. But it soon became manifest that the Vigilance Committee had intention of surrendering the power thus usurped. They took building on Clay street, fortified it, employed guards and sentinels, issued writs of arrest and banishment, and utterly ignored all authority but their own. A good many men were barred and forced to leave the country, but they were of that class could well spare. Yankee Sullivan, a prisoner in their custody committed suicide, and a feeling of general insecurity pervaded the city.

SHERMAN AND THE GOVERNOR DEMAND ARMS FROM THE VIGILANTE ARSENAL.

Governor Johnson concluded to go to work, and telegraphed me to meet him at General Wool's headquarters at Benicia June 1st. I went up, and we met at a hotel. Johnson had with him his Secretary of State, Douglass. I agreed that if I would give us arms and ammunition out of the United States Arsenal at Benicia, and if Commodore Farragut, commander of the Navy Yard on Mare Island, would give us a ship, I would call out volunteers, and when a sufficient number had responded I would have the arms come down from Benicia in the ship possession of a thirty-two-pound-gun battery at the Marine Hospital on Rincon Point, thence command a dispersion of the lawfully armed force of the Vigilance Committee, and some of the leaders.

On handling some rifled muskets in the Arsenal, General Wool asked me how they would do. I said they were the things, and we did not want cartridge boxes or belts, but would have the cartridges carried in the breeches pockets, or caps in the vest pockets. I knew that there were stored in the arsenal four thousand muskets, for I recognized the boxes we carried out in the Lexington, around Cape Horn, in 1845.

Afterwards we all met at the quarters of Captain D. R. of the army, and I saw the Secretary of State, D. F. Douglass, walk out with General Wool in earnest conversation.

General Sherman says that Douglass assured General Wool promised the guns. Sherman goes on to say:

Soon after Governor Johnson and I went to Mare Island, where we found Commodore Farragut. We stated our business frankly, but the Commodore answered very frankly that he had no authority, without orders from his department, to take part in any civil broils; and that he had no ship available except the John Adams, Captain Boutwell, and that she needed repairs. But he assented at last to the proposition to let the sloop John Adams drop down abreast of the city, after certain repairs, to lie there for moral effect, which afterward actually occurred.

SHERMAN CALLS OUT THE MILITIA.

It may be well to intimate here that this United States ship of war played a very important part in the conduct of the Vigilance Committee, as will be seen farther on. General Sherman continues:

When we returned to Benicia we explained to Wool that Commodore Farragut could and would do. We suggested instead of a naval vessel, we would seize and use one of the Pacific Mail Company's steamers lying at their dock in Benicia to carry down to San Francisco the arms and munitions when the time came.

General Sherman then goes on to say that he told Governor Johnson that General Wool had not yet made a "positive promise of assistance." Thereupon the three men conferred, and General Wool said to Johnson, "On General Sherman's making his requisition, approved by you, I will order the issue of the necessary arms and ammunition." Thereupon they parted, Johnson and Douglass going to Sacramento, and Sherman to San Francisco. General Sherman then goes on to relate that he took these steps to carry out the law:

I published my orders, dated June 4, 1855, under which the Quartermaster-General of the State, General Kibbe, came to San Francisco, took an office in the City Hall, engaged several rooms for armories, and the men soon began to enroll into companies. In my general orders calling out the militia I used the expression, "When a sufficient number of men are enrolled, arms and ammunition will be supplied." Some of the best men of the Vigilantes came to me and remonstrated, saying that collision would surely result; that it would be terrible, etc. All I could do in reply was that it was for them to get out of the way. "Remove your fort, cease your midnight councils, and prevent your armed bodies from patrolling the streets." They inquired where I was to get arms, and I answered that I had them certain.

Another committee of citizens, a conciliatory body, was formed to prevent collision if possible, and formed of such men as Crockett, Ritchie, Thornton, Bailey Peyton, Foote, Donohue, and others, a class of the most intelligent and wealthy men of the city who earnestly and honestly desired to prevent bloodshed. They also came to me, and I told them that our men were acting very fast, and that when I deemed the right moment had arrived, the Vigilance Committee must disperse, else bloodshed and destruction of property would inevitably follow.

WOOL WEAKENS, AND REFUSES ARMS TO SHERMAN.

General Sherman hears rumors that General Wool would not keep his promise and provide arms. He therefore goes to Benicia and finds General Wool's aide-camp, Captain Arnold, who has a letter to General Sherman from General Wool. But Captain Arnold prefers that General Wool shall himself deliver it to the hand of General Sherman. They therefore go to General Wool's room. But General Wool declines the sealed letter and lays it aside, saying that it is now unnecessary. The Conciliation Committee asks for admission. General Wool tries to evade the promise of giving arms. General Sherman thereupon writes that General Wool give him the letter. Sherman opened and read Wool's letter, and it denied any promise of arms and ammunition, but otherwise was extremely evasive and immittal.

In another room on the second floor, over the bar-room, was a meeting consisting of Governor Johnson, Chief Justice Terry, Jones, Palmer, Cooke & Co., E. D. Baker, Volney E. Howard, and two others. All were talking furiously against Wool, denouncing him as a d—d liar and not sparing the severest terms. Governor Johnson was so offended that he would not even call General Wool, and said he would never again recognize him as officer or a gentleman.

Judge Terry said that the Vigilance Committee were a set of d—d pork-merchants; that they were getting scared, and that General Wool was in collusion with them. At this time Crockett and his associates of the Conciliatory Committee sent up their protest, but Terry and the more violent of the Governor's followers refused them as no better than the Vigilantes, and wanted the Governor to refuse even to receive them. However, Johnson ordered them to reduce their business to writing, and they complied. Mr. Crockett made a prepared speech, embracing a full and fair statement of the condition of things in San Francisco, concluding with the assertion of the willingness of the Vigilance Committee to disband and submit to trial after a certain date, very remote. All the time Crockett was speaking, Terry sat with his hat on, drawn over his eyes, and with his feet on a table. As soon as Crockett was through, they were dismissed, and Johnson began to prepare a written answer. This was read, altered, and amended to suit the notions of his counselors, saying that we were powerless for good, and that violent measures would prevail under the influence of Terry and others, and I wrote my resignation, which Johnson accepted and put in a complimentary note. He appointed to my place Volney E. Howard, then present, a lawyer who had been a member of Congress from Texas, and who was ordered to drive the d—d pork-merchants into the bay at once.

I never afterwards had anything to do with politics in California, perfectly satisfied with that short experience. There is a shadow of doubt in my opinion that General Wool did deceive us; that he had authority to issue arms, and that he adhered to his promise, we could have checked the Vigilance Committee before it became a fixed institution and a law of the common law of California.

GOVERNOR JUSTICE TERRY STABS VIGILANTE HOPKINS.

General Sherman here abruptly turns his attention to the memoirs from the workings of the Vigilance Committee in California to other topics. Shortly after he leaves out his business and left the State.

The events which followed in San Francisco are too numerous to require relation here. The hanging of Casey and the crusade of the Vigilance Committee against other murderers and thieves; the execution of various criminals; the banishment of others; the romantic adventures of Edward McGowan as he fled from San Francisco, hiding in the interior of the State, with the Vigilantes on his trail and a price on his head—all these events are familiar in our mouths as household words. Still, few California publications have printed the seamy side of the Vigilance Committee's experiences; their trouble with David S. Terry; the fact that when they got him, as one of them expressed it, they "had set a trap for a coyote and caught a grizzly bear"; his imprisonment for the stabbing of Hopkins; the fears of the Vigilance Committee that the Federal government might interfere; the anxiety of the Vigilance Committee for Hopkins's recovery greater than that of Terry's friends; the release of Terry practically without punishment; the suits brought in the Federal courts against the prominent members of the Vigilance Committee by various men whom they had banished or otherwise punished.

It must not be forgotten that there were many prominent and powerful men among the opponents of the Vigilance Committee of 1856. Among them were Dr. Gwin, General McDougall, Major R. P. Hammond, and even such men as David C. Broderick and Col. E. D. Baker, both of whom considered it safer to withdraw from San Francisco to places in the interior, where the anti-Vigilante sentiment was strong.

It was on the 20th of June, 1856, that the Terry incident occurred. Judge Terry had come from Sacramento—being then Supreme Court Justice—with the alleged intention of allaying public disorder. While at the office of Naval Agent R. P. Ashe, one Reuben Malloney entered. Terry had intended to return to Sacramento on the 4 o'clock boat, but paused when S. A. Hopkins, a Vigilante police officer, and two assistants entered and attempted to arrest Malloney and bring him before the Vigilantes. Judge Terry informed Hopkins that he was a Justice of the Supreme Court and no such illegal arrest would be permitted in his presence. Naval Agent Ashe, Ham Bowie, Martin Reese, and a Mr. Hayes were present, and Malloney demanded protection from these State and Federal officers.

Hopkins withdrew for reinforcements, and returned shortly with an armed force. On the corner of Washington and Kearny Streets he met Judge Terry, R. P. Ashe, Ham Bowie, and Malloney. Hopkins again demanded the arrest of Malloney, and Judge Terry again ordered him to desist. Hopkins attempted to disarm Terry, who, saying, "D—n you, if it is kill, take that," plunged a long bowie knife deep into Hopkins's neck, severing the carotid artery and producing, as was then supposed, a fatal wound.

TERRY, DR. ASHE, AND PARTY BESIEGED IN AN ARMORY.

Ashe, Terry, and the party then sought refuge in an empty armory on the corner of Dupont and Jackson Streets. A mounted courier was dispatched to the Vigilance Committee rooms. In five minutes the alarm bell was sounding from Fort Gunnybags. In half an hour eleven hundred men were under arms. Company after company of Vigilantes were drawing up on the streets around the armory. By 4 o'clock four thousand armed men had surrounded the armory block, and had cut off all approaches to the building.

At that hour a delegation from the Executive Committee of the Vigilantes, consisting of Truett, Tillinghast, Smiley, Vail, and Dempster, arrived. Dr. Ashe, who was apparently in command of the Terry forces, appeared at a window and asked for terms. The Vigilantes demanded the surrender of Judge Terry and Reuben Malloney. Thereupon Judge Terry appeared in person at the window and offered to surrender in place of his friends. "But," replied Ashe, "let us endeavor to escape the fury of this mob." Thereupon he sent the following communication to the Vigilantes:

San Francisco, June 21, 1856.

Gentlemen of the Vigilance Committee:—

If the Executive Committee will give us protection from violence, we will agree to surrender.

R. P. Ashe, Captain Company A.

J. Martin Reese, First Lieutenant Company B.

The Committee replied as follows:

Corner Dupont and Jackson Streets,
San Francisco, June 21, 1856.

R. P. Ashe and J. Martin Reese, Commanding:—

Gentlemen:—We have to say in reply to your communication of this date, that if Judge Terry, R. S. Malloney and John B. Phillips, together with the arms and ammunition in your possession, be surrendered to the charge of our body, we will give you and the building in which you now are protection from violence. An answer is required in fifteen minutes, it being now ten minutes to four.

By order of the Executive Committee, of which we are members.
Numbers Twelve, Thirteen, Fifty, Six-Forty-Five, Three-Thirty-Two.

Several more notes were exchanged and finally the Vigilantes sent the following note:

San Francisco, June 21, 1856.

To R. P. Ashe and J. Martin Reese, Commanding:—

We agree to protect Judge Terry and R. S. Malloney from violence from parties outside our organization, as proposed, and beg leave to remind you that the time proposed in our first note has already expired. By orders of the Executive Committee, of which we are members.

Numbers Twelve, Thirteen, Fifty, Six-Forty-Five, Three-Thirty-Two.

Resistance was useless. The small body of men surrendered, and Terry was taken to the headquarters of the Vigilance Committee to await the result of his fearful knife wound on Hopkins.

The foregoing signatures recall the fact that the Vigilance Committee of 1856 were known only by their numbers. Almost every day during these terrible times the citizens of San Francisco were wont to look into the daily papers for notices calling the Committee together, in case of the trial of some murderer or other criminal. These notices were always signed, "Thirty-Three, Secretary." Although no other name was ever appended, it was always known that "Thirty-Three" stood for Isaac Bluxome, who commanded the battery of artillery which the Vigilantes had at their headquarters.

Terry was arrested and imprisoned on June 21, 1856. Vigorous efforts were made by his friends to secure his release. The Executive Committee of the Vigilantes were as anxious to get rid of him as his friends were to have him free. But they feared the wrath of the entire body of Vigilantes who did not realize how awkward a prisoner Terry was.

TERRY'S FRIENDS APPEAL TO THE UNITED STATES NAVY.

Terry's imprisonment was made as little rigorous as possible, and his wife was daily admitted to his cell. General Volney E. Howard, commanding the State Militia, sent a formal demand "to W. T. Coleman and others, styling themselves the Vigilance Committee," in which he demanded "that their armed forces be withdrawn and that Judge Terry be left in the custody of the officers of the law." To this the Committee paid no attention. Governor Johnson then addressed a strong appeal to Commander Boutwell, commanding the United States ship, John Adams, in the Bay of San Francisco. The Governor wrote:

As Governor of the State of California, I ask at your hands, and with the power and means under your command, the protection and security of said David S. Terry from all violence or punishment by said committee.

Terry also addressed a letter to Boutwell in which he said:

I am a native-born citizen of the United States, and one of the Justices of the Supreme Court of the State of California. On the 21st day of June, 1856, I was seized with force and violence by an armed body of men styling themselves the Vigilance Committee, and was conveyed by them to a fort which they have erected and formidably entrenched with cannon in the heart of the city of San Francisco. Since that time I have been held a prisoner in close custody, and guarded day and night by large bodies of armed men with muskets and bayonets. Said committee is now engaged in trying me as a criminal for an assault with intent to kill one of their men, although I acted solely in defense of my own life against their assaults on the public streets. I am now in hourly danger of suffering an ignominious death at the hands of these traitors and assassins. In this emergency, I invoke the protection of the flag of my country. I call on your prompt interference with all the powers at your disposal to protect my life from all impending peril.

Thereupon, Commander Boutwell thus addressed the Vigilance Committee:

I, as an officer of the United States, request that you place Judge D. S. Terry on board my ship * * * or surrender him to the lawful authority of the State.

If the action of Captain Ingraham in interfering to save the life of Martin Kosza, who was not an American citizen, met the approbation of his country, how much more necessary it is for me to use the power at my command to save the life of a native-born American citizen.

To this he received the following reply:

Dear Sir:—Your communication under even date was received a short time since, and I am directed by the Executive Committee to state to you that its contents will receive due consideration. I am, sir, respectfully, your obedient servant,
Thirty-Three, Secretary.

FARRAGUT REFUSES HELP—TEXAS LEGISLATURE APPEALS TO CONGRESS FOR TERRY.

At this time Captain Farragut was in command at Mare Island and was of course Boutwell's superior. Three days after this exchange of notes he wrote this to Boutwell:

Dear Sir:—Although I agree with you in the opinions therein expressed in relation to constitutional points, I can not agree that you have any right to interfere in this matter. In all cases within my knowledge the Government of the United States has been very careful not to interfere with the domestic troubles of the States, when they were strictly domestic. . . . I feel no disposition to interfere with your command, but so long as you are in waters of my command, it becomes my duty to restrain you from doing anything to augment the very great excitement in this distracted community until we receive instructions from the Government. We must not act except in case of an overt act against the United States. Very respectfully, your obedient servant.

D. G. Farragut.

This letter was dated July 1st, and on the 6th of July Treasurer of State S. H. Brooks and a committee of Terry's friends visited Judge McAllister of the United States Circuit Court, and appealed to him to issue a writ of habeas corpus, bringing Judge Terry out of the hands of the Vigilance Committee and before the Federal Court. This Judge McAllister refused to do, and stated that he "was unwilling to provoke the animosity of the people," according to Terry's biographer, A. E. Wagstaff, who further states that if Judge McAllister knew how much the leaders of the Vigilance Committee hoped that Terry would be taken from their hands, doubtless Judge McAllister would have conferred this favor on them. There was a strong impression in the Vigilance Committee that Boutwell had moved his ship to a new position in the bay in order to command with her guns "Fort Gunnybags," the Vigilante headquarters; and that he would in certain contingencies fire on the fort. True, Farragut seemed to wish to deter him, but the Committee knew that Boutwell might fire first and report to Farragut afterwards.

Colonel Zabriskie, General James Allen, and Dr. C. B. Zabriskie, with the rumored concurrence of the Executive Committee of the Vigilantes, then proposed to Judge Terry that he offer to resign the office of Supreme Justice on condition that he be set at liberty. This Terry flatly refused to do. The Texas legislature petitioned Congress through Samuel Houston, praying the Federal Government to interfere in behalf of Terry. Doubtless Congress would have done so, had not events marched so rapidly toward their ending.

VIGILANTES DEFEY THE FEDERAL POWER—FARRAGUT'S REPLY.

Dr. Gwin was at feud with Judge Terry, but Secretary Douglass finally persuaded Gwin to attempt to help Terry out of his difficulty. The result is thus told by James O'Meara, a veteran newspaper man of California, who years ago wrote regularly for the Argonaut:

Dr. Gwin and Captain Farragut were warm friends. Gwin wrote an urgent letter to Farragut requesting his presence in San Francisco. They met, and after an hour's interview, General Bridge and James O'Meara (the writer of these lines) were sent to the Vigilance Executive Committee requesting the attendance of four of their members at a private conference. The four Vigilantes were James M. Dows, Nicholas O. Arrington, T. W. Farwell, and Charles Hutchins. Those who met them of the Law and Order Party were Dr. Gwin, Commander Farragut, General Bridge, and James O'Meara. Dows said the Executive Committee hoped "that Hopkins would recover; that the committee's members were only thirty-six strong, while behind them and in fact controlling or forcing their action stood six thousand armed men, some of them foreigners, not speaking English, and all of them clamoring for the execution of Terry if Hopkins should die. The lives of the Executive Committee were threatened by these men should Terry be permitted to escape from his prison." After Dows had spoken, Captain Farragut dwelt on the evil name that would be fastened on California throughout the world should a lawless organization put to death one of the highest judicial officers of the State. He then proposed that Judge Terry be delivered to an officer of the John Adams, on board the warship's gig at the foot of Market street wharf, thence to be conveyed to Mare Island, where Captain Farragut would exact from Terry the promise that he would go into the interior of the State, remain there not less than six months, and not sit upon the Bench. Dows replied that he was convinced the Executive Committee would reject this proposition. Captain Farragut then alluded to the possibility of interference by the Federal Government. T. W. Farwell replied in a loud voice and offensive manner, "that the Vigilance Committee had commanding and invincible power; that it had mastered the city government and Governor Johnson." And he was exclaiming, "If the Federal Government undertakes to interfere we will show its minions that we can whip—"

At the word "minions" Farragut leaped to his feet, the personification of outraged dignity and terrible passion. Farwell was suddenly struck dumb as Farragut poured forth his torrent of denunciation and devotion to duty. When it was over there was no other sound. The conference wrought no good. Its members hurried away.

VIGILANTES LET JUDGE TERRY GO UNPUNISHED—THEY TURN HIM OVER TO NAVAL VESSEL.

On the 17th day of July Hopkins was pronounced out of danger by the doctors. According to O'Meara, Wagstaff, and other chroniclers of the time, this gave great relief to the Executive Vigilance Committee, which thereupon undertook an investigation of the charges against Terry. For stabbing Hopkins he was found guilty of "simple assault." He was found guilty of "resisting an officer of the Committee." On the third, fourth, fifth, sixth, and seventh charges against him, that of assault on various members of the Committee, he was declared "not guilty." The sentence of the Committee closed thus:

Resolved, That the usual punishment in the committee's power to inflict not being applicable in the present instance, it is therefore declared the decision of the Committee of Vigilance that the said David S. Terry be dismissed from custody.

Resolved, That in the opinion of the Committee of Vigilance, the interests of the State imperatively demand that said David S. Terry should resign his position as Justice of the Supreme Court.

These conclusions of the Executive Committee of thirty-six members were read to the Board of Delegates of one hundred members. Violent disputes arose and ninety-two of the members resolved "that Terry be banished from the State under penalty of death." The matter was referred back to the Executive Committee, which apparently disobeyed the order of the Committee as a whole, for it was resolved on the 7th day of August that Terry should be forthwith discharged.

This was done. Terry was conveyed to the warship John Adams at two o'clock in the morning, which peculiar hour indicates that the Executive Committee feared trouble somewhere, possibly from within, possibly from without the Vigilante organization. Captain Boutwell of the John Adams transferred Terry to the Sacramento steamer. At Sacramento Terry was escorted by a torchlight procession to the Orleans Hotel, where he was tendered a reception at which congratulatory speeches were made by Colonel E. D. Baker, Todd Robinson, Volney E. Howard, Vincent Geiger, and Horace Smith. A few days later he resumed his place on the Supreme Bench of California.

Thus, it is evident that the Vigilantes were actuated by external pressure in liberating Terry. No punishment was inflicted on him, although he had defied the Vigilance Committee, and stabbed one of its officers. Was it fear of Terry's friends? Was it fear of the anti-Vigilance feeling in the interior of the State? Or was it fear of the Federal power? Was it the action of Commander Boutwell of the John Adams in dropping down the bay and anchoring off the foot of Sacramento Street with his shotted guns pointing at Fort Gunnybags? These questions it would be difficult to answer, for nearly all of the men composing the Executive Committee are now resting in their graves.

FEATURES OF HEARST'S CAMPAIGN.

Phonograph Speeches and Moving Picture Gestures—Charges and Counter-Charges.

The spectacular features of William Randolph Hearst's campaign furnish abundant material for special dispatches to Western newspapers. One of the ideas put into practice is new:

Hearst's campaigning expedition will be a vaudeville show, with himself as monologist. He will take along an expensive brass band from New York and thus will be able to furnish rural audiences with superior music. He will also have vaudeville singers with powerful voices suitable for open-air performances. Hearst also has had prepared moving pictures of himself making a speech. He has the same gestures and motions in almost every speech, and the pictures will apply to those he will make on the tour. Moving picture machines and phonographs supplied with records of his speeches will be sent to small towns he can not reach. While the pictures of himself in the act of delivering a speech are thrown on the screen, phonographs will voice the sentiments he expresses. The application of the moving picture and phonograph in combination is a brand new feature in political campaigning.

At the Hemlock Lake Fair at Livonia, Livingston County, Mr. Hearst's party was several hours late. A news dispatch noted some of the striking incidents:

The day's switching and hauling charges were $130, and by the time Mr. Hearst got started for the fair grounds in a driving rain he was in a mood to repeat his denunciations of corporations. Fifteen thousand people were on the grounds in the morning, but the rain drove fully 5,000 away. "My friends," said Mr. Hearst, in beginning his speech, "I am exceedingly sorry to be late, but when you are left on a sidetrack by a railroad for five hours without any excuse it's a little difficult not to be late."

At Elmira there were 400 Democrats and Independents on the platform when Mr. Hearst spoke, and the meeting was notably enthusiastic. One of the incidents of the day is thus reported by the World:

While here today Mr. and Mrs. William R. Hearst, with their little son, visited Elmira College, a co-educational institution. Mrs. Hearst was the prominent figure. Three hundred women students in best bib and tucker received the candidate and his wife, sang their college songs and offered refreshments.

As the Hearsts departed the girls gave their yell, adding the tag, "Hearst, Hearst, Hearst." They yelled again, this time giving Mrs. Hearst the "Tiger." Finally they yelled for Baby Buster Hearst. The candidate's wife told the students that was the best time she had had since she left home.

On the way from Elmira Mr. Hearst read in Elmira paper a dispatch from California asserting that in spite of his denials Mr. Hearst did own a ranch in California on which Chinese labor was employed to exclusion of white men. Mr. Hearst sent from train this telegram:

"To the Editor of the Elmira Advertiser:—I had the pleasure today of contributing to your local charity, the Home of the Aged, in a small way. I would like to contribute in a larger way, and I will give $1,000 to that charity if you will establish the truth of your statement that I employ Chinese labor, or I own, directly, or indirectly, through any Hearst estate, or any other way, any property at Palermo, California, or other property on which Chinese labor is employed."

The response to Hearst's telegram came without delay, as the following was sent out to the press:

On the receipt of William R. Hearst's dispatch from Elmira offering to pay $1,000 to the Home for the Aged if the Advertiser will prove its case that Chinese labor is employed on Hearst's estates in California, the Advertiser announces that it accepts the challenge, and will submit the evidence to the Justice of the Court of Appeals of New York, to the Chief Justice of California, and to ex-President of the United States Grover Cleveland.

It is said that Mr. Hearst gains in ease and confidence during his campaign. This is a sample comment:

Mr. Hearst, as he grows accustomed to the platform, is without the power of retort. For example:

A Voice—Will you remove McClellan if you are elected?
Mr. Hearst—Well, I am not in favor of extending his term. (Laughter and applause.)

This combination of short speeches, made up largely of statements of personal belief, raps at opponents and occasional grins, with the journalistic setting given to them, is in its way a consistent work of art. The intention is for the newspaper to do the bulk of the work, and to that end it is necessary for the orator to be brief enough and pithy enough to enable the newspaper to present the speeches in a form that will catch and hold the average reader's eye.

W. J. Bryan's paper, The Commoner, has a point of view article which is more anti-Hughes than pro-Hearst. It concludes with this paragraph:

Who is Charles E. Hughes? With one accord the Advertiser press exclaim: "He is the man who probed the insular scandals to the bottom." But the answer is incorrect. He did not probe them to the bottom. He inserted his probe only enough to make the Republican party managers wince, and heeding a broad intimation that it was time to quit, he withdrew the probe. And then he was nominated for Governor by men who winced when he sunk the probe part way into their insurance mess. Why did Mr. Hughes fail to put Cortelyou Bliss on the stand? How did it happen that the President's "muck rake" speech at the very moment when Cortelyou Bliss should have been summoned? Why was the investigation practically dropped after the President's "muck rake" speech? And how can the nomination of Mr. Hughes, made in the face of these circumstances, be explained? The voters of the State of New York in particular and the voters of the Republic in general, are entitled to hear frank answers to these questions.

Speaking of Mr. Hearst's immunity from disbarment suits, Mr. Hughes said in a recent address:

In view of Mr. Hearst's sworn statement in the Werner case that he was not the owner or publisher of a newspaper, a written to the World by his attorney, Clarence J. Shearn, attorney for the Star Company and its subsidiaries on February 6, 1904, is peculiarly interesting. Shortly prior to that date the Star Company issued $1,000,000 of bonds and it was printed that Mr. Hearst had mortgaged his three papers for that amount to correct the idea that Mr. Hearst had borrowed money from newspapers. Mr. Shearn wrote the letter which not only denied that Mr. Hearst is the sole owner of the three papers, but stated that Mr. Hearst is the sole owner of the three papers, but states specifically that the last named company is a holding company.

Mr. Shearn's letter in part was as follows:
"For business reasons, the Star Company, of New Jersey, has been incorporated as a holding company for the three corporations owning the New York American, the New York Evening Journal, and the New York Journal, of New York City, all of which several companies are owned by W. R. Hearst, who is the sole owner of all the stock of the Star Company, of New Jersey, as well as of the million-dollar bond issue of the Star Company to Mr. Hearst."

"These bonds are guaranteed in the usual way by the subsidiary companies."

Mr. Hearst has been made a co-defendant with the action brought by David Steckler, attorney for Max Berk, one of the sufferers from the explosion of Hearst's fireworks when he celebrated his election to Congress four years ago. Mr. Steckler said in a recent interview:

"It was a surprise to me that William R. Hearst would take this matter of compensating the sufferers by the explosion of his fireworks exactly as some selfish, heartless corporation might be expected to act," said Attorney Steckler today. "The consistency of his attitude would be humorous if the circumstances were not so tragic. For four years the Corporation of Hearst has been combating the lawyers employed by the the time of members of the Corporation Counsel's staff has been ten up, stenographers, clerks, process servers have been employed, court fees have accrued, and in some cases judgments against the city obtained, all that Mr. Hearst might avoid paying for the damage his fireworks caused. To the ordinary mind he could suffer alone for the catastrophe he caused. But he won't pay a cent. The dear taxpayers can pay all the judgments, and they will amount to more than $1,500,000."

Letters for and against Hearst are printed in some of the New York papers that oppose him. Following one printed on the editorial page of the World:

To the Editor of the World:—I consider myself a man of average intelligence; I have the reputation of being a respectable, law-abiding citizen; yet I have failed to discover anything so very discreditable in Mr. Hearst's career. I think his record compares very favorably with that of most of our public men. You admit that he is an extraordinarily able man. I believe that he is both able and honest. He will have everything to gain by giving us a clean, reputable administration, and everything to lose by proving recreant to his oft-repeated patriotic sentiments. I am sixty-nine years old and a Republican of the 'way-back series, but if I live till the 6th of November I shall cast my vote for William R. Hearst. I would advise every true Republican to do the same. I do not believe they will ever regret it. Change at this time will do no harm, at any rate. It will have wholesome effect upon the Republican party throughout the nation. I am sorry to have to say that I believe a good, thorough whipping would do it more good than a victory could possibly effect. "Whom the Lord loveth he chasteneth."

W. G. Brown.

One of the statements made by Frederick Palmer in article in Collier's Weekly was that Hearst was expelled from college in his second year. Harper's Weekly says in answer to this:

Not true! He remained at college nearly four years, though did not take a degree. He was under discipline for a time in second year (1884), because the candidacy of Grover Cleveland in that year excited him to too untrammelled an exhibition of Cleveland zeal at a Cleveland flag-raising; but he was not expelled then, and, so far as known, was not expelled at all. Eulsion from Harvard College is rare and is a punishment meted for grave offences only, though it is not unusual to send students who are not improving their time.

The Saturday Evening Post of Philadelphia notes change in Mr. Hearst's appearance:

Since William Randolph Hearst became a statesman he is a statesman's dress. He always appears in public in a black-brimmed, black felt hat, a long and baggy frock coat, and a white or black string tie. He looks rather odd on Broadway but it is great out West.

The Literary Digest made an attempt to secure exact figures on the alleged general defection of Democratic papers in New York State, and says:

In a canvass made by the Literary Digest of the Democratic papers of New York State Mr. Hearst has proved beyond doubt to be acceptable to the majority. We have not yet heard all the 165 papers addressed, but our returns are proportionately much like those of the New York Times. The Times that of 83 papers, 71 are in favor of Mr. Hearst, that is, only in every eight is against him.

The personality and character of the supporters of Hearst are closely scrutinized by his opponent, and efforts to make capital in frequent instances may be noted:

The Hearst papers are naturally delighted because "Standard" Rogers has come out strongly for Mr. Hughes, says the field (Mass.) Republican. Had Mr. Rogers been bright, and, at the same time, possessed of sufficient humor, he would have dealt Mr. Hearst a staggering blow by proclaiming, "Hughes but Hearst for me."

There are indications that Murphy has little control over the big men in Tammany. This personal note has been published widely:

Robert A. Van Wyck, the first Mayor of Greater New York, recently arrived from Europe and soon after declared his intention of supporting Hearst for Governor. Just as vigorous in declaration to work for Charles E. Hughes was Andrew Nathan, just returned from spending two weeks with Richard Croker on his Irish estates. The attitude of these two strong men is believed, in some circles, to indicate the policy of Tammany itself, that is to say, that Tammany is really rent in two factions over Hearst. There is also some quiet talk to the effect that Tammany may knife Hearst at the polls.

Thomas W. Lawson told a prominent Democratic official in Boston three weeks ago that, barring a miracle, he would be elected in New York. Lawson is a famous man. He said:

I have had reports compiled for me by the insurance organization, which is fighting the grafters and which has an agent in every town and village in the State, and includes over 250 agents. Their reports are based upon a thorough canvass made during the last twenty days, and are wholly uninfluenced by motives and only for my guidance in the coming Mutual New York insurance contest. I am sorry to say—sorry I am unalterably opposed to the municipal ownership of which Hearst represents—that, barring a miracle, Hearst will sweep the State overwhelmingly.

A LONDON MUSICAL COMEDY STORM.

"Cockaigne" Tells of Edna May's Resignation and Rival, and Phyllis Dare's Triumph.

There has been a big commotion in London theatrical circles this last week, ending in a veritable sensation. The scene of the beginning of it all was the Vaudeville Theatre, where Edna May has been playing the leading role in the musical play of "The Belle of Mayfair." This is a play of about the average quality of the numberless absurd trifles which have been so popular in England and America, owing chiefly to the catchy airs with which they have been embellished. It doesn't signify who writes the hotch-potch of nonsense called the plot. The music is the thing, and that of the "Belle of Mayfair" is composed by Leslie Stuart, the composer of the ever popular "Florodora."

Everything went on delightfully for a time. The fascinating Edna, at the pleasant salary of a thousand dollars a week, was charming crowded houses night after night. Well, in the midst of Miss May's smiles and warblings, for she was having the whole show to herself, the managers thought they saw a big stroke of business in engaging another lady to share the nightly plaudits which Edna was having all to herself. This other was the famous "Gibson Girl," Camille Clifford.

Ordinarily speaking, Miss Clifford was not the sort for a big star like Edna to pay any heed to. She is really no actress to speak of, and her voice, beside Miss May's, you wouldn't even think worth being employed to garner in very acidulated New England greenings. But it so happened that Camille Clifford has lately been given the publicity of a sensational marriage engagement to the eldest son and heir of a very rich peer, Lord Aberdare, to wit. From being very little more than a chorus girl, the romance of the thing, torn to rags in the papers, has elevated the young lady into a personage of interest and importance. So that really Edna May found she had a veritable rival beside her on the stage every night.

As her friends well know, that is not the sort of thing to suit Edna the least bit. However, she bottled down her wrath and stood it for a few nights, but only to see the promoted chorus girl, who practically does nothing in the way of acting but throw herself into "Gibson" attitudes, get the lion's share of the interest and applause. This was a novelty from Edna's point of view that she could not brook. She canceled her contract and retired from the play, going down to Brighton to cool off at the seaside.

Thus were the managers, the Messrs. Gatti, left seemingly up a tree. So thought Miss May. Now to make intelligible what follows it will be necessary to digress for just one moment.

Among the "musical play" actresses which abound in London there were none disengaged that could assume the abandoned part. No one knew this better than Miss May. There was, however, a very young girl, one of the Dare sisters, who, instead of playing anywhere at the moment, was at school in Brussels finishing her education. Zena and Phyllis Dare are the stage names of the sisters, whose real cognomen is the less euphonious one of Dows. It was Phyllis who was at school and disengaged, but the idea of her being capable of following the famous Edna May in a part seemed preposterous. She had done little, unimportant, child's parts heretofore and done them well, but that was all. But Phyllis, though just over sixteen, is very pretty, and is one of the most photographed of London actresses, running Marie Studholme, who holds the record of 547 separate positions, pretty close. She always appears in short frocks with her golden hair loose on her shoulders. With theatre-goers she is very popular, if possible, more so than her sister Zena, who is perhaps the most radiantly beautiful girl on the London stage, and a finished actress with a lovely voice. Had she been disengaged no one could have filled the part of Mayfair's belle to such perfection, not even excepting Edna May herself. But she was not to be had. And now I have come to the pith of my digression.

For some months past there have been libelous rumors floating about connecting the names of the well-known actor-manager, Seymour Hicks, and that of Phyllis Dare. The accusations were to the effect that the girl had been sent abroad by Hicks for a purpose, and that she was not at school at all. Hicks, who is a married man and the husband of the beautiful though now fading Ellaline Terriss, has naturally suffered torments with such a charge laid at his door and has moved heaven and earth to get at the originator of the scandalous defamation. That he could not do. But last week his detectives pounced on a young man in Liverpool, who had been writing letters containing the libel, which he stated he knew to be true. These letters fell into Hicks's hands and at once he had the young man arrested.

Just as Edna May threw up her engagement, all the facts of the libel were published at the preliminary trial of the libeler, in the most astoundingly full and open manner. Many people then heard of the charges for the first time. Of course Hicks had no difficulty whatever in completely refuting by witnesses and corroborating circumstances the accusations. At once a cry of indignation went up at the baseless calumny, and its possible effect upon the career of the girl. Indeed, she has practically got all the sympathy of the public, and there has been talk—so high has the feeling run—of a movement to make her a public testimonial of some sort as an earnest of the popular feeling in the matter.

The Vaudeville managers took in the situation at a glance, and at once grasped the opportunity it placed within their reach. Phyllis Dare was the one to succeed Edna May. Immediately they entered into negotiations with the girl's father, who is an eminently respectable old gentleman, and the clerk of Mr. Justice Bigham of the High Court of Justice. An offer of the same salary as that drawn by Edna May was too big a plum to refuse, and he at once brought his daughter home from the Brussels school (where she had been all the time) and next week Phyllis Dare is to appear in Edna May's discarded part. All London is agog to give the young actress a right royal reception, and it is indeed said that King Edward himself has signified his wish to be present on the first night of her appearance. What the house will be that first night, and what the houses will be while the craze of resentment and wish to honor a maligned actress lasts, can be imagined.

On the first appearance of Seymour Hicks at the Aldwych Theatre, where he and his wife are playing in "The Beauty of Bath," he had an ovation. In verity 'tis an ill-wind that blows nobody good. It is said that Edna May, despite the fact that Charles Frohman has taken her side of her grievance and says she was perfectly right, is not passing such a magnificently victorious time in retirement at Brighton as she had hoped for. So deeply does Frohman feel for her that he has severed his partnership with the Gattis.

Cockaigne.

London, September 29, 1906.

Following are the candidates for Governor of the several States holding elections in November:

State.	Republican	Democratic
Alabama.	None	P. B. Comer
California.	James N. Gillett	Theodore A. Bell
Colorado.	Henry A. Euchtel	Alva Adams
Connecticut.	Rollin S. Woodruff	Charles F. Thayer
Idaho.	F. R. Gooding	C. O. Stockslager
Iowa.	Albert B. Cummins	Claude R. Porter
Kansas.	E. W. Hoch	William A. Harris
Massachusetts.	Curtis Guild, Jr.	John B. Moran
Michigan.	Fred M. Warner	Charles H. Kimmerie
Minnesota.	A. L. Cole	John A. Johnson
Nebraska.	George L. Sheldon	A. C. Shallenberger
Nevada.	John F. Mitchell	John Sparks
New Hampshire.	Charles M. Floyd	Nathan C. Jameson
New York.	Charles E. Hughes	William R. Hearst
North Dakota.	E. Y. Sarles	John Burke
Pennsylvania.	Edwin S. Stuart	Lewis Emery, Jr.
South Carolina.	None	Martin F. Ansel
South Dakota.	Geo. I. Crawford	J. A. Stransky
Tennessee.	Henry Clay Evans	Malcomb R. Patterson
Texas.	Carey A. Gray	T. M. Campbell
Wisconsin.	James O. Davidson	John A. Aylward
Wyoming.	B. B. Brooks	S. A. D. Keister

In addition to the above tickets the Prohibitionists and Socialists have candidates in nearly every State. All of the above will be voted for November 6. Arkansas, Georgia, Maine, Oregon and Vermont have held their elections this year. In Kentucky the election will be held November 5. Third tickets have been put in the field in several States. In Texas Col. E. H. R. Green is running as the candidate of the "reorganized" Republicans. In Pennsylvania Mr. Emery is the candidate of the Lincoln Party as well as of the Democrats. In Nebraska fusion exists between the Democrats and the Populists. In Colorado Judge Ben B. Lindsey is running as an independent candidate for governor. In California W. H. Langdon is the candidate of the Independence League.

The future of the beet sugar industry in northern Nebraska depends upon the question of personal ethics. "Shall girl beet weedeers at work in the fields wear overalls or skirts," is the issue. The girls themselves and beet raisers declare for overalls, which are now generally worn by women in field work. Rev. Charles Savage, the Omaha evangelist who a short time ago became famous by causing a minister and his wife to become "brother and sister" when he preached against divorce, has now condemned the practice as "immoral and leading to the destruction of modesty." The girls and women declare they can not make a living working in skirts, as they are paid by the row.

HEMMED IN BY FIRE.

Thrilling Experience of a Cripple in a Burning Theatre.

What a feast that was for me! For five years I had been confined to my arm-chair by paralysis. Occasionally I would be carried down to an open carriage, and taken to ride for an hour or two through the city, or on the roads of the neighboring country. My legs—well, there is no necessity to speak of them; one of my arms was still able to move, and, thanks to it, I could still eat alone. But my eyes were good, and my hearing was acute. When I was vexed and peevish there was an infallible means of pacifying me, which my relatives never failed to employ. They played for me some favorite old operatic air, or some new harmony of surpassing excellence, and, like King Saul, I recovered my serenity.

One day, when the time was extremely dull, and I had been painfully excited by an alarming crisis, I fancied that I would regain complete calmness if I could hear an opera. My friends remonstrated, but I insisted—in fact I was imperious—and they yielded. My nephew hastened to the theatre. I can not tell how happy I was—I was going to be filled with music, good music. By an unexpected chance they played "Le Prophete," one of the works that I had always preferred. At last the hour came. My little niece, a brunette of sixteen, was to accompany me. Two strong men carried me in my chair. Fortunately, we did not live very far from the theatre. On the way people regarded me with pity; the neighbors saluted me with an air of commiseration, and seemed to think, "Would it not be better to leave that poor man at home?"

But I saw nothing, heard nothing; I was absorbed in my childish joy. I was conveyed into the vestibule of the theatre—my nephew had thoughtlessly secured a seat in the first circle. No matter, my two bearers installed me there, me and my arm-chair. I was directly in the centre, just opposite the stage, and I saw admirably all the theatre, from the pit and the orchestra chairs to the boxes of the fourth circle, that legendary place where you are not incommoded by the chandelier—you see over it. I remained alone with my niece, who was as much enchanted as I was. But we had arrived too soon. In my eagerness I had not thought of the interminable half-hour which precedes the rising of the curtain. My little Jeanne, who had not been to the theatre three times in her life, was not tired, not she. The going and coming of the spectators, the bustle in the auditorium, which was filling up, the toilets, more or less elegant, in the boxes or in the balcony all amused her. The opera glasses, directed at her pretty little face, insolently sometimes, or at my decrepitude, caused her new sensations of pleasure, regret, or anger. At last we heard the scraping of the instruments being tuned, which seemed to me an exquisite melody. The three regulation bells were struck behind the curtain, and the short overture to Meyerbeer's opera was well executed. My heart filled with joy. They played the first act. I do not remember ever to have enjoyed in my life happiness so complete, so sweet, so heavenly. The second, third, and fourth acts were rendered in a manner that I thought perfect. I was insensible to everything except my happiness. During the intermission, my eyes were fixed on the curtain or on the orchestra. Then I noticed between two violoncellos an odd little creature, in whom I felt unaccountably interested. He was a poor, miserable fellow, excessively and shockingly deformed—a hump on his chest, a hump on his back, his legs twisted, and his arms very long; but yet he was not disagreeable to the sight. He had the sickly hue which is common with hunchbacks, but his features were quite regular. When he played, during the representation, all his body moved, writhed, and appeared to wrap itself around the violoncello in a fantastic and loving manner; forming a singular contrast, his face assumed a serious and almost austere expression, and the light of enthusiasm illumined his eyes. I saw all this through my opera glass, and commenced to form plans for the benefit of the curious fellow. Loving music very much, I intended to become the friend of this curious creature, who might come to my house sometimes and make his beloved instrument wail. Already I imagined myself very happy. He was an enthusiast in his art, I did not doubt. What more could one ask? I mused in silence until the moment when Jean of Leyde thinks that he should reveal to his accomplices that they must die with him. Then a white smoke rose on the scene through the cracks in the floor. It excited no attention, and was only thicker than the smoke usually employed; but suddenly there was an explosion and a flash that dimmed the lights in the auditorium; then all the dancers rushed toward the wings; the tenor lifted his white robe and literally took flight, and all the other singers and choristers disappeared one after another.

"What does this mean?" demanded some of the audience, already inclined to be alarmed.

Here a young woman appeared on the stage, running. The most frightful terror was expressed in her face. Her eyes protruded from her head. She seemed to be searching for something with the haste of madness. "What is the matter?" cried the people, breathless, and no longer doubting the truth.

The poor girl, distracted, sprang into the orchestra, screaming in a choking voice:

"Fire!"

The audience started with one sound. Oh, I remember all as if it were still passing before my eyes. The musicians stopped suddenly, but not all together, for some random notes broke forth, here and there, on the air. Frantic with fear, they rushed toward the door of the orchestra, but only two or three went out. They quickly returned. The retreat was cut off. They must escape by the auditorium. Need I say that all this occurred with magical rapidity?

The auditorium! Ah, there everything was frightful, horrible, inconceivable! It was a battle-field. At first I did not appreciate the danger, and then I trembled and shook with an unnatural fear. Alone with Jeanne—alone with that child who could do nothing for me, and who remained calm, without a thought, without a movement—I realized that I must remain where I was, without being able to stir, at the mercy of the fire, which would slowly advance to lick me, to burn me alive, to consume me. Nevertheless, I did not lose my presence of mind. No. Even now I am astonished at the coolness which took possession of me, and to which, however, I was not accustomed.

"Quick!" said I to little Jeanne; "fly, my child, and hasten to find some one who will take me away, if there is time."

A young man who, without doubt, had noticed my niece, and who was not panic-stricken, hurried toward her.

"Come, little one," said he to the child. Without ceremony he pulled her along by the hand.

"But my uncle, my uncle!" cried the little girl.

"Oh, let him come," sharply answered two or three voices from the crowd who were crushing themselves without mercy at the too narrow door. They left me there. During this time the struggle was desperate in the orchestra chairs, stalls, and pit. There were only four doors, each three feet wide, for this torrent that wanted to rush out in two seconds. The terrified people used all their efforts to reach these doors. Each wished to pass those who were in advance. They pushed, cried, shrieked, and fought with fury. Two strong men braced themselves back to back near an opening that they intended to pass before any one else, and, during that time, no one, neither they nor the others, could escape. Behind them were sobs, maledictions, and imprecations, and the crowd pushed with blind fury. I saw some young men, who had already felt the heat of the flames, jump on the seats and then on the shoulders of those nearer the door. Thus they crawled along on their fellow-sufferers, whose heads bent under the weight of their bodies, hanging on to the hair and clothes of all alike, driving their nails into the shoulders of women and the faces of men. In one place the human mass, by whom they expected to be carried out, opened, and they fell heavily between two benches, where they were trampled upon and crushed carelessly, pitilessly, remorselessly.

Meanwhile the fire had spread. The scenery was burning. The flames were rapidly approaching the auditorium. The heat had become more intense. I was perspiring freely, but it was more from fear than from heat. Already the spectacle was sublime—sublime and grand. In spite of the dreadful anguish which chilled my heart, wrung my breast, and numbed my brain, I found—yes, I found something violently gay in those enormous tongues of fire, frisking before me, and caressing the front of the stage. The joy of the scourge overwhelmed me, awed me. I saw that I was lost! My marrow froze at the thought of being burned alive without possible resistance. It was the incarnation of horror driven beyond its limits; and, nevertheless, there lurked in my brain a painful persistence in seeking out that laughing flame. At the doors the contest was becoming more violent, more compact, more frantic. As the fire increased and the smoke thickened, the excitement of those who were still within assumed the proportions of complete frenzy. Oh, woe to the weak! Woe to the kind! Woe to all those who had not yet consented to become ferocious beasts! There were children, little children, who cried, while their mothers, pale, torn, scratched, and bloody, begged the men to be charitable, to be human. Ah, yes, human. But that was not the question. Not to be roasted in that furnace—that was all.

I saw a great demon, with the enormous beak of a bird of prey, his eyes distended with fear, stretch out his hand—an immense hand, the sight of which is before me. He seized by the shoulders a young woman in front of him, and dragged her backward, so as to her place, at least. The contracted fingers of giant hand were driven into her flesh, and bruised scratched it. But she resisted madly, fighting with all strength, and trying in her turn to plunge her nails the face of the cruel man. Horrible deed! That erable wretch leaned his two hands on the poor woman bore down until she fell between two chairs, and passed over her with a howl of triumph. That day I knew by sight. He was regarded in society as a rich gentleman. Perhaps he was acquainted with the victim. Perhaps he had danced with her in the saloon of the city the preceding winter. However, he not the benefit of his horrible selfishness; for, he reached the door, he was thrown so violently against wall that, being unconscious, he also fell.

Suddenly a fireman appeared. Why had he come I called out. He heard me. He looked at me, saying to ask what I was doing there, and disappeared supposed he was coming to my rescue. Not at Little by little, however, the theatre emptied. Some those who preserved their coolness—there were many—and who had waited until the last, still had courage to draw into the corridor the vanquished in combat on whom the crowd had trampled. And them many were mortally wounded. It was time. The fire had reached the orchestra. There every showed the panic in which the musicians had fled. Stands were overturned; violins, hautboys, flutes, oboes, lay on the floor. Scarcely any one had the presence of mind to take away his instrument. On the stands, still erect, and on that of the leader of the orchestra, there were scores and sheets of music all scorched. The smoke, quite thick from the first, drawn toward the roof by some phenomenon of ventilation which I can not explain. The sheets of a curled slowly; the heat was becoming intolerable, a violin string broke from the heat of the fire. The sound of the dying instrument was heart-rending sadness. The centre of the fire increased. Soon the harp-strings snapped, one after another. This a able, exquisite instrument, seemed to sing its death in that agony, which sounded like the death-rattle it was harmonious still. A melody flew away into flame with its soul. After the harp, the strings of a bass-viol broke, with a sharp sound, like the report of a revolver. Finally, from the corner to the right explosion was heard, then another, then a third. These were the kettle-drums and the big drum, the heat which had burst from the pressure of the overheated.

At this moment I saw something which terrified me. A head rose in the door of the parterre to the left seemed to be a child's head. I did not distinguish as the smoke had regained its intensity, and commenced to blind me. However, I still saw, but as if through a cloud. There was something like curiosity mixed with astonishing resolution in the movements of that head. Soon the body entered. What could that unhappy being be doing there, and what idea had entered his brain? He turned his head toward the orchestra and remained motionless. Suddenly he took two steps forward. I screamed. It was not a child. It was the hunchback, the little, deformed musician, my friend of a moment ago, the friend that I should never know certainly I was going to die. What did he want what brought him back? Deliberately but with a windings, he walked toward the orchestra. A volley of fire stopped him. He recoiled, but appeared to renounce some mad project that he had dreamed. Seizing a favorable moment, he darted forward. He reached the first row of orchestra chairs running, his arms covering his face to protect himself, approached his place among the musicians. I did his purpose, his desire. Like every one else, a first danger the poor hunchback had saved himself, after reflection, he returned to seek his friend, his companion—his violoncello, which had, undoubtedly, soled him in many misfortunes, in many sorrow many afflictions. Yes, that was it. I saw him the instrument in both hands and try to lift it over the railing which separates the orchestra from the parterre. What folly! The fire had commenced to rage, I did not understand how this unfortunate could in one minute without being asphyxiated or mortally burned. I trembled violently with anxiety. Instantly, and in a terrible voice, I roared:

"Go away! Go away! You are tempting Providence! Miserable wretch, begone! begone!"

Probably he did not hear me, as he continued his efforts to save his instrument. The more I screamed the more excited he became. Columns of fire descended down into his face. The fire spread all around him. He stood on a chair, and then placing one foot on a separating railing, dragged his violoncello. I called out to him again: "You are mad!"

I almost forgot my own situation in the excitement of this hunchback's insane act. Poor little creature ave, and who must have been good and intelligent, and whom I had never spoken. I see him still there, before my eyes, standing on that chair, and making those great efforts. Then, all at once, he seemed to succeed. The violoncello, finally extricated from the chairs which encumbered it, moved toward him, when, all at the same instant, all the violins and violoncellos, the light wood of which had become overheated, burst into a blaze simultaneously. That of the hunchback caught with the others. It was terrible. A bright flame shot up to a great height. The little fellow immediately relaxed his grasp, tottered, and fell forward, adlong into the orchestra, and upon his burning instrument. For some seconds I gasped and stretched out my arm—my one arm—to the place where I had seen that strange and sombre figure rise, lighted by the excessive glare of the conflagration. I saw him, still moving in the midst of the flames, extend his blackened arms, and then sink into the glowing coals. The instruments seemed to burn more joyfully than ever, the wanton flames dancing round them. They twisted while scorching and blazing and seemed to perform a frightful symphony of which I alone, of perhaps all the world, can the power and the horror. I wanted very much to if the hunchback—But what folly to hope that could save himself. Besides, I could see no more, smoke was so thick.

The flames became more violent. It was like a furnace. The cornices and other projecting parts of the front of the stage, kindled rapidly now. I could scarcely distinguish anything more. The smoke blinded and choked me. My time had come. I was going to die. There are terrors before which the bravest recoil and cease to be calm. Death by fire is one of those terrors. Nevertheless, I was nailed to my chair. The fire advanced slowly and steadily. Had I lost all hope of being saved? No, I must admit I had not. How singularly bright and tenacious is that luminescence, hope, which cheers the depths of men's hearts! I hoped still. My hopes were carefully built on the death of the poor hunchback. Since he had been able to return for his instrument, others would be able to enter in search of me, and carry me out. And then, I was the fireman of whom I had caught a glimpse; I believed he was thinking of me, and of nothing but Ah! Hope!

While I was building these imaginary castles, the fire—that is to say the fire—was steadily progressing. By degrees the wainscoting was kindled. The set of the chairs made a thick smoke. That smoke enveloped me and entered my eyes, nose, mouth, and made me cough. Occasionally, a current of air swept away, and I breathed and became visible as the one only, immovable victim of an inevitable catastrophe. It was like an immense wave, another volume of smoke enveloped and stifled me. One might have sworn that an evil spirit wished to enjoy thoroughly the suffering to which I was a prey by cruelly prolonging it to satiety. As did the negro kings in the centre of Africa drown their victims by plunging their heads in water and withholding them alternately until they died, after many hours of torture. In a short time it was not the smoke that surrounded me. Although the fire had not reached the woodwork of my box, the heat was so intense that I began to feel my blood boiling in my veins and in my brain. The sensation of burning was terribly appreciable. I knew from my condition that I would not be able to retain consciousness much more than two minutes longer. The fire was raging. My sweat ran from my forehead and temples down my cheeks and beard. All my body was deluged. I tried to place my hand on the varnish leather support of the box. I drew it back quickly. That was blazing. I brand detached from I don't know where described by the through the auditorium and fell into the box with me. My resignation could not withstand that. I did not want to die. Save me! Save me! No other wish, no other desire.

Save me! But how? It was too late for me to try to save myself. Save me! Oh, yes, save me! I wished it, I wished it. Oh, how quickly I abandoned my resignation! It was not so difficult as I thought. After all, I still had one arm not wholly useless, the strength of which, tripled by fear, had become greater. By expertly throwing myself backward, and assisting myself by catching hold of every object, I would be able to drag myself by jerks into the air. Once there it would be a respite. After a few seconds of rest, I could continue my way to the outside. Yes, I thought all that, but I did nothing, my lifeless body remained motionless, while in my mind there was a nervous excitement which I felt was making me crazy. The merciless heat still increased. I was possessed of a rage which must have been terrible—my eyes bloodshot, my mouth contracted, my beard bristling. I shook my arm—my useless arm—and uttered one of those cries which are a paroxysm, and with the force of which it seems the lungs must burst.

But my fury, my heart-rending cries, my frantic gestures, were all in vain. No one came. Still I did nothing. I was nailed there. Imagine an unfortunate creature tied to a stake, and slowly reached by a fire intended for him. Well, then, my suffering was more terrible and more abominable, as I was not tied, as I could easily be saved, as—as—Oh! but I did not want to be burned by inches, before being consumed. It seemed to me that my flesh was beginning to curl up under the effect of the intense heat which surrounded me. I saw nothing more. I heard nothing more except the dreadful roar of the triumphant conflagration in that immense cage of a theatre. My beard was scorching, and commencing to burn. I felt an itching sensation in my face, on my neck, and at the roots of my hair. Now I made a great effort and moved in my chair.

"There is still time," thought I. I determined to rise and walk. It was only for a moment. After inclining my body forward, I made a sudden movement. My eyes flashed. I believed I was going to walk. It was only for a moment. No, no; my legs were not willing. They remained reluctantly paralyzed. My excitement again became violent. I tried once more. I thought of that mute son of Croesus suddenly regaining his speech at the sight of his father's life being menaced by a soldier who did not know him. Why could not the same effect be produced for me in a danger more urgent, more horrible? Once more. No, no, no. Now I felt only that I was dying. It was no longer possible to endure one degree of heat more. It was over, all over. The agony was commencing to be unbearable. I thought no more, I felt no more. It seemed to me that I staggered. Before my eyes a blinding light; around me, everywhere, above me, below me, the fire. I remained passive; perhaps I fell. I know nothing more. I was abandoned.

Eight hours afterward, I found myself in bed again. My little niece in running for help, had fallen, and was severely wounded in the head. She had been carried away fainting, and it was only after recovering her senses that she was able to speak. Two men were dispatched to my rescue, and drew me from the furnace just as I became unconscious.

The building of the Mexican Central Railroad is one of the most important chapters in the history of modern Mexico. In the middle of October, 1880, operations were begun in Mexico City, and the construction of the international bridge over the Rio Grande at El Paso was commenced shortly afterwards. The line was built in two sections, one extending from the capital north, and the other from El Paso south. These two parts were joined near the city of Fresnillo, State of Zacatecas, in 1884, completing 1,224 miles of railway. Branches have since been thrown out in every direction, smaller companies bought up and amalgamated, and now the Mexican Central controls 3,300 miles of railroads.

Colorado, Utah, New Mexico, and Arizona, meet and form a point upon a spur of the Carizo Mountains. At no other place on the globe do we find four States, Territories, or provinces uniting to form such a junction, remarks the Boston Traveler. The States are so unevenly divided that there is but one "four corners" in the country. This spot is not easy of access, and few tourists ever see it, yet a monument stands at the point erected by United States surveyors and inscribed with the names of the States whose boundaries meet there.

Edward B. Wesley, long known as "the grand old man" of Wall Street, died a few weeks ago at the advanced age of 95, leaving a fortune estimated at $3,000,000. Mr. Wesley never smoked, drank nor went to the theatre, and always attributed his success, like Russell Sage, to the fact that he began to save from his first start in life, when he sold birch beer and cakes to a crowd of people in a little New England village and made a profit of $2 a day.

Dr. Forbes Winslow says in a London dispatch to the New York Times: "According to the statistical figures on insanity, it can be shown that before long there will be actually more lunatics in the world than sane people. The burning problem of the day is how to prevent this increase of insanity. What is the use of wasting time and energy on an education bill when we have before us this absorbing problem, the contemplation of an insane world, to deal with?"

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

"So far Mr. Bryan has not heard from his published offer to aid Mr. Hearst," writes the correspondent of the St. Louis Republic, who is traveling with Mr. Bryan. "But," adds the correspondent, "he is not concerning himself in the matter."

Samuel Gompers, President of the American Federation of Labor, will be active in the Congressional campaign until election. He spoke at Bridgeport, Conn., Newark, N. J., Scranton, Pa., and Williamsport, Pa., last week. During the month he will be heard in several districts in New York State, and, it is said, will urge Hearst for Governor.

The extent of the criticism of Senator Bailey and his oil company fees in his own State is somewhat indicated by 35 comments from other Texas papers which are printed in the Houston Chronicle. Of these 35 there are 18 which are distinctly unfavorable to the Senator, while only eight or nine can be called favorable.

Congressman Samuel W. McCall, the independent member from the Harvard college district, sold such railroad bonds and stocks as he held before acting on rate bills in the last session of the Fifty-eighth Congress and the first session of the Fifty-ninth. This fact has been brought out in his campaign, but it is not paraded by the Congressman.

It has finally been decided that District Attorney Jerome shall not take the stump for the Republicans in the New York campaign. The nominal reason is that his official duties prevent; but the real reason, according to report, is that the Republicans felt that he would hurt rather than help Hughes, on account of his halting in relation to insurance prosecutions.

It is asserted that money is pouring into Colorado from all over the United States, and other countries, at the rate of $500 a day, to assist Haywood's campaign for the governorship. Haywood is in jail. The Denver Post, commenting on the situation, says the Socialists differ from the average Republican or Democrat, or Independent, in that, if they are truly sincere, they will contribute out of small incomes to their cause, whereas the regular parties have to milk corporations, or put up rich candidates, or assess office-holders, to pay campaign expenses.

The supreme court of the United States has denied the petition of former United States Senator Burton of Kansas for a rehearing in the case in which he is under sentence of imprisonment and fine on the charge of accepting an attorney's fee in a case in which the Government was interested while he was serving as Senator. Burton and his attorneys have evidently given up the struggle to postpone his punishment, and he is now in jail serving out his sentence.

Thomas Benthall, nominated by the Democrats of the First Ohio District for Congress to run against Nicholas Longworth, President Roosevelt's son-in-law, worked twenty of the forty-four years of his life as a coal miner. He had practically no schooling until he was twenty-nine. He attended a normal school at Lebanon, O., then went to Cincinnati and attended law school for two years. He has been practicing at the bar for ten years. He is energetic and popular. It is believed that he will number among his supporters the local organized labor army. He is married and has two children.

Mrs. Nicholas Longworth's presence made Congressman Ralph Cole's campaign opening at Findlay, Ohio, the most tremendous demonstration Hancock county had ever known. At the opera house where the meeting was to be held hundreds failed to gain admittance. The box in which Mrs. Longworth sat was covered with flowers and she outshone all else. When the speaking commenced there were insistent calls for "Alice" from all parts of the house. These continued when she left the box to join her husband on the stage. She bowed to the audience but made no remarks. Congressman Longworth made a short address.

Mr. Moody's prospective retirement from the cabinet is not viewed with regret by the Chicago Inter-Ocean, a stalwart administration organ. This is because the attorney-general is thought to have fallen down badly in the Paul Morton case. "In that moment," when the evidence of Paul Morton's "wanton and confessed law-breaking" was laid upon his desk and he ignored it, "William H. Moody committed professional suicide." What, however, about President Roosevelt's part in the performance? asks the Springfield (Mass.) Republican, and adds: "Why are there no words of condemnation for the one who ordered an abandonment of the prosecution, and much censure for the officer who carried out the orders of his chief? Put the blame where it belongs. Don't try to hide the affair under Moody's doorsteps."

A TERRITORIAL GALAXY.

How Six Men of National Prominence Moved from Dakota to Fame.

Sometimes it is better to write your story and then name it, but this story follows the name. It could not be otherwise, for a few words in a recent literary note brought back the day when the first star of that cluster came into view, and in memory the other twinkling points of light quickly appeared, one after another, till all the constellation was distinct, and the title above made itself.

There are many such constellations in American literature and journalism, but they are not steadfast. The Boston galaxy was for years more nearly unchanged than any, but the greater lights are gone and the newly discovered are not so numerous. The Indiana group has scattered and formed again at intervals. It is such a temporary conjunction that this reminiscence will describe—a curious neighboring of stars in a northern sky, when, with but one instance of actual duality, six formed a figure as seemingly intimate as the Pleiades, though really little known to each other.

When Dakota was still a Territory, the second greatest national reserve, and as yet unaware of the dismembering plot festering in the sordid minds of office-seekers, there was a little weekly paper published at Estelline and named the Bell. In its column or two of neighborhood news, and frequently on what is termed by courtesy the editorial page, there appeared with every issue paragraphs of humor carrying the true American flavor of extravagance, yet racier and wittier than the common efflorescence. They were written by the editor, Fred H. Carruth, and they soon attracted so much attention that requests from other publishers for exchange copies swelled the receipts of mail at the Dakota village to more than twice its former volume. But Editor Carruth's spreading fame ministered more to vanity than to avarice.

At Sioux Falls, another Dakota town, but already a budding metropolis, lived S. T. Clover, a newspaper genius of a more practical turn of mind. He had before this made a tour of the world and not only had he paid his way with his pen, but in addition had increased his reputation and wealth with the volume that recorded his journeyings. Clover induced Carruth to join him at Sioux Falls, and of the partnership a new Bell was born, a humorous weekly of the Northwest. It lived thirteen weeks, but it was a bright and winsome child, and its passing was regretted more by those who read it free of cost than by its proprietors. The pair separated and moved swiftly eastward, not like meteors but like stars that wheel unseen in daylight. Soon afterward Hayden Carruth (the youthful Fred had been excised) appeared as a signature in the Harper publications, and for years now the owner of the name has been recognized as one of the humorists of the Manhattan circle. Clover tarried in Chicago and earned laurels and a good salary in more than one newspaper office, thence to New York, where he labored a long time, and now he is in Los Angeles, still true to his journalistic inclination.

In those earlier days, and while the Estelline Bell was still metaphorically a flower of the desert, Hamlin Garland settled with his people in a new place near the line that now separates the two States made of the Territory. It was a few miles west of the great Wahpeton and Sisseton Indian Reservation, and the nearest railroad point—eventually the county seat of that big and fertile county—was Aberdeen. There the young author, for even then Garland had begun to show the promise of his future, learned much from the wide prairies that were like a gently swelling sea, but more pleasing than a waste of waters, for in the spring they were decked with myriads of bright-hued flowers that had never before bloomed for the admiration of civilized beholders. Some of the strongest of his earliest and still his best stories were built on his dreams and experiences among the pioneers of the valley. Through that valley meanders for hundreds of miles the James river, the longest unnavigable stream in the world, and perhaps the only one that is much larger at its head than at its mouth. Garland, too, left Dakota for the East, and not long afterward his first book created a literary sensation.

From Aberdeen, a few years later, went United States Senator Kyle, whose elevation to national prominence was as sudden and unexpected as any chance of life. The minister of a congregation notable neither for numbers nor wealth, but cultured and artistic, the Reverend James H. Kyle was known and respected by a circle little larger than the limits of a prairie town. Of imposing figure and convincing speech, he was invited to make a Fourth of July address, and afterward was induced to speak on educational and economic themes at meetings of the farmers. Some chance seed thus dropped by the wayside bore abundant fruit. An unlooked-for deadlock in the State legislature on the election of a Senator brought out several impromptu nominations, among them that of Kyle by a personal friend, and in the twinkling of an eye the minister was chosen. From quiet labors among his flock he was without warning drawn into the whirlpool of great interests at Washington.

One of the papers of Aberdeen was edited at that time by Frank Baum, a clever but modest young amateur of journalism, the nephew of Matilda Joslyn Gage. After a few months of interesting but unprofitable experience in newspaper work, Baum returned to his former home in Chicago, and a little later he published the first of several popular books for juvenile readers. Today he is widely known as the author of "The Wizard of Oz," and from his books, and the play made of the most successful one of them, he enjoys an income that is far beyond the wildest dreams of the former Dakota editor.

When President Cleveland chose the officials of the Territory he sent out, among others, General N. H. Harris of Mississippi to be register of the Aberdeen Land Office. Gen. Harris was a genial Southern gentleman, and none of those who sojourned in Dakota through its dry, windy, dusty summers and clear, glittering, frigid winters made more friends than he. He was the center of a bright, congenial circle there, and to his winning and entertaining personality much of its charm was due. When his term of office was over he came to San Francisco, and during his residence here his circle of admiring friends grew ever wider. General Harris was related to John Hays Hammond, and in connection with some of the mining interests of the latter he went to London and spent some of the last months of his life there.

So did six men of note come to know the delights and the terrors of life in that great wheat-field of the Northwest, and so for a time all lived within a circle whose diameter was little more than a hundred miles. All save one sought other haunts of activity, but there are many who never doubt that each carried with him rare and cheering memories of those pioneer days.

San Francisco, October, 1906.

The future of the Eiffel Tower is in doubt, according to an article in the London Globe. By the terms of the inventor's contract with the city of Paris, the tower remains his property for twenty years—that is to say, until January 1, 1910, when it becomes the property of the city. The commission of "Vieux Paris," which busies itself in the work of preserving picturesque old sites is claiming that in the interests of good taste and beauty M. Eiffel's giant structure must come down, and the question has been considered by the municipal council. The tower has been a familiar object to the holiday makers of the world for some years now. It is a question whether the tower might be regarded as having accomplished its destiny and as ready for demolition. Some scientists like it as a point of observation, others aver that it acts as a lightning conductor for half Paris, and military engineers like it as a useful and ready-made station for wireless telegraphy. Under the influence of these strong credentials the city fathers have prolonged the Eiffel Tower agreement until 1915.

Subway workmen digging beneath Water Street in Philadelphia for the new tunnel station uncovered at a depth of one hundred feet what is clearly an old slave prison, reports a recent news dispatch. The pen is composed of narrow cells in three tiers, with three-foot corridors between the heavy walls. Heavy iron bars covered the windows, and in each cell were manacle supports. Directly above them is the house of Stephen Girard, the eccentric millionaire, who gave Girard College to Philadelphia and whose estate is now valued at hundreds of millions. It was in tearing down this house, which the traction company had bought from the Girard trust, that they came across the prison. It has long been handed down in local history that Girard drove a brisk slave trade and that some of the basis of his fortune came from dealing in negroes. The old Girard house is within half a square of the Delaware, and secret access by water would be easy. Girard believed in slavery, owned slaves, and had many on his Louisiana sugar plantation.

The New York Central Company will install thirty-five electric locomotives immediately to care for its suburban traffic. The initial trial has been given to one of the engines. The reports in the New York newspapers are agreed that the trial was highly satisfactory and that the electric locomotive is no longer an experiment but an accomplished fact.

Rabbits, asserts a naturalist, have white tails so that the young may distinguish their mother in case of pursuit. The natural color of the rabbit is so like the surrounding ground that this would be impossible otherwise.

EVOLUTION OF FEMININE TRAITS.

The Growth of a Peculiar Code of Morals—Woman Power and Helplessness.

A study of "the adventitious character of woman from the standpoint of biology and sociology, written by Professor W. I. Thomas, of the University of Chicago, recently appeared in the American Journal of Sociology, and has attracted no little attention. The article is scientific, but attractive in plan and phraseology. It opens with an exact yet plain statement of the beginnings of sex differences, and traces the growth and development of variability in the higher forms of animal life.

The greater intimacy between mother and offspring in the mammalian type is noted, and the pre-eminent helplessness of the human child which at first thought appears to be a disadvantage, is shown to be the source of human superiority:

Among mankind the longer dependence of children results in a correspondingly lengthened and intimate association of parents, which we denominate marriage. For Westerners quite right in his view that children are not the result of marriage but marriage is the result of children. From this point of view marriage is a union favored by the scheme of nature because favorable to the rearing and training of children, and the practicing marriage, or its animal analogue, have the best chance of survival.

In the earliest days man was a hunter and fighter. Woman and the child fixed the point to which returned:

Not suddenly, but in the course of time, he usurped primacy in the industrial pursuits, and through his organization of industry and the application of invention to the industrial processes became a creator of wealth on a scale before unknown. Gradually also he began to rely not altogether on ornament, plots, and trophies to get the attention and favor of woman. When she was reduced to a condition of dependency on his activity, wooing became a less formidable matter, and he began to negotiate for her and purchase her from her male kin.

It is more especially on the moral side that man's position to bend the situation to his pleasure placed woman in a hard position, and resulted in the distortion of her nature. Man has always insisted that woman shall be better than himself, and her immoralities are general as such as man never greatly disapproves. There has, in fact, been developed a peculiar code of morals to cover the peculiar case of women:

Morality, in the most general sense, represents the code of which activities are best carried on, and is worked out in the school of experience. It is pre-eminently an adult and a system, and men are intelligent enough to recognize that women nor children have passed through this school. It is on this account that, while man is merciless to woman from the standpoint of personal behavior, he exempts her from any in the way of contractual morality, or views her defections with regard with allowance and even with amusement.

The vitally important conclusion of the paper in these paragraphs:

As long as woman is comfortably cared for by the man, her group or by marriage she is not likely to do anything especially if the moral standards in her family and community are severe. But an unattached woman has a tendency to become an adventuress—not so much on economic as on psychological grounds. Life is rarely so hard that a young woman can not find her bread; but she can not always live and have the stimulus she craves. As long, however, as she remains with her group and is known to the whole community, she realizes that infraction of the habits of the group, any immodesty or immorality will ruin her standing and her chances of marriage and so she is kept into shame and confusion.

Consequently good behavior is a protective measure—intuitive, of course; for it is not true that the ordinary girl has intuition enough to think out a general attitude toward life other than that which is habitual in her group. But when she becomes detached from home and group, and is removed not only from the surveillance, but from the ordinary stimulation and interest afforded by social life and acquaintanceship, her inhibitions are likely to be relaxed. The girl coming alone from the country to the city affords one of the clearest cases of detachment. Assuming that she comes to the city to earn her living, she is only handicapped on the economic side to a degree which makes it impossible to obtain those accessories to her personality—the way of finery which would be sufficient to satisfy her and attract her attention if they were to be had in plenty, but she is cut off from the sight of every one whose opinion has any meaning for her, while the separation from her home community renders her condition peculiarly flat and lonely, and prepares her to accept any opportunity for stimulation.

To be completely lost sight of by all who have previously known her may, under these circumstances, become an object of the only means by which she can without confusion accept intense stimulations than are legitimate in the humdrum life of a poor home. And to pass from a regular to an irregular life for a season and back again, before the fact has been noticed, is a course much more usual than is ordinarily suspected. The girl which accounts for the short career of the fast woman and the score of an early death is well-nigh groundless. Society can not keep track of these women; and the world is so small that they reappear in the ordinary walks of life, marry and are given in marriage—and the world is no wiser. There are thousands of girls leading irregular lives in our large cities whose parents think they are in factories, stores, and business positions.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

Dr. Harry Fielding Reid, professor of geological physics in the Johns Hopkins university, as sailed for Rome as the representative of the United States at the annual meeting of the International Seismographic Association.

W. Morgan Shuster, the young Washington lawyer who has been appointed by the President member of the Philippine Commission, is just twenty-nine. His appointment carries with it a salary of $15,000. Mr. Shuster was formerly department stenographer.

Mrs. Collis P. Huntington, when she arrived New York from Europe a few days ago, deared merchandise worth $32,000 bought in Europe, of which $27,000 represents two articles of jewelry. The duty amounted to about $20,000. Mrs. Huntington holds the record for paying the largest cash amount of duty on deared articles ever handed over to the Government officials on the dock. It was $32,000 in 1901.

Mrs. Richard Aldrich, of New York, formerly Miss Margaret Astor Chanler and granddaughter of the first John Jacob Astor, turned over to children of the poor during the summer months her handsome house in West Seventy-ninth street, New York. For years she has devoted much of her time to philanthropy, her activities during the war with Spain having been cognized by the bestowal upon her of a gold medal.

A judgment for $138,000 in favor of Mrs. Ingersoll, widow of Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll, given by a lower court, has been set aside by the United States Circuit Court of appeals. The judgment was given in a suit brought by Mrs. Ingersoll to recover an amount alleged to be due for legal services by her husband in the settlement of the estate of Andrew J. Davis, the millionaire mine owner of Butte, Mont. Colonel Ingersoll's services were not successful in the contest of Davis's will.

President Fallieres of the French republic has broken with tradition, dismissed the famous chef of the presidential mansion and employs instead woman cook or "cordon bleu," as the French say. The title of "cordon bleu" for a woman cook dates back to Louis XV and Mme. Du Barry. The latter championed the cause of her sex, but the king said that only a man could cook. After he had eaten a delicious dinner cooked by a woman he was converted, had the cook called and placed around her neck the blue ribbon of the order of the Saint Esprit, known as the "cordon bleu."

The Princess of Monaco is the second wife of the reigning prince of the little principality. She was Mlle. Heine, daughter of the rich banker of Hamburg and niece of the great poet. New Orleans gave her birth and in due course she was married to Duc De Richelieu. Her fortune on the death of the duke was said to have been $10,000,000. She married the present prince in 1889, his first marriage with Lady Mary Victoria Douglas-Hamilton, daughter of the Duke of Hamilton, having been dissolved by the pope. She has always regarded the gaming house at Monaco with positive aversion.

John B. Henderson, Senator from Missouri from 1862 to 1869, is living in Washington, eighty years of age. Francis M. Cockrell, whose twenty years' service as Senator from Missouri ended last year, is now a member of the Interstate Commerce Commission and is seventy-two years of age. Daniel T. Jewett, ex-Senator from Missouri and a well-known attorney in Lincoln's time, died a short time ago, aged ninety-nine. Carl Schurz, Senator from Missouri from 1869 to 1875, died recently at seventy-seven. Jewett was born in Maine, Schurz in Germany, Henderson in Virginia and Cockrell in Missouri.

King Edward is a scientific bridge player, and cares little for high stakes. He loses philosophically, never loses his temper, but has certain rigid rules in playing. They are never to play with a young man under twenty-five or a girl under twenty-one, or an indifferent partner, and never to take refreshment during the play. He takes bridge seriously and plays it for the interest of its problems. Bridge was played very actively during the Doncaster week, the party at Rufford Abbey, where the king was entertained, containing the most expert player in England, Miss Thornewill. Mrs. Keppel, also a fine player, was one of the guests.

It is presumed that Secretary Taft will soon inform the President whether he intends to accept the position on the Supreme Bench held open for him since last spring. President Roosevelt has named two of the nine Associate Justices, Oliver Wendell Holmes, Jr., and William R. Day. Of the seven remaining members of the Court three—Justice Harlan, Chief Justice Fuller and Justice Brown—have already reached the age for retirement. Justice Brewer will be eligible to retire next June. Justice Peckham could retire on November 22, 1908. The others, Justices White and McKenna, have nine years and seven years, respectively, before they are eligible to retire. Chief Justice Fuller has been eligible to retire for three years past, but that he will avail himself of the privilege seems not probable.

The American Ambassador to Italy, Henry White, is a notable figure in Venice as he floats about in a gondola with his wife and daughter, notes a correspondent of the London Pall Mall Gazette. "He is an American," said a lady from the States. "I am sure no one but an American would be so polite to his womenkind." "Not at all," said another dame with a cockney accent. "He is an Englishman. He looks it all over, and no man except an Englishman would ever drink three cups of tea." Just then a waiter approached, and Mr. White spoke to him in the purest Italian. The ladies looked at each other in blank amazement and exclaimed: "Why, he's an Italian! Who would have believed it?"

Brigadier-General Frederick Funston was relieved in Cuba soon after his arrival by General J. Franklin Bell. The only reason for ordering Funston out of Cuba was the antipathy felt for him by the Cubans who bore arms against Spain. says a Washington dispatch to the New York World, which tells the following story: "The Cubans declare that Funston 'deserted' the Army of Liberation under Gen. Gascia. In that army the young Kansan commanded the first dynamite gun ever used in actual warfare. He took part in the battle of Las Tunas and there, his friends assert, he saw the foul murder of a Spanish major, who, under a flag of truce, came out of a block-house to negotiate for the surrender of his men. As the Spaniard met a Cuban major, a negro soldier split the Spaniard's head down to the shoulder with a machete. Funston, his friends say, saw enough to convince him that the Cuban major gave the signal for the murder. They charge, too, that when the Spanish garrison surrendered without conditions every man of them was butchered in the same way, so that the evidence that the major had been murdered would be hidden by the death of his entire command. The Cubans have never admitted that the Spanish major was murdered, and to be consistent they have insisted that Funston deserted their forces." Funston then resigned his Cuban commission in disgust, and was captured by a Spanish patrol on his way to the United States.

VANITY FAIR.

Pittsburg, it is charged, spends $10,000,000 a year in New York "foolishly." The estimate has the authority of the Chamber of Commerce and will not be thought extravagant, says an editorial in the New York World. It takes no account of chateaus in the French style and Fifth avenue mansions or other permanent investments, but is presumed to include pearl necklaces, automobiles, alimony disbursements, chorus-girl endowment funds and food and drink. In the matter of the last item it represents a ratio of at least one cold bottle to every steel billet. It enables many a hotel and restaurant to show a favorable balance sheet.

A generation has witnessed a radical change in the character and geographical distribution of New York's visiting "spenders." Following the rich planter of before the war came the Western bonanza kings, and in their wake in the eighties the "Chicago crowd." Now with the nation's get-rich-quick centre shifted to Pittsburg it is the turn of the steel millionaire. Cotton, gold, wheat, pork, steel—each has had its fling.

Pittsburg storekeepers feel that these millions should be spent at home. But the Pittsburg millionaire is not so dyed-in-the-wool a protectionist. He believes in buying in the best market. He purchases his pearl necklaces here for the same reason that New York buys structural steel in Pittsburg.

As a matter of fact, it is probable that the balance of trade between the two cities is largely in favor of Pittsburg. New York's annual crop of skyscrapers necessitating larger payments to the steel city than it receives back for expenditure in lobster palaces, greenrooms and other recognized channels of millionaire distribution.

A writer in the London World finds occasion to revert to the severe criticisms of society by Father Vaughan, which were a leading topic of the summer season, and says:

"Of course the chaperon question, as it is generally understood, is a middle-class one; Father Vaughan perfectly understood what he was saying when he alluded to the lack of surveillance of a properly dignified and perfectly agreeable kind from which so many girls really suffer nowadays. This is due partly to the fact that mothers do not seem to want to be bothered to look after their girls, and partly to the fact that hostesses seem to resent much 'mothering.'

"But even allowing for the fact that the preacher has not spared his colors in order to make his picture sufficiently striking, one knows perfectly well that far too much latitude is given to girls not only in country houses but in town as well. It would not be at all a bad thing for English society if we could go back to the days when people kept almost absurdly watchful eyes on the proprieties. Their vigilance may sometimes have been eluded, it is true; it may sometimes have provoked ridicule, but at least it conveyed the idea that mothers set a high standard for their girls, and were at some pains to see that they came somewhere near it.

"It was good for men to feel this, moreover, for it surely made women seem better worth the winning if they had been jealously guarded under the experienced eye of a duenna who knew man and his ways."

Madame Emma Eames-Story, who lost her entire wardrobe during the San Francisco earthquake, is replenishing, writes Malcolm Lincoln in the Los Angeles Express. The task is being performed in Paris, but she came to London this week for a lace robe for private use. This is a modest affair—"would cost $1,000 in New York," she whispered softly through an immense veil with four patches of black that give a weird effect to her classic nose.

For her various robes in opera the Parisian modistes are slaving nowadays. Eames is an exacting patron. Her temper is not her best point, and the costumier who undertakes to please her has need of all the patience he can lay in. Worth is the designer of all, but it is the fitters who feel the strain. The fair American songstress boasts that she can stand five hours at a stretch when trying on gowns. "I have as much pleasure in the consciousness of being well dressed as my Puritan ancestors had in the knowledge that they had discovered the true way to live." But Worth tells a mournful tale of her exacting ways. She calls him a tyrant and boxes his ears when his suggestion does not suit her whim.

Madame Eames has opinions of Parisian shopkeepers that would not look pleasant to those they most deeply concern. "Don't talk to me of the Yankee cuteness. There is no tradesman on earth who can lift a dollar or its equivalent so deftly as the Parisian. It is 'Oui, Oui, Oui, everywhere, and 'Oui, Madame, Oui, Madame' at every turn; and for each of these courtesies they manage to filch a franc. I begin to think the only straightforward people are the Americans. You always know where to find them. The moral vision of continental Europe is oblique."

Artist Gibson has been credited recently with a striking portrait of a lady, done in a few words instead of a few pencil lines. The incident is described in the Philadelphia Bulletin.

"I dined with Charles Dana Gibson at Princess's Restaurant in London during the season," said a Chicagoan.

"The lofty, spacious dining-room was filled with women in pale gowns, their hair uncovered, and their arms and necks bare, and though these women were fashionable, aristocratic, they smoked cigarettes with their coffee as they watched the biocopic pictures that went on at one end of the big room, and as they listened to the singing that went on at the other.

"Amid all this feminine smoking, we Americans began to discuss and to define the word 'lady.' Was it ladylike to smoke? we asked. Would a lady ever smoke? What was a lady?"

"I think Mr. Gibson's definition of a lady was the best that was given.

"'A lady,' he said, ignoring the smoke question altogether, 'is a woman who always remembers others and never forgets herself.'"

With the resignation of Mayer Des Planches, Italian Ambassador to the United States, Ladislaus Hengelmüller, the Austrian Ambassador, becomes Dean of the Diplomatic Corps. Thus has happened an event which the social world, at least, has expected with more or less confidence, notes a Washington news dispatch.

The Baroness Hengelmüller, wife of the Austrian Ambassador, for several years figured in a quiet little warfare with Countess Marguerite Cassini, niece of the former Russian Ambassador, for social precedence. Cassini was then dean of the corps, but as the young Countess was only his niece, she could not be officially recognized as the head of his household, and the question was never satisfactorily settled. The two women were regarded as the beauties of the corps, and season after season each made a desperate attempt to outshine the other at social functions. The little by-play each winter kept society highly entertained, for it frequently happened that one would remain away from a particular function because the other was to be there. Usually it was the Baroness who was indisposed, for the Countess Cassini rarely missed anything.

It was known that Baroness Hengelmüller's chief ambition was that her husband might one day be dean of the corps, and fate has at last brought about her wish.

Baroness Hengelmüller is one of the most beautiful women in Washington and a great social favorite. She is highly cultured and her entertainments have always been exclusive and characterized by every element of novelty and attractiveness. She was born in Galzysa-Poland, and when eight years old was sent to the convent of La Dame Couronne, Paris. When she was sixteen years old she was married but in a few years she was left a widow with a little daughter. Many suitors sought her hand, but she finally became the wife of Mr. Hengelmüller and came with him to America, where he was assigned to represent his government. A little more than three years ago the Austrian Government made Mr. Hengelmüller an Ambassador.

Baroness Hengelmüller is the daughter of a member of the Austrian Parliament. Her mother belongs to a family which is able to trace its ancestry in Poland back 400 years. She is a woman of remarkable attainments, a great lover of animals and flowers and maintains a kennel in her Russian home. She has been noted for many novel fads, chief of which is a penchant for rare perfumes. She is an enthusiastic automobilist and it was said last winter that she had installed in her motor a perfume which eliminated the scent of the gasoline and filled the car with the most fragrant aroma.

The Ambassador and Mme. Hengelmüller occupy a residence just opposite the British Embassy in Connecticut avenue, for which the Austrian Government paid $800,000. It is magnificently furnished and contains a rare collection of art treasures which the Ambassador and Mme. Hengelmüller have procured in their travels. The floors of the house are inlaid and each room is perfectly appointed.

The Kaiser has been compelled to teach his subjects good manners, so far as spying upon him too curiously is concerned.

During the maneuvers in Silesia, the Kaiser made his headquarters at Liegnitz and the people of that town were warned by the authorities against unmannerly inquisitiveness in the following notice, which was inspired by the Kaiser:

"The bad taste of turning field glasses and telescopes upon the monarch pains His Majesty excessively, and the urgent wish is therefore hereby expressed to the populace that they will set a pattern for the whole country in respecting the susceptibilities of His Majesty."

When the Crown Prince and Princess were upon their honeymoon they were subjected to great annoyance by inquisitive people, who went so far as to look into the windows of their apartments with telescopes.

The Toy Exposition in Paris now being held at the Summer Alcazar, on the Champs Elysees, is a remarkably attractive display. Under the auspices of M. Lepine, the prefect of police, the inventions of the purveyors of amusement for children are brought to the notice of the public.

The offer of substantial prizes for the best and most ingenious ideas has induced 250 exhibitors to join in the exposition. There are some marvels of ingenuity and patience. The process of manufacture may also be watched from beginning to end, as several stands have been erected where the inventors carry on the work of turning out toys from morning to night.

Many of the articles shown are closely connected with up-to-date events. Consequently automobiles play a great part in the exposition. Toy motor cars, exactly copied from the full-sized machines, are displayed, and the frequent motor car wrecks have provided one inventor with the idea of showing an automobile which, after being wound up, smoothly pursues its dashing course for some distance and then, something going suddenly wrong with the machinery, leaps into the air and falls to pieces, throwing the toy passengers to all points of the compass, to await the succoring hand of the manipulator, who can in a few moments replace the scattered pieces of the machine and re-seat the passengers ready for another wreck.

The president of Bryn Mawr College, Miss Thomas, says she places the hazer on the same plane with the person who hurts birds, tortures kittens or teases a baby. In welcoming the incoming class of 120 girls she said that the college had been free of those rougher forms of hazing which, unfortunately, had existed in sister colleges, such as putting the girls under the pump, standing on their heads, and tearing off their clothes. But that these crude forms of hazing exist among the young lady students of America will surprise many. They should take lessons from the West Point of the past or the Harvard of the present.

Caliph, the hippopotamus in the New York Central Park Zoo, was recently moved to winter quarters in the lion house, and has been sick ever since he has been living indoors. His keeper diagnosed it as acute indigestion, and Caliph received medical treatment in the shape of a bucket of castor oil. Like 99 per cent of humanity, Caliph has an aversion to castor oil. A wedge of wood to pry open Caliph's mouth and a hand force pump overcame his aversion, and, before the crowd that filled the lion house, Head Keeper Snyder pumped in a whole bucketful of castor oil.

A San Francisco Wilderness.

A report of a meeting held in this city on the 30th of December, 1865, has a particular interest for San Franciscans at the present moment. On that date the supervisors took up the subject of the settlement of what were then known as the "outside lands," namely, the territory lying west of Van Ness avenue. The supervisors proposed to limit each intending purchaser of these lands to fifty acres. The proposition was antagonized on the ground that the lands were worthless. Joseph W. Winans, who owned 160 acres, told the Board that he would dispose of the tract for what it cost him, which was $6 an acre. Mr. Hoadley ridiculed the idea of the lands ever becoming valuable. "They would starve a rabbit," he declared, and he added, "The United States can not give a title to these lands, because they are not 'fast,' for the wind will blow them sand away at times to the depth of twenty feet. Forty years have worked great changes in this district west of Van Ness avenue, observes the Chronicle. Before the fire there were plenty of lots which sold for fifty times as much per front foot as Mr. Winans paid for an acre. Now they are blocks on the avenue whose annual rental exceeds the price he paid for his 160 acres thirtyfold. The former wilderness is the most populous part of San Francisco and contains all the active business streets of the city. The change has been extraordinary; those resulting from the steady increase in population of the district during the forty years since the Board held its meeting to decide what to do with the despised lands, is less than those worked in the five months since the conflagration, which have converted a district once almost wholly devoted to residential purposes into a bustling business quarter.

Professor Walter E. Magee, head of the department of physical culture at the State University, has computed statistics comparing cleanliness among the men and women undergraduates which show the women on the long end of the tally sheet. According to Professor Magee, 260 baths per week are taken by each 100 women as compared with 263 baths taken by each 100 men. The estimate is taken on the baths taken in the University gymnasiums, a close record being kept of the number of ablutions per week. The undergraduates of both sexes are crowding the bathrooms to help swell the figures on the score sheet. The next scoring of the tally sheet is to take place at the end of the month.

The two large electric railway schemes which are under way in the Sacramento Valley promise to do much toward developing the northern counties. One of these lines, the Northern Electric Company, has built its road between Chico and Oroville and will soon be in Marysville. Its lines will be extended west of Yuba City to Sacramento. The northern end of the Sacramento Valley is to be covered by the Redding and Red Bluff road, which is to be an electric and steam line. The cutting up of large holdings of land has just begun and the population of the districts adjacent to the lines will be increased.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Dramatic Notes.

Made Fealy, announced as the youngest actor on the dramatic stage, is playing in North-eastern cities in "The Illusion of Beatrice."

Enche Bates's 400th performance in David Belasco's poetic Western drama, "The Girl in the Golden West," will be reached before she leaves the Belasco Theatre in New York to take her engagements in other cities.

In his lecture on Henry Irving, delivered in London a few days ago, Bram Stoker, who was Irving's manager for years, told many new anecdotes. One was of an actor stranded in San Francisco who earned his fare to New York by standing in the gallery line and selling his hat for a week.

Virginia Harned is playing a Rejane part in the adaptation of Sardou's "La Piste" at the Theatre in New York, and is said to be successful. The play in its new arrangement is "The Love Letter," and it seems to have little in the translation. Ferdinand Gottschalk, who is a clever character actor as well as playwright, fashioned the piece for Miss Harned.

Regret Anglin and Henry Miller's success in "The Great Divide," at the Princess Theatre in New York, has been such that seats are now being held for twelve weeks in advance.

"All-of-a-Sudden Peggy," the comedy in which Henrietta Crossman is winning success this season, is by Ernest Denny, a new English playwright. Mr. Denny is well known in London throughout England. He was famous for "All-of-a-Sudden Peggy," which is his play, as a "platform actor."

It is said that Nat Goodwin and May Irwin have agreed to join forces and star together in a rather distant future.

Frances Starr, who has been leading woman in David Warfield in "The Music Master," has come out as a star under the direction of David Belasco, who has signed a five-year contract with the young actress. Miss Starr is a native of California, who made her debut in New York several years ago as a member of the company at the Fifth Avenue Theatre. It is understood that she is to replace Bertha Kalich in a play called "The Dragon Fly."

Wheeler Wilcox's Biblical play, "The Son of Man," was received coldly at the Academy of Music in New York and gave way to "Cape Cod." Wilcox's play was a failure.

News from Rome say Adelaide Ristori left Italy with very little money, owing to mismanagement of her affairs after the death of her husband. Nothing remains of her once large fortune but some souvenirs.

New York is shortly to see a production of the play "The Passes," with Henry Miller and Sarah Le Moyne in important roles.

London dispatch says Mrs. Mary Anderson Navarro has been prevailed upon by Bernard Vaughan, the smart castigator of the smart set, to emerge into the public gaze again. He has prevailed upon her to act some scenes from "Macbeth" and sing a few songs in aid of his Catholic mission during the coming winter. Mme. de Navarro lives in secluded life at Court Farm, near Worcester, Worcestershire. Since she left the stage at the age of twenty-eight, she has been able to go back to it, but has always said no. Hundreds of thousands of dollars have been drawn her.

Mordaunt, a well-known actor and manager, died in a sanatorium at Bedford City, a few days ago. Arthur T. Markham was Mordaunt's real name. He was born in England, sixty-four years ago.

Ellen Terry, a sister of Ellen Terry, is going into her own in spite of the greater fame of her much admired player. In a simple but new play, "Peter's Mother," by a little-known woman playwright, Mrs. de la Tour in London a few days ago Marion Terry made a pronounced success, and there is no talk of an American tour for play and success.

Musical Notes.

Did de Reszke will sing the roles of Desdemona and Leporello at Hammerstein's New Opera House, in what the proprietor expects will be the biggest and best of his grand opera seasons.

Conried is quoted as saying that it is not enough of a cast left in Europe to give any opera more pretentious than "L'Orchestra" or "Fra Diavolo." The Musical World wonders at such an extravagant absurdity.

from the impresario, and says: "No information has been received to the effect that Berlin, Vienna, Munich, Dresden, Cologne, Hamburg, and a hundred or more other German operas are going to close their doors, forced thereto by the big opera trust at the Metropolitan."

"Dolly Dollars" has just completed a successful run at the New York Theatre. Musical plays continued indefinitely at the other New York theatres are "The Red Mill" at the Knickerbocker, "The Little Cherub" at the Criterion, "My Lady's Maid" at the Casino, "About Town" at the Herald Square, "The Tourists" at the Majestic, and "The Spring Chicken" at Daly's.

It is astonishing how much higher is the percentage of pleasure to be derived from "Marrying Mary" as presented by Marie Cahill than when the basic material of that entertainment was exploited, minus melody and show girls, under the title of "My Wife's Husbands" at the Chestnut Street Opera House some three seasons ago, remarks a Philadelphia paper. The original form of the piece was forgotten with cheerfulness and rapidity. Nat Goodwin, long since graduated from the ranks of pure farce, was not exactly a credit to the play, nor was the play a credit to Nat Goodwin.

Paderewski has canceled his American engagements, it is said, because of trouble in one of his arms.

Twenty-three boxes have been sold at the Manhattan Opera House at the rate of $4,000 for each box for the season. This makes an income already of $90,000 from a portion of the boxes.

While Berlin has 800 concerts a year, and will soon have halls enough to make possible seventeen concerts a night, the great composers do not seem to be often drawn toward it. Saint-Saens has just made his first appearance there in twenty-two years, and Grieg, after an absence of twenty years, will give a concert of his own compositions on April 12, 1907.

Victor Herbert has at present exactly a dozen of operatic scores earning him substantial royalties, and is at work on others. Yet he spends much of his time giving concerts. He has just concluded a successful season of concerts at Philadelphia, Pittsburgh, and other cities.

Silvio Hein, the young Austrian-Italian composer of Marie Cahill's new musical play, "Marrying Mary," will send to the governing board of the Burg Theatre in Vienna, by invitation, an opera which he has almost completed, founded on Longfellow's "Hiawatha." The work, in serious vein, is intended to interpret the poetry and rude music of the American Indian. The leading character is said to be the famous Pere Marquette.

Olga Samaroff, a talented young American pianist, now appearing in concerts in New England, will come West this winter.

Anna Held, who has been in eclipse, so far as the stage is concerned, for two seasons, effected her reappearance at the Chestnut Street Opera House in Philadelphia recently. It was the first production of Harry B. Smith and Max Hoffman's latest musical comedy, "The Parisian Model." Charles A. Bigelow, Henry Leoni, Truly Shattuck, Mabella Baker and Louis B. Foley are conspicuous in the long cast.

The failure of Kubelik to come to this country after the plans had been made, is said to be due to the illness of his wife. It is expected that he will make an American tour in 1907.

A new comic opera by Walter Slaughter is among the promised productions of the current London season. It is entitled "Lady Tatters," this being the name of a strolling player with whom Charles II falls in love. She rejects his suit, for she is the sweetheart of an army officer, and the monarch then finds a pretext for having him arrested and imprisoned in the Tower. The story, which is by Herbert Leonard, ends happily.

Olive Fremstad, Olga Samaroff and Pentschnickoff will be the soloists for three orchestral concerts to be given by the St. Louis Choral Symphony Society beginning November 8.

The American tour of Moriz Rosenthal, the Austrian pianist, will include seventy-five concerts in the Eastern cities.

Grand opera at popular prices will be given at Covent Garden, London, this season by a company headed by Mme. Melba and Signorina Rina Giachetti. Two works new to the London public will be presented. One is Signor Umberto Giordano's "Fedora," a setting of Sardou's great drama, arranged by Signor Arturo Colautti. It was first performed in Milan in 1898. The other novelty will be Signor Alfredo Catalani's "Lorelei," originally produced in Turin in 1890; this is a revised version of his opera "Elda," which was brought out ten years earlier in the same city.

De Gogorza, the Spanish Baritone, to appear.

Every one who attended the Emma Eames concerts in this city will remember the veritable sensation caused by the singing of the baritone, Signor Emilio De Gogorza. At that time Manager Greenbaum was asked to bring this artist out in recital some time, as the audiences could not get enough of his delightful singing. It has been arranged to present Mr. Gogorza in two recitals, one to be given in San Francisco on Tuesday evening, October 30, at Christian Science Hall, and the second at Ye Liberty Theatre, Oakland, on Wednesday afternoon, October 31. He will sing a recital program consisting of groups of Italian, French, English, and rarely heard Spanish songs, and several operatic arias.

Mr. Paul Steindorff, the well-known orchestral conductor, will appear for the first time since he came here to the old Baldwin Theatre with Ovide Musin and Mme. Trebelli, as accompanist.

The seats will be on sale at Sherman, Clay & Co.'s for the city concert, and at Ye Liberty box-office for the Oakland evening.

The Orpheum.

The Empire City Quartette, the entertaining singing comedians, will head the bill at the Orpheum this Sunday afternoon. Sim Collins and Lew Hart, "Two Strong Men," will upset the audience by their burlesque on the usual feats of strength performed by athletes. Augusta Glose has been to London since visiting here and has something new and novel to show music and amusement lovers. Max Millian, a young violin virtuoso, who has made his mark in Europe and America, will be heard for the first time in this city. The six Glinsereitis, gymnasts; Hanson and Nelson, experts in singing and dancing; Burton and Brookes, the singers and comedians; Raffayette's acrobatic dogs, and Orpheum motion pictures, showing the latest novelties, will complete a varied programme. Attractions of every description are to be found on the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located.

Five men were killed and two were seriously injured by the falling of walls last Saturday in the burned district. The men were clearing away debris at the time but had been warned of their danger immediately before the accident. One man saved his life by standing close to the base of the wall when the great mass of bricks toppled and fell over him.

LITERARY NOTES.

Byron in Italy.

The final eight years of Lord Byron's life, except the last few months in Greece, were spent in Italy. When the self-ostracized poet left England in 1816, it was with the determination never to return to his native land, for which he cherished so many real and fanciful grievances. The beauty of Italy, her climate and her people, at once inspired the fiery Byron, and the succeeding years were the most prolific period of his literary composition. Venice was all that his poetic imagination pictured, and he writes of her as the "fairy city of his heart"; as he was later to exclaim grandly of the Eternal City: "O Rome, my country, city of the soul!"

"With Byron in Italy" is a selection of the poems and letters of the poet, which have to do with his life in Italy from 1816 to 1823, edited by Anna Bennesson McMahan. To read "Childe Harold," "Manfred," the "Lament of Tasso," side by side with the letters written to Tom Moore or to Murray, his publisher, is to catch the very spirit of the poems. Byron for all his English birth was an intense Italian. He spoke and thought and wrote in Italian; he entered into the very heart of the Italians' home-life; he made their political intrigues his own, and was the leader of a revolutionary secret society; and, of course, paid to their women the homage of devout admiration. One would hardly recommend his poems for their guide-book accuracy, but it is interesting to know that "it was the sight of the numerous English travelers following in the footsteps of Childe Harold, with Murray's handbook under their arms, that suggested the first Baedeker." The book contains sixty beautiful photographs of scenery and art masterpieces.

Omar Khayyam and Ecclesiastes.

To paraphrase the old Hebrew book of Ecclesiastes in the manner of Fitzgerald's translation of Omar Khayyam would seem to be a daring venture. Yet William Byron Forbush justifies the attempt in a novel and interesting volume, "Ecclesiastes in the Metre of Omar." Mr. Forbush reminds us that Ecclesiastes is the most modern book in the Bible; that it is the voice of the Jewish business man of to-day, "disillusioned and careless of orthodoxy"; that it belongs "in the class with Byron, Heine, Pascal, and Omar Khayyam." Like the Persian, the Hebrew poet-philosopher is weary of the sameness of human experiences, "What hath been is what will be . . . and there is nothing new under the sun." Therefore, says Omar, "Drink, for you know not why you go nor where"; and the Hebrew agrees: "A man hath no better thing under the sun than to eat, and to drink, and to be merry." But the author of Ecclesiastes, unlike Omar, is a bachelor, and will have none of woman. And the conclusion of each is the same, "Vanity of Vanities—all is Vanity."

A Delightful Juvenile Story.

E. Nesbit's story "The Railway Children" was written for the juvenile reader but it will interest the older one. The three brave children, Roberta, Peter, and Phyllis have had every whim gratified until one sad day their father is arrested on suspicion of selling government secrets to the Russians. Mother takes up the burden of the little household cheerfully, but the task would have been too much for her, if the quick-witted children had not planned extraordinary means to assist her. They live near a railroad station, and in their rambles happen on a landslide which would have resulted in great loss of life if they had not flagged the train. This wins influential friends for them, who take up the father's cause and help to establish his innocence.

"The Railway Children" is a touching little story, that is destined to win a host of young admirers for Mrs. Nesbit's books. C. E. Brock's drawings add to the interest of the tale.

A New California Story.

Sonoma County in the fifties is the scene of Charles D. Stuart's novel, "Casa Grande." This is Mr. Stuart's prentice effort at novel writing, although he is the author of short stories of power.

John Miller, a young Southerner, has an unconfirmed Mexican grant title to Casa Grande, a cattle range of seventy-five hundred acres. Squatters have settled on a portion of his ranch, and he orders the sheriff to dispossess them. Bailey, the sheriff, has fallen in love with Belle, the squatter girl, but he takes up the task resolutely. Then ensues a series of attacks on the ranch, with exciting adventure, and at the end, Miller ensures himself from further trouble by marrying Belle, after an unconventional Western courtship.

A Sailor of Fortune.

Albert Bigelow Paine has written the personal memoirs of Captain B. S. Osborn, under the title, "A Sailor of Fortune." It is a remarkable narrative of a remarkable life. Since 1838 Captain Osborn has followed the sea, with few interruptions. His memory goes back to the days when steam and the telegraph were unknown, and when South Sea cannibals, Chinese pirates, and mutineers everywhere, added excitement to a seafaring life. His first long trip was one of the most remarkable voyages ever made, from Antarctic to Arctic on a whaling vessel. Captain Osborn had stirring adventures as a commander in the Anglo-Chinese navy, suppressing the pirate industry, and subsequently as captain of a ship in the Argentine navy. He participated in most of the naval battles during the Civil War, and was signal officer for Farragut in the expedition against New Orleans. As organizer of the Mexican "navy" in 1866, his experiences were chiefly amusing, but they led to his acquaintance with Napoleon III, of whom he gives us an interesting glimpse.

Famous Poems of the Sea.

Until the nineteenth century, the sea, as a theme for poetry, and, for the matter of that, for prose fiction of high quality, was singularly neglected by English writers. Nearly all the English poets, from Chaucer, "who dismisses the sea with a shudder," to Keats, have a dislike for, or a dread of, the sea, and a hatred of sea-life and no high opinion of sailors, says John Masfield. The balladists, however, sang roaring sea-songs, and some of these verses are among the most vigorous in the language.

Mr. Masfield's "A Sailor's Garland," an anthology of sea-poems, includes the best of the early and modern songs that tell of the majesty and beauty of the water, of the tempests and the terrors, of the sea-battles, of the buccaneers, and of the lass at home.

New Publications.

"Joseph Vance," by William de Morgan, is a book to be read and reread. This "ill-written autobiography" purports to tell the life-story of a middle-class Englishman, from his boyhood, fifty years ago, to his successful manhood as an inventing mechanical engineer. Joe Vance, like most of us, had little of sensational happenings in his history, but there are a few tears, a deal of laughter, and a wealth of old-fashioned sentiment of excellent flavor. Henry Holt & Co., New York; $1.50.

The Archbishop of Canterbury says that if man could personally question the Deity, even for an hour, the first question that would rush to his lips would be: "The life beyond—what is it? What is its relation to the life about us?" To the discussion of these questions Lilian Whiting brings the result of modern scientific research in "From Dream to Vision of Life." Little, Brown & Co., Boston; $1.00 net.

"Many Moods and Many Minds" is a book of indifferent verses, called "poems" by the author, Louis James Block. The John Lane Company, New York.

In "The Story of Scraggles," George Wharton James describes the emotions and behavior of a crippled fledgling sparrow, the author's constant companion while he was writing "In and Out of the Old Missions of California." Little, Brown & Co., Boston; $1.00.

A strong and well told tale of the Middle West is "The Upstart," by Henry M. Hyde. The "upstart" is Pat McCormick, a shiftless ne'er-do-well, who yet when his adopted country called, proved he could face a hero's death. Century Company, New York; $1.50.

Three boys in a runaway airship, their adventures in a wild storm with a drowning man, and some gentlemanly jewel smugglers, to say nothing of several wonderful animals, are the principal features in an up-to-date romance, "The Airship Dragonfly," by William John Hopkins. Doubleday, Page & Co., New York; $1.25 net.

"Mars and Its Mystery," by Edward S. Morse, is a study of the planet for the general reader. The author's comments on the so-called canals and other markings upon the surface of Mars are reasonable and intelligible. Professor Morse gives the various pronouncements of Schiaparelli, Lowell, and others as to the probable character of these remarkable markings, and their supposed significance. Little, Brown & Co., Boston; $2.00 net.

A powerful present-day romance of London political and social life is "The Master Spirit," by Sir William Magnay. The story is written along original lines, with strongly drawn characters, and is replete with dramatic incident. Little, Brown & Co., Boston; $1.50.

"Side-Lights on Astronomy," and essays on scientific subjects that appeal to the popular imagination, by Simon Newcomb, is a most interesting and instructive volume. The unsolved problems of astronomy, the extent, structure, and duration of the universe, how planets are weighed, rain-making, the fairyland of geometry, and the outlook for the flying-machine, are among the themes discussed. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; $2 net.

J. Morris, an authority on Japan, has written a volume of biographical essays, "The Makers of Japan." Mr. Morris gives the salient facts of the chief personages who have made modern Japan. Published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago; $3.00.

"The $30,000 Bequest" includes Mark Twain's most recent writings, also several stories that have never appeared in book-form, and fugitive essays. The book is handsomely bound and illustrated. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; $1.75.

A beautiful holiday edition of "The Jessamy Bride," by F. Frankfort Moore, has been issued. The volume is illustrated with six strikingly handsome pictures in color by C. Allan Gilbert. This charming tale of Goldsmith and Garrick, of Dr. Johnson and Burke, has never lost favor with the reading world since its publication ten years ago. Published by Duffield & Co., New York; $2.00.

An amateur boy detective, with wondrous theories and deductions; a village poetess, who writes "pieces" for birthday-parties and anniversaries and weddings; a country editor, the oracle of Plainville; and Johnny Thompson, printer's devil, who tells the story, are some of the very amusing characters in "The Gentleman Ragman," by Wilbur Nesbit. The chapters in which he tells how the girls tried the barefoot cure in a stubby field, and how Johnny's mother bought clothes for the male members of the family, are rollickingly funny. Published by Harper & Brothers, New York; $1.50.

The first three volumes of the new edition of Henrik Ibsen's writings are soon to appear from Charles Scribner's Sons. They will contain "Brand," "The League of Youth," "The Pillars of Society," "The Doll's House," and "Ghosts." For the most part the works have been translated by William Archer, who has written new introductions for each volume. The set will be complete in eleven volumes.

An interesting lesson on birds, fishes, flowers and reptiles is taught children in "The Pond in the Marshy Meadow," by Anne Helena Woodruff. Saalfeld Publishing Company; $1.50.

A very pretty mediæval tale for boys and girls is "Gabriel and the Hour-Book," by Evelyn Stein. Gabriel mixes the colors, and grinds the gold, and gathers the pattern-flowers, for the monks who illuminate books, and the results of his own attempts at artistic work is a tender episode. There are six handsome illustrations in color, by Adelaide Everhardt. L. C. Page & Co., Boston; $1.00.

One does not demand human interest, probability or verisimilitude from Rider Haggard's work; if, as in his earlier books, he entertains us with pseudo-mysticism, melodramatic adventure, and luxurious invention, we are satisfied. But with the passing years Mr. Haggard's fancy is fading. He returns to South Africa for the scene of his latest romance, "The Spirit of Bambaste." Buried treasure, reincarnation, and mesmerism are the materials for the story, but they are not employed with the author's best literary skill. Longmans, Green & Co., New York.

Perhaps it is the approach of Thanksgiving Day that makes Alice Brown's new volume of short stories, "The Country Road," seem so seasonable. One is never very far from the kitchen and sitting-room in these delightful tales of rural New England. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; $1.50.

The most notable event for Thackeray lovers, since the publication of the Biographical Edition of Thackeray's Works under the editorship of his daughter, Anne Thackeray Ritchie, is the announcement that a Thackeray Club is to be started in London. A small committee of distinguished literary men has been formed to organize the Titmarsh Club, as the name will be. It is proposed to limit the membership of the club to fifty-two, the number of years of Thackeray's life. They will dine together twice a year.

LITERARY NOTES.

A Satire on London Society.

are introduced to several charming social scenes of London, and a few cads, in E. Lucas' "Listener's Lure." Mr. Lucas calls it "a Kensington comedy." It is told in the form of letters, and deals with the social life, the matrimonial entanglements, and the mutual bothers of the London suburb. The center of the central figure, Lynn Harberton, is the new edition of Boswell's "Johnson," Mr. Lucas an opportunity for some excellent literary fooling. The ardent epistles to Graham, Harberton's ward, from many friends, and her replies, furnish the love story. And the element of sentiment and the correspondence leading to the marriage of Harberton and Edith. The author has a very agreeable tale in "Listener's Lure." The satire is clever and good-natured, and the occasional literary preachments are of little attention. Mr. Lucas's style is admirably adapted to a story of this sort. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York, $1.50.

Shepherds' Life in California.

meadows of the Sierras, where lean flocks at and improve their fleeces, the mesas, if spring lingers, there are young lupines, alfalfa, and "marrow-fat" weed; the foot-hill offer young and tender browsing in pastures—this is the background of Mary Austin's new book, "The Flocks." Austin tells the story of sheepherding in California from the year 1770, when Rivera y la brought up the first flocks from Velasco. Those were the days of large leisure when fall shearings there was time enough for a festa lasting two or three days, or at least for a long baile. Mission Indians tended the flocks; now the herders and shearers are Mexicans, Basques and even Manx. The author spent several years among the flocks, and she gives us faithful glimpses of their life in the open range; of the long passage on the long trail from shearing to shearing; of how the day's work is accompanied by their rivalries, and hatred of their enemy, the government ranger; of their life from the beasts of prey. There is a very interesting chapter on the sheep dogs. The volume is fully illustrated, with many pictures and chapter beadings in half-tone, and a decorative cover. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston, $1.00.

The Country of the Loire.

more charming journey may one undertake whether he pursues his trip on the actual river or by the fireside in his own home, than to leisurely along the banks of the Loire? The river richer in historic associations—of the d'Arc, Catherine de Medici, Louis XIV, Louis XVI, Charles Martel, Nantes and its Edict, the city of saints; what storied stream more rich with literary interest—of Balzac, Dumas, Rousseau, Madame de Staël and Sand; what countryside has so many monuments of Renaissance architecture—of chateaux, picturesque castles, and magnificent cathedrals? It is Milton's "Castles and Chateaux of France," is the record of three visits to the country. Nothing could be more complete than the method of the author and her party. They first followed the regular tourist route, and then they explored the country on their own way in leisurely fashion; and on their trip, they carefully filled up gaps left by previous rambles. The result is a very interesting narrative that reveals to us every detail of the old chateaux, their legends and their romantic memories. The book is illustrated by many colored plates reproduced from paintings made on the spot, by the artist, McManus. Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston, $3.00.

Books for Young People.

For readers of to-day are fortunate in the wide variety of books that are written for entertainment and instruction. Among the best books for boys and girls are: "Legends of the Child Should Know," edited by Hamilton Wright, a collection of the great legends of the world (Doubleday, Page & Co.; 90 cents); "Dolores Bacon, a selection of the best of all nations (Doubleday, Page & Co.; 90 cents); "The Tenting of the Tillicums," by Herbert Bashford, a story of boy-life on the prairie (Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.; 75 cents); "The Boys' Life of Lincoln," by Helen Parkes, based on the life of Lincoln by Nicolay and Bassett (Century Company; $1.50); "Brothers and Sisters," by Abbie Farwell Brown, fourteen interesting short stories (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.; $1.00); "The Wild Flower Book," a story of out-of-door life (F. A. Stokes Co.; $1.50 net); and three delightful story books, "Ready, Steady, The Reliable," by Lily F. Wesselhoft, "Janet: Her Winter in Quebec," by Anna Chapin Ray, "A Sheaf of Stories," by Susan Coolidge (Little, Brown & Co.; $1.50).

A Guide to Chaucer's Poetry.

Of the interminable list of poets who have written since Geoffrey Chaucer was "nayed in his chest" and laid away in Westminster Abbey, Shakespeare and Milton may be said to be the only ones that surpass him. And well it is, as Robert Kilburn Root says in "The Poetry of Chaucer," the simple lays of the quaint old medieval story-teller are attaining an ever-increasing popularity. Professor Root's volume is a stimulating and intelligent guide to the study and appreciation of Chaucer. But one is impatient at his academic indifference to the difficulty of Chaucer's language; he dismisses the subject with the brief statement, "it is by no means so great as at first appears." That aside, the book is an admirable introduction to the "Canterbury Tales."

Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; $1.50.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

Professor Flugel of the University of California is engaged on a Chaucer lexicon.

A new book called "Some Reminiscences," by William Michael Rossetti, will contain a full account of the early days of the Rossetti family and the careers of Dante Gabriel and Christina, with sidelights on the pre-Raphaelite movement, of the famous organ of which, The Germ, William Rossetti was editor.

Pierre Loti, the French author, has just been promoted from captain of frigate to captain of battleship. He has never quitted his service in the navy. His latest story, "Disenchanted" (Macmillan Co.) was reviewed in the Argonaut last week.

"When We Dead Awaken," for reasons not easy to fathom, is reported to be one of the best selling of Ibsen's plays. Perhaps, as some one has suggested, it is because the title is "catchy."

A new edition of "The North Star" by Mrs. M. E. Henry-Ruffin, is announced. This will be a very timely work on account of the new form of government lately adopted by Norway, as the hero of Mrs. Ruffin's story is the first king of that country, and his coronation took place at Trondheim, or "Nidaros" as it was anciently called, the city that witnessed the coronation of King Haakon a few weeks ago. "The North Star" has been well received abroad.

The thirty-third edition of Max Muller's "Memories" has just been put to press by A. C. McClurg & Co. The fiftieth edition of Cum-nock's "Choice Readings" is announced by the same publishers.

Two of the younger writers of New York's bohemian set were talking, as reported by the Sun, and one said: "I sold a story yesterday to Mr. Blank, editor of the Prize Winner Magazine." "That's good," responded the other, cordially. "Did you have a talk with him?" "Yes." "Odd sort of chap, but nice. Miss Dash took him a story not long ago and he declined it. She asked him if he would tell her why and he said: 'Really, Miss Dash, that story is too good for us. What we want is rot—nice, sweet rot.'"

Mr. Rowell's index to his book, "Forty Years an Advertising Agent," is what might be termed one of the curiosities of literature. Not only are references to persons and things indexed, but sentences and phrases are also thus privileged. The author of the volume compiled the index himself.

Stewart Edward White, the writer, and his wife are to be the guests of President Roosevelt during the holiday season. They recently left Los Angeles for the East.

Thomas E. Watson, who founded Watson's Magazine about eighteen months ago, and who has been editor-in-chief from the first, has resigned and will devote himself to literary work at his home in Georgia. Colonel W. D. Mann of Town Topics is the chief stockholder in the Tom Watson Magazine corporation.

A paragraph of anecdotes in Harper's Weekly about Thomas Hardy says that his first novel has never been published. It was a revolutionary story called "The Poor Man and the Lady," and he was persuaded to withhold it from publication by no other than George Meredith. According to the same paragraph, "Tess" was inspired by the sight of a real girl's face. Mr. Hardy was walking down a lane in West Dorset when a farmer's cart rumbled past carrying a country lass. He never saw her again, but he began to weave a romance about her, out of which in due time grew "Tess of the D'Urbervilles."

An unusual volume of Chinese stories by the late Lafcadio Hearn entitled "Some Chinese Ghosts," originally published in 1887, has been so much sought for of late that a new edition of the book will be brought out. Mr. Hearn stated in the original preface that in preparing the legends he "sought especially for weird beauty" and that he had culled from "the vast and mysterious pleasure grounds of Chinese fancy a few of the marvelous flowers there growing."

L. Frank Baum, author of "The Wizard of Oz," has written a new juvenile, called "John Dough and the Cherub."

In his new life of "Walt Whitman" (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.), Bliss Perry finds an interesting literary kinship between Whitman and Rousseau: "Both men were sentimentalists, by nature sensuous and egotistic. Both were rhapsodists, uttering wonderfully fine things about nature, education, religion. Each had the true mystic's incapacity for thought, joined with an intuitive perception of some very vital truths. They were alike in their earnestness as in their morbid self-consciousness."

A number of studies in the history of Oriental religion have been included in a volume by Dr. J. G. Frazer of Trinity College, Cambridge, which the Macmillans are publishing with the title "Adonis, Attis, Osiris." The work deals exhaustively with the Adonis myths at Byblus and Paphos, with "The Burning of Melcarth and Sandan," with "Sardanapalus and Hercules," "Volcanic Religion," together with the myths of Attis, Osiris, and other Egyptian deities.

Jack London to Face a Waterloo.

Accusations of plagiarism have already been made against Jack London, although but two installments of his latest story, "Before Adam," have appeared. Its similarity to "The Story of Ab" has already been noticed in this column. According to a news dispatch, J. T. Bramhall, one of the executive officers of the Chicago Press Club, sent a terse but expressive telegram to the publishers of Everybody's Magazine saying: "Jack London is the most clumsy kleptomaniac I ever observed."

Stanley Waterloo was in the reception room of the club and laughed. "I am not personally acquainted with Mr. London," he said, "but I am convinced that he is a clever writer when he uses other people's brains. He has accomplished in six weeks what it took me fifteen years of deep study and investigation to produce. 'The Story of Ab' was my pet, and I worked on it for fifteen long years. Jack London not only starts out with the same proposition I based my work on, but he employs in some instances practically the same language."

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

The engagement is announced of Miss Anita Harvey, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. J. Downey Harvey, to Mr. Oscar Cooper.

The engagement is announced of Miss Helen Fairfax McNaught, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joseph Fletcher McNaught, of Seattle, Washington, to Mr. Edward Hamilton Geary, of this city. The wedding will take place during the winter.

The wedding of Miss Gladys McClung, daughter of the late Major J. W. McClung and Mrs. McClung, to Midshipman Nelson H. Goss, U. S. N., took place on Tuesday morning at the Swedenborgian Church on Lyon street. The ceremony was performed at 11 o'clock by the Rev. Dr. Frederick Clappett, rector of Trinity Church. The bride was given away by Mrs. McClung, and Miss Marian Huntington was the maid of honor and only attendant. Midshipman and Mrs. Goss left immediately for a brief wedding journey, and on their return will live at Mare Island until the U. S. S. Charleston is ordered elsewhere.

The marriage of Miss Anna Katharine Buck, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. Joshua Shackford Buck, of this city, to Captain James Thomas Bootes, U. S. M. C., took place on August 18th on board the U. S. S. Wisconsin at Chefoo, China. Mrs. Franklin J. Drake, the wife of Captain Drake, U. S. N., commander of the Wisconsin, was the matron of honor, and Lieutenant-Commander George R. Evans, U. S. N., of the cruiser Cincinnati, was the best man. Captain and Mrs. Bootes are now in San Francisco, the Wisconsin having arrived here last week and Mrs. Bootes coming across on the army transport Logan.

The wedding of Miss Martha F. Lee and Mr. John H. Speck, whose engagement was recently announced, will take place on November 20th. Mr. Philip P. Paschel is to be the best man, and Miss Beatrice Cooley will be maid of honor. Miss Lee is the youngest daughter of Mrs. Martha Lee. Mr. Speck is a real estate broker, having been in business in San Francisco for a long time, but is a native of Pennsylvania, coming from good old Pennsylvania Dutch and Quaker ancestry. He is a director in the Western National Bank, director of the Young Men's Christian Association, trustee of the Consolidated Wesleyan M. E. Church, and a member of the Union League and Olympic Clubs.

In the Church of the Heavenly Rest, New York, on October 3, Miss Isabel Birkmaier, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. George L. Birkmaier, was married to Mr. Frederick Hugo von Ullrich, son of Colonel Hugo C. von Ullrich. Only the immediate relatives were present at the ceremony, which was performed by the Rev. Herbert Shipman. The bride was given away by her father, but was otherwise unattended. Mr. and Mrs. von Ullrich will reside in New York.

Mrs. Eleanor Martin was the hostess at a dinner on Thursday evening last in honor of her grand-daughter, Miss Anita Harvey, whose engagement to Mr. Oscar Cooper was announced on that evening. Those present were: Mrs. B. B. Cutler, Mr. and Mrs. J. Downey Harvey, Judge and Mrs. J. A. Cooper, Baron and Baroness von Schroeder, Mr. and Mrs. Henry T. Scott, Mr. and Mrs. Fred Kohl, Miss Anita Harvey, Miss Genevieve Harvey, Miss Ethel Cooper, Miss Janet von Schroeder, Miss Alice Hager, Miss Maude Bourn, Mr. Peter Martin, Mr. Walter Martin, Mr. Enrique Grau, Mr. James D. Phelan, Mr. Joseph Tobin, Mr. Thomas Magee, Mr. Frank King, Mr. Thomas Barbour, and Mr. George Cadwallader.

Mrs. George C. Boardman was the hostess at a luncheon on Thursday of last week at her home on Jackson street in honor of Mrs. A. P. Niblack. Those present were: Mrs. W. P. Harington, Mrs. George W. Gibbs, Mrs. William Leahy, Mrs. I. Lawrence Poole, Mrs. Harry C. Benson, Mrs. James Otis, Mrs. John Evelyn Page, Mrs. J. Windham Carey, and Mrs. Alexander Keyes.

Mrs. R. Porter Ashe was the hostess recently at a bridge party at her home in San Rafael in honor of her sister, Mrs. Frances Davis, who has been her guest. Mrs. Ashe entertained five tables of guests.

Captain and Mrs. Charles Plummer Perkins entertained at a breakfast recently on board the U. S. S. Pensacola, at Yerba Buena Island, in honor of Captain Cappamazzo, of the Italian cruiser Dogali. Those present were: Mrs. Eleanor Martin, Count and Countess Naselli, Mrs. Ynez Shorb White, Captain Cappamazzo, and Marquis Capelli.

Mrs. Horace Blanchard Chase has been entertaining at her country place in Napa Valley Miss Anita Harvey, Miss Genevieve Harvey, Mr. Oscar Cooper, and Mr. Harry N. Stetson.

Mr. and Mrs. Safford Colby, who have been in Mill Valley during the summer, have returned to town and have a house on Sacramento street for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. J. Athearn Folger, who are living at their home at Woodside throughout the year, went down last week to Santa Barbara for a brief stay.

Mr. and Mrs. Charles D. Farquharson have returned from Blithedale and are at their home on Jackson street.

Mr. and Mrs. H. R. Judah and Miss Christine Judah will leave shortly for a two months' tour of Japan and China.

Mr. and Mrs. I. Lowenberg have returned from an enjoyable visit to Mr. and Mrs. Abraham Lincoln Brown in Los Angeles.

Mrs. Robert M. Howland and Miss Louise Howland have left Sausalito for Portland, Oregon, for an indefinite period.

Mr. and Mrs. John Bermingham, who had been at Del Monte for a few days, left there on the 20th for Santa Catalina, where they will stay a week.

Hon. Jackson Hatch.

From the San Jose News of October 3, 1906.

Jackson Hatch of San Jose

Who is a candidate on the State Democratic ticket for the office of Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, is a native of California, having been born in Tuolumne County. He is the son of the late Colonel F. L. Hatch, a prominent lawyer whose early career was identified with Yuba County, and who at the time of his death was the Superior Judge of Colusa County. Mr. Hatch has had a varied public career, having been at the age of twenty-one elected to the District Attorneyship of Colusa County, which position he retained for four years. He then entered upon the practice of his profession, and has continued actively in it ever since. Later on he was appointed Assistant United States Attorney and retained that position in San Francisco for three years, and then came to San Jose, where he has resided for about fourteen years. Mr. Hatch has been prominently identified with the order of Native Sons, having been one of the grand officers on two occasions, and with the Order of Elks, having been exalted ruler of San Jose Lodge for three terms and a delegate to the Grand Lodge at Atlantic City. He was nominated and elected one of the Presidential electors on the Democratic ticket during one of the Cleveland campaigns. He has delivered public addresses during several political campaigns practically all over California. At the Democratic State convention in 1890, held in San Jose, he was nominated for Associate Justice of the Supreme Court, and has been on several occasions prominently mentioned as a candidate for Governor. He has a wide acquaintance over California and has taken part in many of the leading law suits in courts of the State in recent years.

At a director's meeting of the Mount Tamalpais Railway Company, R. Emerson Warfield was elected a director to take the place left vacant by the death of his father, the late General R. H. Warfield; C. F. Runyon was elected vice-president. The other directors and officers remain the same as before, with S. B. Cushing as president.

PERSONAL.

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy people who are or have been stationed Pacific Coast points:

Brigadier-General Frederick Funston, U. S. A., arrived this week from Cuba, having stopped en route in Washington, D. C. General Funston has been relieved from the command of the Department of California and assigned to the command of the Southwestern Division with headquarters at St. Louis. General Funston has been succeeded as commander of this department by Brigadier-General John J. Pershing, U. S. A., who arrived on Saturday last from the Orient. Rear-Admiral Bowman H. McCalla, U. S. N., retired, and Mrs. McCalla, who have made their home in Santa Barbara since the early summer, when Admiral McCalla was retired, left last week for the East, where they will remain until about December 1st.

Colonel Elijah W. Halford, U. S. A., has assumed the position of chief paymaster of the Department of California, relieving Colonel William H. Comegys, U. S. A., who goes to Governor's Island, New York.

Lieutenant-Colonel Lea Febiger, U. S. A., acting inspector-general, has been granted two months' leave of absence to take effect upon his being relieved from duty in the inspector general department.

Major Adam Slaker, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., arrived here this week, after three weeks' leave, and assumed command of Fort Baker, relieving Captain Henry B. Clark, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., who has been in temporary command since the departure of Colonel J. P. Isser, U. S. A.

Lieutenant-Commander Casey B. Morgan, U. S. N., has been ordered to additional duty as inspector of ordnance at the Union Iron Works, San Francisco.

Captain John J. Bradley, Fourteenth Infantry, U. S. A., has been detailed as acting judge advocate and ordered to report to the commanding general of the Department of Columbia for duty as judge advocate of that department.

Orders issued to Captain William Chamberlain, General Staff, U. S. A., are amended to direct him upon the expiration of his present leave of absence, to repair from Fort Monroe, Virginia, to Washington, D. C., for the purpose of consulting with the chief of artillery on the subject of the fire control system being installed at San Francisco harbor, then proceed to Fort Leavenworth, Kansas, for consultation with the commanding officer of the artillery sub-post on the subject of the new field artillery equipment, and upon the completion of this duty to proceed to San Francisco and report in person to the commanding general of the Pacific Division for duty as assistant chief of staff.

Captain Lorrain T. Richardson, adjutant, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., Fort McVick, has been granted two months' leave of absence, with permission to apply for an extension of one month.

Captain William S. Graves, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Presidio of Monterey, has been granted one month's leave of absence.

Lieutenant Emory Winship, U. S. N., who has recently been detached from duty as inspector of ordnance at the Union Iron Works and granted three months' leave, will appear before the retiring board shortly.

Lieutenant Edwin C. Long, U. S. A., aide-de-camp to Brigadier-General Frederick Funston, U. S. A., returned on Saturday last from New Orleans, where he went on his way to join General Funston in Cuba. His orders were changed, however, and he returned here for a brief stay before proceeding to St. Louis with General Funston.

Lieutenant Fred W. Palmer, assistant surgeon, U. S. A. from Fort Bayard, New Mexico, has recently undergone his examination for promotion before an army medical board, of which Colonel George H. Torney is president, at the Army General Hospital at the Presidio of San Francisco.

Lieutenant Daniel F. Shean, U. S. A., and M. Shean (formerly Miss Ursula Stone) arrived on the transport Logan last week from Manila and are the guests of Mrs. Shean's parents, Mr. and Mrs. Charles B. Stone. Lieutenant Shean will return early in November to the Philippines, but Mrs. Shean will remain here during the winter.

Lieutenant Robert C. Richardson, Jr., Fourth Cavalry, U. S. A., Presidio of San Francisco, has been ordered to proceed to West Point and report for duty as instructor in mathematics in the Military Academy.

Lieutenant Edward A. Sturges, Fifth Cavalry, U. S. A., who is to marry Miss Edna Montgomery, of this city, on October 30th, has been ordered to report to Major George H. Milam, Ninth Cavalry, president of an examining board at Fort Riley, Kansas, for examination for promotion.

Lieutenant Robert J. Binford, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Presidio of Monterey, has been granted leave of absence for one month and fifty days.

Lieutenant William A. Duncan, assistant surgeon, U. S. A., on the transport Logan, received orders to report to the commanding officer of the Twenty-first Infantry, and accompanied that regiment to Fort Logan. Upon his arrival there he will avail himself of the leave of absence granted him.

The Twenty-first Infantry, U. S. A., commanded by Colonel Charles A. Williams, U. S. A., arrived on the transport Logan from the Philippines on Thursday of last week and left on the following Saturday for Fort Logan, Colorado, relieving the battalion of the Twenty-ninth Infantry stationed there.

A general court-martial appointed to meet at the Presidio of San Francisco on Friday of last week, consisted of the following officers: Captain William H. Wassell, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A.; Captain Dwight E. Aultman, Artillery Corps, U. S. A.; Captain James F. Brady, Artillery Corps, U. S. A.; Captain John W. C. Abbott, Artillery Corps, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Alden Trotter, Artillery Corps, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Raymond W. Briggs, Artillery Corps, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Fred L. Perry, Artillery Corps, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Philip Remington, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Carr W. Waller, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., and Lieutenant Edward H. De Armond, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., judge advocate.

A general court-martial was appointed to meet at Camp McKinley, Honolulu, H. T., on Monday last. The detail for the court was as follows: Captain Ross L. Bush, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A.; Captain James V. Heidt, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A.; Captain Ralph E. Ingram, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A.; Captain John B. Schoeffel, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Kurtz, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Hiram M. Cooper, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A.; Lieutenant Charles F. Conry, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A., and Lieutenant William E. Roberts, Tenth Infantry, U. S. A.

Secretary of State Charles F. Curry has received estimates showing that the registration this year is much greater than it was two years ago. Curry believes there have been many new arrivals in the State. The figures indicate that there will be an exceptionally large vote at the coming election. The total vote in the State in 1902 was 304,473. The registration then was 384,028. The total vote in 1904 was 331,435. The voting strength of the State is now placed at 452,390.

VERSE FROM RECENT BOOKS.

KHRISTNA AND HIS FLUTE.

Be still, my heart, and listen,
For sweet and yet acute
I hear the wistful music
Of Khristna and his flute.
Across the cool, blue evenings,
Throughout the burning days,
Persuasive and beguiling,
He plays and plays and plays.

Ah, none may hear such music
Resistant to its charms,
The household work grows weary,
And cold the husband's arms.
I must arise and follow,
To seek, in vain pursuit,
The blueness and the distance,
The sweetness of that flute!

In linked and liquid sequence,
The plaintive notes dissolve
Divinely tender secrets
That none but he can solve.
O, Khristna, I am coming,
I can no more delay,
"My heart has flown to join thee,"
How shall my footsteps stay?

Beloved, such thoughts have peril;
The wish is in my mind
That I had fired the jungle,
And left no leaf behind—
Burnt all bamboos to ashes,
And made their music mute—
To save thee from the magic
Of Khristna and his flute.

—From "Last Poems of Lawrence Hope," Mrs. Malcolm Nicolson.

"COUNT NOT UPON A WOMAN."

Count not upon a woman, let her be
The fragrance of the Spring, the brief delight
Of the illusive and alluring night,
That haunts and beckons thee with memory.
But in the hour of thy necessity
Seek not her hand, when Fortune takes afright

And life's foundations fail, for in thy plight
No word will wake her to remember thee.
She is not human, she is one with all
Fugitive sweetness, she is of the hour
Intangible, eternal as a flower
Whose fragrance lingers when its petals fall.
Yet, though she love thee, trust her not, nor lend
The holy, tranquil, steadfast name of friend.
—From "Love's Testament," by G. Constant Lounsbury.

THE WAY OF JUNE.

Dark red roses in a honeyed wind swinging,
Silk-soft hollyhock, colored like the moon;
Larks high overhead lost in light, and singing;
That's the way of June.

Dark red roses in the warm wind falling,
Velvet leaf by velvet leaf, all the breathless noon;
Far-off sea-waves calling, calling, calling;
That's the way of June.

Sweet as scarlet strawberry under wet leaves hidden,
Honeyed as the damask rose, lavish as the moon,
Shedding lovely light on things forgotten, hopes forbidden—
That's the way of June.

—From "Poems" of the late Mrs. Nora Chesson.

THE POET'S SEARCH.

To give to beauty her surpassing meed
As gemmed she lies immaculately fair;
To paint the hopes that end in fell despair,
While tones mellifluous every passion feed;
To follow Fancy's fairy kin that lead
Through Vales of Dream embathed in drowsful air,

Or on imagination's heights to dare,
What dulcet, rolling, golden words we need—
Such words as thine, thou mighty crowned one,
Who, like some inextinguishable sun,
Shall light the heavens of man forevermore;
Such words as Homer sent, long, long ago,
With music winged, through Greece's heart of woe,

Or such as Shakespeare made divinely soar.
—From "Into the Light," by Edward Robeson Taylor.

THE CARDINAL FLOWER.

Like a peal of a bugle
Upon the still night,
So flames her deep scarlet
In dim forest light.

A heart-throb of color
Lit up the dim nook,

A dash of deep scarlet
The dark shadows shook.

Thou darling of August,
Thou flame of her flame,
'Tis only bold Autumn
Thy ardor can tame.

—From "Bird and Bough," by John Burroughs.

MATING.

The bliss of the wind in the red bud ringing!
What shall we do with the April days?
Kingscups soon will be up and swinging—
What shall we do with May's?

The cardinal flings, "They are made for mating!"

Out on the bough he flutters, a flame.
Thrush-flutes echo, "For mating's elating!
Love is its other name!"

They know! know it! but better, oh better,
Dearest, than ever a bird in Spring,
Know we to make each moment a debtor Unto Love's burgeoning!
—From "Plays and Lyrics," by Cale Young Rice.

OEATH.

The stately silence, the perpetual peace
Of death's inscrutable, divine event
Lay on his body like a sacrament,
In calm assurance of the soul's release.
Gone forth on the great ways that never cease
With all the Mighty and Magnificent Whose souls, like his, were strangers to content,

We knew he voyaged for Truth's Golden Fleece
And we, who, day by day and hand in hand,
Had fared with him in close community
Of high endeavor to the treacherous sand
Edging life's continent, we turned our eyes Seaward, and there, far forth, we seemed to see

Full-sailed and outward bound, his Argosies!
—From "The Great Adventure," by George Cabot Lodge.

JUDITH'S SONG TO HOLOFERNES.

The small green grapes in heavy clusters grew,
Feeding on mystic moonlight and white dew
And amber sunshine the long summer through;

Till, with faint tremor in her veins, the Vine
Felt the delicious pulses of the wine;
And the grapes ripened in the year's decline.

And day by day the Virgins watched their charge;

And when, at last, beyond the horizon's marge,
The harvest moon drooped beautiful and large,
The subtle spirit in the grape was caught,
And to the slowly dying monarch brought
In a great cup fantastically wrought.

Of this he drank, then straightway from his brain
Went the weird malady, and once again
He walked the palace, free of scar or pain—

But strangely changed, for somehow he had lost
Body and voice; the courtiers, as he crossed
The royal chambers, whispered—The King's Ghost!

—From "Judith of Bethulia," by Thomas Bailey Aldrich.

ACTE'S DESCRIPTION OF POPPAEA.

A woman without pity, beautiful.
She makes the earth we tread on false, the heaven
A merest mist, a vapor. Yet her face
Is as the face of a child uplifted, pure;
But plead with lightning rather than those eyes,
Or earthquake rather than that gentle bosom
Rising and falling near thy heart. Her voice Comes running on the ear as a rivulet;
Yet if you hearken, you shall hear behind
The breaking of a sea whose waves are souls
That break upon a human-crying beach.
Ever she smileth, yet hath never smiled,
And in her lovely laughter is no joy.
Yet hath none fairer strayed into the world
Or wandered in more witchery through the air
Since she who drew the dreaming keels of Greece
After her over the Ionian foam.

—From "Nero," by Stephen Phillips.

SAILORS' CHORUS.

What calls us home,
Home from the sea?

Sailors are we,
Sailors and free,
Seaward to roam—

What calls us home?

Gray eyes and blue,
Red lips and true,
Old loves and new!

Straight o'er the foam
Love calls us home,
Home from the sea.

—From Comyns Carr's play, "Tristram and Isolt."

BUTTERFLIES.

At sixteen years she knew no care;
How could she, sweet and pure as light?
And there pursued her everywhere
Butterflies all white.

A lover looked. She dropped her eyes
That glowed like pansies wet with dew;
And, lo, there came from out the skies
Butterflies all blue.

Before she guessed her heart was gone;
The tale of love was swiftly told;
And all about her wheeled and shone
Butterflies all gold.

Then he forsook her one sad morn;
She wept and sobbed, "Oh, love, come back."
There only came to her forlorn
Butterflies all black.

—John Davidson in "Modern Love" Anthology.

TO LATAKIA.

When all the panes are hung with frost,
Wild wizard-work of silver lace,
I draw my sofa on the rug
Before the ancient chimney-place.
Upon the painted tiles are mosques
And minarets, and here and there
A blind muezzin lifts his hands
And calls the faithful unto prayer.
Folded in idle, twilight dreams,
I hear the hemlock chirp and sing
As if within its ruddy core
It beld the happy heart of Spring.
Ferdousi never sang like that,
Nor Saadi grave, nor Hafiz gay;
I lounge, and blow white rings of smoke,
And watch them rise and float away.

The curling wreaths like turbans seem
Of silent slaves that come and go—
Or Viziers, packed with craft and crime,
Whom I behead from time to time,
With pipe-stem, at a single blow.
And now and then a lingering cloud
Takes gracious form at my desire,
And at my side my lady stands,
Unwinds her veil with snowy hands—
A shadowy shape, a breath of fire!

—"Book of Songs and Sonnets of Thomas Bailey Aldrich."

THE ROADWAY.

There is a little road that winds and winds,
But never seems to come to any end,
And by it crimson lilies sway and bend
And shake down petals no one ever finds.

I think the road is hidden through the day,
But I walk on it when the twilight makes
A dusky splendor over unknown lakes
That glimmer faintly very far away.

And all the trees are hushed and full of sleep,
And all the birds are gone out of the sky,
And the white moths have not begun to fly,
And silence is about me, soft and deep.

And where the roadway goes to, mile on mile;
And why the crimson lilies are so tall
I might find out, and why their petals fall,
If only I could stay a little while.

—From "Poems" by Ella Young.

A WHITE NIGHT.

White stands the houses out in the moonless midnight.

Here and there a window lighted yet stands
plain,

Strange as a lifted eyelid in a face that slumbers.
The wakefulness behind it, is it grief or sin or pain?

One by one the fixed lights grow paler and grow fewer;

One by one man quenches what he lit; the stars remain.

The gray sky whitens; with a shudder it is daylight;

Cocks are crowing sleep away, and day brings rain.

—From "Poems" of the late Mrs. Nora Chesson.

The United States Circuit Court of Appeals, with United States Circuit Judges William B. Gilbert, of Portland, Oregon, and Erskine M. Ross, of Los Angeles, on the bench, has sustained the judgment of the United States Circuit Court of Alaska in the case of Elizabeth Decker vs. E. F. Kelly. Mrs. Decker sued to recover from Kelly $4071 damages, actual and exemplary, for having failed to supply her and their family with the necessities of life while she was his wife. The court held that the statutes do not mean that the husband is answerable to the wife for damages for failure to supply her with the necessities of life or for any other act or failure of duty connected with the marital relation.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

Three Americans, traveling in the French Pyrenees, thought at dinner that they would go a little higher than the vin ordinaire included in the three-franc table d'hôte, and accordingly ordered a bottle of Margaux. The second ordered Pontet Canet. The third ordered Haut Bon. The waiter, suitably impressed with the orders, retired. But he incautiously, as he read, left the door open, and thus it was that the three stupefied guests heard him give order in these terms:

Baptiste, three bottles of the red."

In a Parisian cafe an American ordered a d'oeuvre, sole, agneau pre sale, artichoke, peche Melba, and so on, and, when the waiter brought him a bill of thirty francs, he paid it like a man. After his change was brought, he counted it, and pushed a franc toward the waiter for a tip. But the man, pushing back the franc, said in gentle reproach:

"Pardon, Monsieur, but that is the counter-franc."

A gentleman, after eating a good dinner, said to the waiter:

"I am sorry I can't give you a tip, but I find I have only just enough money to pay your bill."

The waiter seized the bill hurriedly.

"Just let me add it up again, sir," he muttered.

On the Riviera line near Ventimiglia, Italy, a train stopped suddenly. An impatient passenger put his head out and asked crustily: "Is this Bordighera?" No answer. "Guard, is this Bordighera?" he shouted again. A voice from the fore part of the train, "No, monsieur, it is not Bordighera; it is a cow." When the train had been removed from the line the passenger ambled on again. Two minutes later it stopped more came to a dead stop. "Another cow, or a horse?" shouted the testy passenger, witheringly. "No, monsieur, it is not," said the guard. "No, monsieur, it is not," said the guard. "No, monsieur, it is not," said the guard.

At an Atlanta cemetery one tomb bears at the top "Helen Vance, Wife of Harold Vance. I await you." Then, beneath, is carved, "Harold Vance. 1889. Here am I."

At the base of the inscription some one has carved:

"He took his time."

When the late Mrs. Craigie, the noted novelist, died in America last year, she was invited to give an address at a certain meeting. The chairman, a rather stupid person, introduced before her some speakers who were not on the programme at all. It was close on to 11 o'clock when he chairman, with a pleasant smile, bowed and said:

"Mrs. Craigie, the eminent author of 'Some Impressions and a Moral,' will now give us her address."

Mrs. Craigie rose and said calmly:

"My address is No. 56 Lancaster Gate, Hyde Park, W., London, and I now wish you all good night, for I am far from home."

A bold bachelor bought a pair of socks and attached to one a paper with these words:

"I am a young lady of twenty, and would like to correspond with a bachelor with a view to matrimony." The name and address were given. The bachelor wrote, and in a few days got this answer:

"My mother was married twenty years ago. Evidently the merchant of whom you bought those socks did not advertise, or he would have sold them long ago. My mother handed me your letter and said possibly I might suit. I am waiting."

It was at a class in arithmetic that the following household problem was exactly solved: "Suppose there is a family of five there were only four potatoes for dinner, and the mother wants to give each of the children an equal share—how is she going to do it?" For a few minutes there was silence in the room while everybody thought hard. Finally one of the little boys put his feet and, after attracting the attention of the schoolmaster, gave his unexpected answer: "Mash the potatoes, sir."

Bianca Potter relates that a certain Baltimore brewer who was a very good judge of wines offered me very indifferent claret to a clergyman who was his visitor. Afterward his wife told him: "Mr. W., I think that was very poor claret that you left out for Dr. J." "Why," answered her husband, "but he didn't know it. I have had one lesson which has taught me never to waste anything good on the clergy. You know how I loved Dr. A. Cleveland Cox? Well, when he left Baltimore I gave him six bottles of that X Madeira. You know its value. It is priceless. It was worth its weight in gold. In New York I went one day to Dr. Cox's rectory to lunch. At the table the rector pressed upon me all that it offered, until at length I said: 'Thank you. I am not very well; indeed, I am rather faint; and I wonder, doctor, if I could have a glass of that Madeira that I gave you when you left Baltimore?' 'Certainly,' said the rector, turning to the lady who presided at the other end of the table, 'Lucy, dear, where is that Madeira that Mr. W. gave us?' 'Why, don't you remember, love?' said the lady of the house, 'I used it to wash the baby with!'

At Atlantic City, on the boardwalk, a wheeled chair containing two ladies trundled slowly by. One lady said:

"What has become of that blonde with whom Harry Hawke was flirting all summer?"

"Thought he was flirting you mean," said the second lady. "She married him last month."

An alienist came wandering through an insane asylum's wards one day. He came upon a man who sat in a brown study on a bench.

"How do you do, sir?" said the alienist.

"What is your name may I ask?"

"My name?" said the other, frowning fiercely. "Why, Czar Nicholas, of course."

"Indeed?" said the alienist. "Yet the last time I was here you were the Emperor of Germany."

"Yes, of course," said the other, quickly; "but that was by my first wife."

"When Mark Twain was a boy at school in Hannibal," said a veteran Missourian, "the schoolmaster once set the class to writing a composition on 'The Result of Laziness.'"

"Young Clemens, at the end of half an hour, handed in as his composition a blank slate."

It was on a suburban train. The young man in the rear car was suddenly addressed by the woman in the seat behind him.

"Pardon me, sir," she said; "but would you mind assisting me off at the next station? You see I am very large, and when I get off I have to go backward, so the conductor thinks I am trying to get aboard and helps me on again. He has done this at three stations."

The champion absent-minded man called upon his old friend, the family physician. After a chat of a couple of hours the doctor saw him to the door and bade him good night, saying:

"Come again. Family all well, I suppose?"

"My heavens!" exclaimed the absent-minded beggar, "that reminds me of my errand. My wife is in a fit!"

A very mild South-of-England vicar had for some time been displeased with the quality of the milk served him. At length he determined to remonstrate with his milkman for supplying such weak stuff. He began mildly:

"I've been waiting to see you in regard to the milk which you are serving me."

"Yes, sir," uneasily answered the tradesman.

"I only wanted to say," continued the minister, "that I use the milk for dietary purposes exclusively and not for christening."

There was an old lady who rented a furnished villa for the summer, and with the villa a large dog also went. In the sitting-room of the villa there was a very comfortable arm chair. The old lady liked this chair better than any other in the house. She always made for it the first thing.

But, alas! she nearly always found the chair occupied by the large dog. Being afraid of the dog, she never dared bid it harshly to get out of the chair, as she feared that it might bite her; but instead she would go to the window and call "Cats!"

Then the dog would rush to the window and bark, and the old lady would slip into the vacant chair quietly.

One day the dog entered the room and found the old lady in possession of the chair. He strolled over to the window, and, looking out, appeared very much excited, and set up a tremendous barking.

The old lady rose and hastened to the window to see what was the matter and the dog quietly climbed into the chair.

A lady once asked Pierpont Morgan if he had ever heard the Gregorian music that is sung in the Sistine chapel in Rome. I have," Mr.

Morgan said. "And how did you like it?" the lady asked. "Those chants, you know, are said to be sung to the tunes which were used in David's time." Mr. Morgan smiled. "I could never understand till now," he said, "why Saul threw his javelin at David."

That he was a stickler for pure English is shown by the following story of Dr. Johnson, the lexicographer, who was discovered by his wife kissing one of her serving maids.

"Why, Dr. Johnson," said the wife. "I am surprised."

"No," said the recreant husband, "that is not exactly right, dear. I am surprised. You are astonished."

Del Monte Offers

During the reconstruction of San Francisco, Hotel Del Monte offers a welcome shelter to those desiring a home-like place for rest and recreation. The park-like grounds, the golf links, the flowers, the many walks and drives were never more attractive than at the present. The entire hotel has recently been renovated and improved, with steam heat, electric lights, hot and cold water, telephones in every room. Why not make this attractive resort near San Francisco your permanent home? Special terms for families. Address Geo. P. Snell, Manager, Del Monte, California.

This Number of the Argonaut

Is sent to a certain number who are not on its subscription lists. If it should happen to fall into the hands of those who already are subscribers or readers, they are asked to hand it to any person who in their opinion may be interested in such a journal. There are many pressing topics in these stirring days. In this issue we discuss National politics, California politics, and the interesting campaigns now progressing in the various States. Likewise the questions so vital to San Francisco in her present needs—insurance, relief, rehabilitation, rebuilding, labor—all these and many kindred topics are now being discussed in the Argonaut. Our regular readers know that this journal has not missed an issue, and that practically all of the time since the disaster it has been issued in its old form. Others may not know it, hence some of these issues are sent free to strangers.

The Argonaut will be sent free up to Jan. 1st, 1907, to all new subscribers who send in one year's subscription during November and December.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

Mrs. Slummer—"Does your husband drink regularly?" Mrs. Hogan—"No, mum; my wages isn't steady."—Judge.

Farmer—"Hey, you! There ain't no shootin' here!" Boy trespasser, with gun—"They ain't, ain't they? Say, are you deaf?"—Judge.

Author—"Could you give me an appropriate motto for my essay on sea voyage?" Traveler—"Yes; 'sic transit.'—Baltimore American.

"Archie is fairly going crazy over his new automobile." "That's strange. Every time I've seen him he has been going crazy under it."—Chicago Tribune.

"So you think yachting is a dangerous game?" "Dreadfully so. Why, no less than five of our commodores have died of delirium-tremens."—Life.

"The man I marry," declared Miss Elder, "must be capable of great self-sacrifice." "Yes," murmured Miss Younger, "he'll have to be."—Cleveland Leader.

Motto over the walls of a school in Germany: "When wealth is lost, nothing is lost." "When health is lost, something is lost." "When character is lost, all is lost."

"Why in the world did Snigglesley want to marry his divorced wife again?" "It seems that she'd saved up all the alimony he paid her during the years they lived apart."—Chicago Record-Herald.

"It seems his uncle fell out of a hotel window in Europe"—"Gracious! Any bones broken?" "Not one." "No?" "No," he was merely drowned. It happened in Venice."—Philadelphia Ledger.

Anxious Parent—"Doctor, my daughter appears to be going blind, and she is about to be married." Doctor—"Let her go right on with the wedding. If anything can open her eyes, marriage will."—Stray Stories.

"There goes a woman with a history," remarked the clerk in a bookstore, as a lady passed out at the front door. "How do you know?" queried the proprietor. "Because," explained the clerk, "I just sold it to her."—Chicago Daily News.

Assistant—"Don't go in there. Editor's cussing like a blue streak."

Would-be Visitor—"What's the matter?"

Assistant—"Matter enough. Proofreader let fourteen errors slip through in his leader on the 'Wickedness of Profanity.'"—Pick-Me-Up.

"I am afraid, madam," said a gentleman who was looking for country lodgings, "that the house is too near the station to be pleasant." "It is a little noisy," assented the landlady, "but from the front veranda one has such a fine view of people who miss the trains."—Tit-Bits.

"O!" remarked the first fox-hunter, "you should have seen Mr. Nuritch take that high hedge." "You surprise me!" exclaimed the other. "I thought the horse he rode wasn't much of a jumper." "O! the horse didn't take the hedge. Mr. Nuritch did it alone."—Philadelphia Press.

His Coachman—"Professor, why is it that the moon allus shows the same face?" The Professor—"That is due to the circumstance that its revolution upon its axis is coincident with the revolution it makes in its orbit." The Coachman—"Thankee. I thort it was somethin' like that."—Chicago Tribune.

"I thought," said Mrs. Oldcastle, "that you intended to have D'Auber, the great mural painter, do some work for you." "We did," replied her hostess, "but Josiah discharged him. He tried to cheat us by paintin' on the walls. I s'pose because he didn't want to spend any money for canvas."—Chicago Record-Herald.

"They say you get 250 marks a month? I can't believe it; tell me how." "I get 110 marks salary; then I don't pay my rent, 40 marks; that's 150 marks; I owe the milkman 30 marks, that's 180 marks; my butcher 40 marks, 220 marks, and every month I raise 30 marks out of my friends, makes an income of 250 marks a month!"—Fliegende Blätter.

One of Brookline's smart young matrons, the wife of a prominent surgeon, was giving a bridge party, and consulting her husband, was advised by him to apply to one of the local undertakers for chairs. She telephoned, and was horrified at the reply: "Oh, yes, Mrs. F., let you have all you want at half price, because the doctor gives us so much business."—Life.

It fell to the lot of five-year-old Wallace Stewart, being the third son in rapid succession, to sift the family ashes, as his brothers had done before him. One morning the boy was told by his beaming father that a baby had arrived the night before. Wallace also beamed, much to his parent's gratification. "And just think! it is our first little girl!" Wallace's smile vanished and he scowled like a pirate. "A girl!" as if it were the synonym for all that was opprobrious. "Gee! must I always sift ashes?"—September Lippincott's.

The State and the Civic Broil.

San Francisco is situated in the State of California." With this most San Franciscans would agree. San Francisco is an integral part of the State of California." With this most San Franciscans, with a slight mental reservation, would doubtless also agree. San Francisco is governed and controlled by the people of the State of California." With this most San Franciscans would stoutly disagree. It is even probable that many of them would be amazed at such an extraordinary assertion. That such is the case has been shown conclusively by the recent intervention in the San Francisco courts by the Attorney General of California. This intervention took place in the proceedings over impaneling a grand jury when there were two persons claiming to be district attorneys, W. H. Langdon and Abraham Ruef. It is a habit with all American cities, as they grow populous and rich, to grow restless under their allegiance to the State government. More and more they chafe under it. They sneer at the "hayseeds," they jest at the "up-country delegates," and they are fond of poking fun at the "grangers in the legislature." And in time they come to think that they can cut loose entirely from the State government. In fact, they even push matters so far by means of a radical charter as to render their cities almost autonomous.

Almost, but not quite. For as yet there is no means provided, under our American system of government, by which any city can secede from her State. Mighty, populous, and wealthy as is the City of New York, she still is controlled by the State Legislature at Albany. Powerful as is Chicago, she must bow to the Illinois legislators at Springfield. San Francisco has enjoyed even a prouder position than they, for she has been until recent years the only large city in the western half of the continent. And under her new charter San Francisco had grown to believe that she was practically independent of the State government.

In the history of San Francisco there have been many times when she has been saved from loot and plunder by these same country legislators at whom she sneered. And it looks now as if she were again to be saved from herself by the interference of the powerful hand of the State government.

The events which led to the intervention of the Attorney General culminated with the impaneling of a grand jury in San Francisco. The continual accusations against the municipal government of San Francisco had finally resulted in concrete action. W. H. Langdon, District Attorney, had appointed F. J. Heney and W. J. Burns as assistants. Heney has won fame as a fearless prosecutor of powerful and wealthy criminals in Oregon and elsewhere. Burns is a secret-service agent renowned in Washington and throughout the United States as an adroit sleuth.

Last week we remarked that the newspaper din over this move was not calculated to subserve the ends of justice. For if the men hinted at are guilty, such an unearthly clamor would surely tend to arouse their fears and possibly enable them to cover up their tracks. Furthermore, the near approach of the election, the fact that District Attorney Langdon is a candidate for Governor, and the number and variety of personal and political ambitions and revenges involved would give rise to a more than reasonable doubt in the minds of many citizens as to the motive of those behind the movement.

The people of San Francisco seem to be divided on this issue, as on so many others that have passed before. The wealthy, the employing classes, the merchants, and the middle classes generally seem to believe that the municipal officials are guilty of the charges against them, and that Langdon, Heney, and their backers are actuated only by the purest of motives. On the other hand, the labor unions, the workingmen, and the poorer classes generally seem to believe that the municipal officials are innocent of all corruption and that the motives of those beginning the proceedings against them are purely political, selfish, and vile. That such a diametrical difference of opinion should exist between two great divisions of the people of San Francisco is most unfortunate, but that it does exist can not be denied.

But the theatrical appointment by District Attorney Langdon of Heney and Burns as assistants was followed by an even more spectacular move a few days later. Acting Mayor Gallagher preferred charges against District Attorney Langdon and immediately removed him from office, ostensibly acting under the charter; he also appointed Abraham Ruef to the position of District Attorney. Ruef at once removed Heney. Langdon, who was absent on his campaign, wired his deputies to defend his office and to remove all private papers to a safe repository. The office then remained in a state of siege.

The adherents of Langdon and Heney maintained that under the charter the District Attorney can not be suspended by the Mayor or removed by the Board of Supervisors; that the office of District Attorney is a county office; that therefore he is a State official, and not removable by the Mayor; that any such provision in the charter is unconstitutional; that it has already been so held in the Supreme Court decisions affecting the status of county officers; and that no elective county official may be removed under that provision of the charter.

The adherents of Gallagher and Ruef to this reply that it is indifferent to them whether Langdon may be removed or not, but that he is removed.

The document preferring charges against Langdon is extremely long. It was read at a special meeting of the Board of Supervisors, and unanimously approved. Under it Langdon was to be given a hearing at the next meeting of the Board. The Acting Mayor suspended Attorney Langdon for "neglect of duties." The document was very adroitly drawn, and specified these charges:

That for a period of 30 days said Langdon absented himself from San Francisco without leave, and neglected his official duties, being engaged in campaigning for the office of Governor.

That the newspapers of San Francisco have published that said Langdon and others were in possession of evidence to convict certain officials of the City and County of serious crimes. Yet said District Attorney has failed to cause the arrest of said officials. And if charges so made were not true, said District Attorney had knowledge of such falsity, and yet has failed to cause the arrest of the publishers of those newspapers for criminal libel.

That said District Attorney has entered into a conspiracy for political purposes to bring unmerited discredit upon said municipal officials.

That said Langdon entered into conspiracy to injure and defame the chief executive of this city, Mayor Schmitz, as said mayor had determined to visit the German Empire, in his official capacity, to use his personal influence to cause certain insurance companies to pay losses to San Francisco citizens, and that after the mayor left a conspiracy was formed to defame, injure, and weaken said Schmitz's character and reputation in order to destroy whatever influence he might have in dealing with such insurance companies. In pursuance of this scheme it was determined to print in the newspapers of San Francisco, false, malicious, and slanderous charges, among others that said Schmitz was a fugitive from justice; that said Langdon did aid, abet, and assist said scheme.

That in 1905 one Francis J. Heney in a public speech aspersed the good name of a prominent citizen of this community, and stated that he knew him to be corrupt; and that said citizen, having instantly demanded that said Heney be compelled to appear before the grand jury to make proof of said assertions, said Heney there admitted that he had made such statements without any personal knowledge regarding same. That all these facts were well known to said W. H. Langdon, District Attorney; yet in October, 1906, said Langdon, in order to enable said Heney to use public office for revenge and malice, did appoint said Heney Assistant District Attorney.

That said Langdon knew that said Heney frequently, while intoxicated, made grave and serious charges involving the personal character of citizens of said city. Yet with such knowledge said Langdon did appoint said Heney to such office.

That said Heney was the representative of the Street Car Corporation of San Francisco in the dispute between said corporation and its employees. That appointment of said Heney to said office in regard to enforcement of law against said corporation will be detrimental to the interests of San Francisco.

That said Heney is the attorney for a private water corporation now bitterly opposed to San Francisco acquiring a water supply. That his attorneyship for such company is inconsistent with holding office as Assistant District Attorney and against the best interests of the people of San Francisco.

That since the appointment of said Heney, he and said Langdon have caused to be published threats against the Superior Judges of San Francisco for the purpose of influencing their judicial action.

That the appointment of said Heney was made by said Langdon at the dictation of certain newspaper influences and individuals who have contributed many thousands of dollars to wreak their private revenge against said Schmitz, mayor; the Supervisors, and the Police Department of San Francisco.

When Gallagher ostensibly removed Langdon matters were left in a very delicate condition. Eighteen Grand Jurors had been selected, but one remaining to be chosen. Presiding Judge Graham, of the Superior Court, was to sit at the next session of the court. Judge Graham was reported to be not particularly friendly toward the municipal officials. But if he were suspected of friendliness toward the side of Langdon, Heney, and their friends, there remained the corrective fact that not long before Heney had denounced all of the Superior Judges of San Francisco as "corrupt." As Judge Graham was then on the bench, it is presumable that Heney included him in his denunciation. Furthermore, Judge Graham is a candidate for re-election and is to be ballotted for within a few days. If he decided adversely to Langdon and Heney, he would make enemies of the "Committee of Safety" and their followers. If he decided adversely to Ruef and the municipal administration, he would make enemies of the labor unions and the labor-union voters. Altogether it was a very difficult and unenviable position for Judge Graham.

It so happened that matters took a turn which lifted some of the judicial burden from his shoulders. District Attorney Langdon applied for a restraining order enjoining Mayor Gallagher, the Supervisors, and A. Ruef from "taking possession of the District Attorney's office" or "obstructing or hindering plaintiff, Langdon, in the performance of his duties as District Attorney." Judge Seawell granted a restraining order, setting the hearing for November 2.

The question of completing the impanelment of the Grand Jury—which proceeding both factions were endeavoring to conduct—came up before Judge Graham October 26. A crowd of several thousand people gathered around the temporary court-house. A. Ruef, the "Acting District Attorney," was accompanied by a body-guard of detectives. Heney demanded that the jurors be examined as to their bias for or against Ruef. Some heated passages were exchanged between Ruef and Heney.

The proceedings were here suddenly interrupted by U. S. Webb, Attorney General of the State. He warned the presiding Judge that these arguments taking place before the grand jurors might vitiate the panel, and suggested that a date be set for hearing argument. This was done, Judge Graham appointing October 29.

Attorney General Webb said: "It is unfortunate that either of these gentlemen have spoken here before these jurors. If this argument continues every member of the grand jury will be absolutely disqualified. I speak as a law officer of the State, empowered, I believe, to speak here. Under the law of this State it may become the duty of the Attorney General of this State, in which capacity I now speak, to offer my assistance to the court in the impanelment of the grand jury or in the conduct of criminal proceedings."

According to the Political Code "it is the duty of the Attorney General to prosecute or defend all cases to which the State or any officer thereof in his official capacity is a party"; "to exercise supervisory powers over District Attorneys in all matters pertaining to the duties of their offices"; "when required by the public service to repair to any county in the State and assist the District Attorney in the discharge of his duties."

Attorneys Jacobs and Linforth represented the Bar Association as amici curiae. They were invited by the court to give their opinion as to whether Attorney Heney had the right he claimed to examine the nineteen jurors in advance, "for the purpose of determining whether any or all of them had any bias or prejudice against a certain individual, whom he says he will present evidence against." These gentlemen differed, and the Attorney General thought that the matter of the law had better be looked up. Although he agreed with Attorney Heney in thinking that such a law would be a good one, he was not certain that it is the law. The proceedings, therefore, were postponed to the date set.

As we write, it would seem to be a drawn battle. The municipal officers of course control the police department, and nearly all the administrative machinery of government. But Judge Graham has practically refused to recognize Gallagher's appointee, A. Ruef, as District Attorney. Furthermore, some of the other judges have recognized Langdon as still District Attorney. Therefore, that powerful place, which controls the prosecution of criminals, is still in Langdon's hands. For a time it looked as if the Gallagher-Ruef faction had distinctly the upper hand.

Two elements will tend toward cooling the hot blood of the various contestants. One is the postponement of the final decision until after the election; the other is the intervention of the State. The latter factor is particularly potent. The Federal power when called upon has rarely failed to be successful in bringing order where previously there existed conditions of riot or disorder. But this matter has seemed to be so purely a municipal controversy that there did not seem to be any points involved over which the Federal courts could have jurisdiction. But there can be no question as to the power of the Attorney General to assist the ends of justice in any part of the State. This may seem unpalatable to San Franciscans, but it is none the less true.

A year or two ago in the poor and sparsely-settled county of Modoc there was a failure to indict a murderer because the taxpayers wished to save the expenses of the trial. Thereupon, the Attorney General sent deputies from his office at the capital of the State and compelled the administration of justice which the parsimonious county denied. Modoc County is poor and San Francisco is rich. Modoc County is sparsely settled and San Francisco is populous. But before the law and in the eyes of the State they are the same. If San Francisco shall deny justice to any man or any set of men, the State may intervene and right the wrong. And there can be no doubt that many good citizens of San Francisco who have looked with apprehension on the recent turmoil will breathe more freely now that the State has taken a hand in it.

Legislators and the People in Person.

When Samuel Gompers, leading by a string the Executive Council of the American Federation of Labor, called upon President Roosevelt, President pro tem. Frye, and Speaker Cannon last March, and demanded of them their influence to bring about certain legislation affecting labor interests, the Argonaut predicted trouble. History says that when The People come in person to demand certain legislation of their legislators, the legislators get scared and The People get arrogant. The result is that The People make unreasonable demands, and the legislators make unwise concessions. In a republic it is theoretically true that the people are the tribunal of last resort, but in practice it has been found wiser to entrust final decisions to a select body of old men. They seem to pass on intricate law points better than does a town mass meeting. Even in the interim stages, the popular body and the Upper House, acting as a buffer between The People and the Supreme Court, have been found not without advantages.

The visit, therefore, of Gompers and The People had the usual result. The trouble which the Argonaut predicted has come to pass. Mr. Gompers and his Federation of Labor were not satisfied with the speeches of President Roosevelt and Speaker Cannon, nor with the silence of President pro tem. Frye. Gompers announced that he would bring the administration to his feet by defeating all candidates for Congress who had refused to comply with the demands of Labor. Gompers has been attempting to carry out his threat, but has met with one rebuff, in Maine, where he failed to defeat Congressman Littlefield. But the result of his threats in the case of other Congressmen, including our own Gillett of California, remain to be settled next week.

If Mr. Gompers with his grievances shall demonstrate that The People can dictate to the President, the Senate, and the House, in any other way than through the ballot box, this republic will indeed revert to a pure democracy.

We doubt whether such reversion will prove a success. It rarely has succeeded in other lands and in other times. When the French were engaged in turning their monarchy into a red republic, The People acquired the habit of dropping into the Legislative Chamber in squads, always armed and generally intoxicated. Thereupon, it became the task of the terrified legislator soothe The People, to brace up The People or tottering legs, and to escort The People as rapidly may be out into the outer air. At last the statesmen of France found that The People of Paris were in habit of dropping in so frequently as to render legislation not only difficult but dangerous, so they set the matter by removing to Versailles, a number of miles distant from Paris. The walking at that time was good, which fact largely deprived the legislators of the delights of The People's society.

Matters are different nowadays. Modern transportation has annihilated space and time. Twelve years ago we sent from the Pacific Coast a Coxey Army of The People, which invaded the Capitol at Washington. While it did not terrify our legislators as erstwhile those of Paris, it caused them grave apprehension. Since then the symptom has not reappeared until last March. On the late visit The People did not come in hordes, but in a concentrated and more dangerous form. This time not only the legislators, but the Executive head of the United States, found himself somewhat embarrassed by the demands of The People. It is fair to say that the President did not lose courage. He spoke, as always, frankly and bravely to the Congressional grievance committee.

The latest incident in this line of popular invasion of legislative halls took place in London. On October 23, the House of Commons was invaded by a large number of woman suffragists. They were obstinate on penetrating within the precincts of the House. The Parliamentary constables and the Westminster police both endeavored to prevent them. But, as the women had some natural reluctance to handling the women roughly, and as the women had not the least reluctance to handling the bobbies roughly, the natural result ensued. A number of the suffrage ladies succeeded in making their way to the bar of the House—the magic bar at which no non-member can be admitted. But the woman suffragists, climbing over, crawling under, made their way into the forbidden precincts in various ways. They were forced to drag them away by main strength, they clung to benches, railings, and even to the members of the House itself. But at last they were caught and dumped outside the precincts, like so many pieces of goods. On refusing to promise to keep the peace and be discharged, they were given two months' imprisonment.

London is laughing over the incident, but the legislators do not take it so lightly. They realize the extremely awkward predicament of a representative of The People standing up in his place and confronting the People in person. It is rendered all the more embarrassing when The People is feminine.

The Problems of Relief.

It is now learned that the National Red Cross Relief Fund in Washington is to be placed at the disposal of the San Francisco Relief Corporation. But, as we have already intimated, it is to be under certain restrictions. The Red Cross Executive Committee last week formulated as follows:

In order to secure certainty and accuracy in regard to the expenditure of the Red Cross Fund, the Executive Committee deems it wise that there be sent to them from San Francisco on the first of each month a statement showing the balance of Red Cross funds unexpended, and an estimate of all amounts required for the following month; that detailed accounts of figures covering all disbursements be forwarded to this Executive Committee for audit; that on receipt of the monthly statement of balances and estimates there will be forwarded one-half the amount called for in the estimates; that the Executive Committee of the American Red Cross thinks that the people who subscribed the money are entitled to an exact accounting of what it is being spent.

The Red Cross Executive Committee also stipulated that no further claims for damages be paid out of the Relief Fund. This has evidently been the cause of delay with the Eastern relief funds. The committee there were averse to paying out money intended by generous donors for the relief of destitute individuals when these moneys were being diverted to claims for property confiscated or destroyed, when such claims uly ran against the municipality of San Francisco and against the Relief Corporation.

The maintenance of the relief camps in the squares of San Francisco is going to cause the Relief Corporation and the city no end of trouble. That there are numbers of criminals of both sexes in these camps is now undisputed. The police state that most of the thugs and crooks who now infest the city live in these camps, where it is difficult to keep track of them. They move from one end of the city to the other with the utmost ease and celerity. All sorts of immorality goes on in the camps almost unchecked. Typhoid and other diseases are rife among them, and physicians fear the camps will become centres of disease. The recommendation of the outgoing Grand Jury recommends that the camps be abolished as speedily as possible.

The Relief Corporation has been erecting two- and three-room cottages with the intention of exacting $2.00 month per room rental. It had expected, from six hundred cottages now in course of erection, to obtain $30,000 a month. In each camp there is a certain number of families willing to pay; there is a large number that refuse. Therefore, the willing ones refrain, reasoning, with much justice, that there is no reason why they should pay when the others are tenanted free. The refugees are headed by a number of pestilential agitators, who continually breed trouble and who advise men to pay no rent. A number of these agitators have been arrested and taken forcible possession of cottages just completed, refused to go out, and refused to pay rent. The Relief Corporation is considering ejectment proceedings. It does not seem as if such legal ejectment is necessary. Neither the Relief Corporation nor the Park Commissioners have any authority to grant permission to any person to reside permanently on public land. The refugees have purely a negative title to possession. They are there only because they are not ejected. This is the legal phase of it. But when it comes to forcibly ejecting many thousands of poor people, many of them women with children dependent upon them, it is natural that the Relief Corporation should pause.

Earthquakes and Elections.

The people who drop in from the East, from Mars, and from other distant places keep saying that we Californians have not got over our earthquake scare. They say that some of us seem to be doped, some of us seem to be hysterical, and all of us seem to be off of our base. Well, perhaps there may be something in it. The line of earthquake fissure fault was about three hundred miles long, and extended, generally speaking, from Mono County on the north to San Luis Obispo County on the south. So the people of California prudently divided selecting a nominee for Governor from the central belt. They chose Gillett, who hails from northern California, and they are going to elect him with the votes of southern California.

In the meantime northern and southern California are going with interest not unmingled with apprehension on the scene in central California, where all the factions of the parties are engaged in caterwauling, pulling hair, flinging mud, bad language, threatening each other with stinging, and holding courts with drawn revolvers. In short, the people of that part of California around the bay are in a death grapple. From out the struggling ranks arise such sounds as "Railroad hiring!"—"Rafters!"—"Boss Rule!"—"Crook!"—"Railroad Car!"—"Hearst's hired man!"—"Midnight murder!"—"Espee!"—"Caught with the goods on!"—"Corrupt Judge!"—"Citizens' Alliance!"—"Gas-pipe assassins!"—"Thugs!"

It must seem a little odd to an outsider. Perhaps we are not entirely over the effects of that earthquake yet.

Mr. Bell and the Constitution.

Editor Holman of the Sacramento Union has dug up one of Candidate Bell's speeches the statement that "the great State of California should insist that on all public work for this State eight hours should constitute a day's labor." Editor Holman is then unkind enough to dig up Article 20, Section 17 of the State Constitution, which already declares that on public work eight hours shall constitute a day's labor. When Candidate Bell pledged his efforts, if he became Governor, to "secure the repeal of the poll-tax law," declaring it to be a grave and oppressive tax upon the poor man, and at the same time declared his "undying devotion to the public school system" in the way of increasing the school revenues, Editor Holman dug up Article 13, Section 12 of the Constitution, which provides that a poll tax shall be levied which "shall be paid into the State School fund." The Union therefore declares that even if Mr. Bell should become Governor, he could not "repeal the poll-tax law" because it is in the State Constitution. Further, says the Union, the eight-hour law is already in the Constitution, and it adds: "What must be thought of a man who for fifteen years has been a practicing lawyer and who is so unfamiliar with the Constitution of his State?"

Come, come, Mr. Holman. You are harsh with Brother Bell. What is the Constitution between friends?

The Proposed Amendments.

Fourteen proposed amendments of the State Constitution will be voted on next Tuesday. Six are distinctly valuable and should be adopted; two are doubtful; six are bad and should be rejected.

Assembly amendment No. 5 proposes to exempt from all taxation the property of the Cogswell Polytechnic College in San Francisco. Vote for it.

Assembly amendment No. 11 proposes a more equitable adjustment of the salaries of the judges of the Supreme Court. Vote for it.

Assembly amendment No. 12, relating to the pay of State offices, conflicts with Senate amendment No. 14. Vote against it.

Assembly amendment No. 13 proposes to make public bonds payable at any place in the United State. Vote for it.

Assembly amendment No. 14 is to facilitate the granting of new municipal charters. It is asserted to be in the interest of larger local self-government for cities. Its appearance is not convincing.

Senate amendment No. 2 proposes to make more effective civil-service provisions of the San Francisco city charter. Vote for it.

Senate amendment No. 14 defines the duties of the Lieutenant-Governor and enlarges them, and increases his salary. It is said to contemplate a more effective supervision of State institutions. It conflicts, on the point of salary, with Assembly amendment No. 12.

Senate amendment No. 20 proposes to extend the life of a corporation by a two-thirds vote of its capital stock. Vote against it.

Senate amendment No. 38 provides for the deposit of State, county, and municipal funds in banks furnishing adequate security, and also for the payment of interest on such deposits. Vote for it.

Senate amendment No. 40 proposes to increase the pay of members of the Legislature. Vote against it.

Assembly amendment No. 2, extra session, is proposed as an emergency measure, to enlarge the powers of the Board of Supervisors of San Francisco. Vote against it.

Senate amendment No. 2, extra session, proposes to permit the city of San Jose to adopt charter amendments without approval of the Legislature. Vote against it.

Senate amendment No. 8 proposes to reverse the present law compelling the mortgagee to pay the taxes on real estate. Vote for it.

Senate amendment No. 12, extra session, proposes to permit San Francisco and San Jose to issue bonds running for seventy-five years. Vote against it.

Organized Labor and Murder.

Last week the Supreme Court of the United States heard arguments in the case of Charles D. Moyer, W. D. Hayward, and G. W. Pettibone, officers and members of the Western Federation of Miners, who are imprisoned in Cannon County, Idaho, under the charge of murdering the former governor, Steunenberg, of that State. The case is sent up to the Federal Supreme Court on an appeal from the decision of the Idaho Federal Court refusing to grant writs of habeas corpus. The men are all residents of Colorado. It is alleged by their attorneys that they were kidnapped in pursuance of a conspiracy, to which the governors of Colorado and Idaho were parties; that they were taken from Colorado, and brought into the jurisdiction of Idaho; that therefore such jurisdiction was acquired by fraud. One of the attorneys for the prisoners was C. S. Darrow, of Chicago; the act of the authorities in arresting the prisoners was denounced by the attorney as "a flagrant usurpation and a treacherous betrayal of justice."

W. H. Harley, attorney for the State of Idaho, contended that the extradition proceedings had been entirely regular. As for the foregoing and similar reflections upon the authorities of Colorado and Idaho, he said that the Federal courts could not afford to countenance such denunciation of high officials by counsel. Even if it were true, he said, that the Governor of Colorado had connived at the removal of the Mining Federation officials in an irregular way, their remedy was an action for damages.

The infamous and cowardly murder of Governor Steunenberg is fresh in the minds of most men. These high officials of the Western Federation of Miners, now under arrest, are accused of being accessory to his murder. This journal and most other conservative newspapers have refrained from expressing any opinion upon the guilt or innocence of these men. Their case remains to be tried. The evidence is not yet submitted. This proceeding before the United States Supreme Court is merely a preliminary one concerning the question of jurisdiction. But what has been the attitude of Organized Labor? Have the political leaders and newspaper organs of Organized Labor maintained the same fair-minded attitude toward the courts, the community, and the accused? Not so. The political leaders and the labor newspapers have indulged in violent vituperation and abuse of the Executive, the State officials, and the courts of Idaho; they have been engaged in raising money for the defense of these persecuted men; and they are proposing to send armed men to be present in the courts of Idaho in order to intimidate the judges and the jurors when these cases come to be tried.

Is that the way any body of American citizens should act when crimes are being investigated? Is that the attitude of any set of honest men toward the courts when persons accused of crime are brought before them? Whether the accused men are murderers or not, no one denies that foul murder has been done. Is that the attitude of Organized Labor toward murder?

San Francisco's Business Centre.

In the September number of "Building Management," a technical journal published in Chicago and New York, is an article entitled "The Rise of a City Ruined but Unconquered." It relates to the upbuilding of San Francisco. This article is from the pen of Wm. F. Burbank, and it contains a careful study of topics now interesting many San Francisco property owners. An answer is suggested to the question, "What is to be San Francisco's business centre?" Mr. Burbank discusses the sudden jumping into prominence of Fillmore street and Van Ness avenue. His conclusion is that Fillmore and Van Ness are "emergency streets mainly, that there is no natural congestion of business on these new avenues of trade, and that the former sections of the city are deemed certain to regain their importance." He goes on to ask, "What is the value of business real estate in the burned district?" He thinks that in the choicest part of the retail business district, such as "Post and Geary streets, west of Kearny and including Union Square, also Market street from Montgomery west to Powell, the depreciation may amount to 15, 20 and 25 per cent." He thinks that this disparity may disappear after a few years, as modern buildings are erected. About the burned residence district, he says that many believe that "a third of its value has departed from it, and this view is held by the assessor." He adds that values there are extremely problematical, because the day of its upbuilding is more distant. The first pronounced move into the former business centre he thinks will be that of the real estate men. His article was apparently written about three months ago, and his judgment in this regard is already being verified. When the office buildings shall be ready for occupancy, he predicts that "The lawyers will flock there, tired of doing business in back parlors, basements, and bed rooms." In three years' time he thinks that the best stores will move away from Van Ness avenue, where insurance rates are extremely high, and where the danger from fire is great, and where there is little or no fire protection.

Concerning the suggestions for remodeling the plan of the city, making some streets of fire-resisting width, shortening distances by diagonal avenues, creating a civic centre, etc., Mr. Burbank does not speak with much hopefulness. He gives the situation as it appears to him, and says, "So the great hopes of a magnificent city according to the ideas of modern scientific thinkers may be lost and lost forever." The article, an extremely interesting one, to outsiders as well as San Franciscans, closes with some statistics concerning the number of buildings erected, the number of firms doing business, bank clearings, etc.

The main topic touched upon—that of the future business centre of San Francisco—is one which many property owners seem unwilling to discuss. Mr. Burbank has large interests in San Francisco, and his frankness is unusual. However, his article is worthy of attention not only for its evident sincerity but for the reason that it represents the views of one having large property interests.

Cannon and Gompers.

Our picturesque Speaker of the House, Uncle Joe Cannon, was one of the men marked for decapitation by Emperor Gompers. But Uncle Joe seems to be walking around with a certain amount of cheerfulness, considering that he is so near his political funeral. As his district is overwhelmingly Republican it is considered doubtful whether Emperor Gompers will attack the Speaker in his district or not. Probably not.

The Speaker was interviewed the other day concerning the outlook "out West." Uncle Joe replied: "Gompers has not got there yet. The railroads, you know, are not giving free transportation any more. Still, I expect to see Gompers out there, and I hope he will have a damn good time!"

Perhaps we should leave out this wicked word, but it must be admitted that Uncle Joe swears at times. This will probably prevent him from ever becoming President. All of our Republican Presidents have been truly good men. Hayes was a good man. Arthur was a good man. Harrison was a good man. McKinley was a good man. Roosevelt is a good man.

But to resume: Uncle Joe thus continued his remarks to the reporter: "Still, I hope Gompers has a good time. It's a nice district, and a man can enjoy himself there. There are lots of Organized Labor men out in my district. Men who work with their hands ought to organize. Only out in my district they have not got used to regarding labor unions as organized for political purposes. I believe in Organized Labor myself, and the Organized Labor men out in my district are mostly Republican, but they all walk around under their own hat-bands."

Speaker Cannon knows his district intimately. We are inclined to think that his opinion about the Organized Labor men in his district could be applied to many other districts. In the ranks of Organized Labor in California there are a great many Republican workingmen. But, like Speaker Cannon, we do not think they are owned by Emperor Gompers, but that they walk around "under their own hat-bands."

Thirty-Seven Judges to Be Chosen.

At the election next Tuesday no less than thirty-seven judges will be chosen in California.

Two associate justices of the Supreme Court will be elected for the full term, and one associate justice to fill the unexpired term of Justice Walter Van Dyke, deceased.

For the new District Courts of Appeal, nine judges will be chosen—a presiding judge and two associate judges for each of the three districts.

Every voter may express his choice for the above judges.

Four judges of the Superior Court will be chosen in San Francisco, six in Los Angeles County, four in Alameda County, two in Fresno County, and one each in Alpine, Kings, Madera, Riverside, Plumas, San Bernardino, San Joaquin, Shasta, and Solano Counties. Voting for these judges is restricted in each case to the county named.

There is no more important duty before the elector than that of choosing carefully his candidates for positions on the bench. Good State officials and good laws are alike inefficient and inoperative when corrupt judges thwart the one and misconstrue the other.

The names of candidates for the several State offices have become familiar to the voters; not so the candidates for judges. There is especial need of close scrutiny and careful choice of names in that section of the ballot.

Boston Investigating Insurance Companies.

The Boston Traveler of October 20th prints a list of insurance companies, divided into "Class I," and "Class II," which is part of a list printed in the San Francisco Chronicle. It likewise prints a letter from the editor of the Argonaut, in reply to a letter from the editor of the Boston Traveler, on the insurance situation in San Francisco.

The Traveler remarks that "householders in Boston are interested in knowing whether the companies on which they depend for reimbursement in case of loss are standing by their promises in San Francisco." In its comments on the list it prints, however, the Traveler is slightly ambiguous. The companies which it places under "Class I" have practically all been paying in full. Some have required a two per cent discount for spot cash, to which they are entitled under the provisions of their policies, but paid in full on 60 days' time. Five of the companies in "Class I" have not even demanded this two per cent discount, but have been paying as adjusted, 100 per cent spot cash. Those in the Traveler's list under "Class II" are so obscurely adverted to in its comments that they would seem to stand on the same footing as those in "Class I," for the Traveler says of both classes of companies that "taking it all in all, they have settled their claims in an honorable fashion."

We can assure the Boston Traveler and its readers that this statement is not correct of the companies it mentions under "Class II." A great many of them have settled their claims in a very dishonorable fashion. Some of them are old and wealthy companies and not in straits for money. When a company is poor and weak it can not be condemned for trying to make settlements on the best terms possible. But when a company is rich and strong, and yet tries to evade its just liabilities, it is deserving of the contempt of all honorable men. And we can assure the Traveler that in the list of companies it prints under "Class II" there are a number that belong in this dishonorable category.

A further criticism we have to make is this: to bracket the companies in "Class I" beside the companies in "Class II" is a rank injustice to the first list. The companies in "Class I" are deserving of every honor. They went through the storm and stress of a conflagration unequalled in the history of the world. Yet at no time did they falter. Many of them had lost completely every record. Many of their policy-holders had lost their policies. Yet these companies patiently began to pick up the shreds of evidence that remained and reconstructed evidences of their obligation to their clients. It has cost them a great deal of money. But it will all come back to them.

If the Boston Traveler does not wish to print the entire list of insurance companies doing business in San Francisco, as they are—that is to say, as honest companies, as weak companies, as weak and dishonest companies, as bankrupt companies, and as fraudulently bankrupt companies—we would advise it to print only the list of square and honest companies. This the Traveler already has done under the heading "Class I." If it feels averse to printing the names of others as "welching" companies when it has insufficient evidence—and we can readily understand its reluctance—then we would suggest that it content itself with printing only the names of those that it is certain are honest and straight. And it may rest assured that the list it prints under "Class I" belong in that category, with the exception of the last.

Close of the Campaign.

The Argonaut goes to press so far in advance of date that we are writing these lines exactly one week before election day. Ordinarily it would be difficult to forecast the close of the campaign so far in advance. But this campaign presents, to our thinking, no difficulties.

From the beginning of the campaign Gillett has steadily grown in strength. There have been sudden unexpected changes in the alignment of voters, but they have not been in the Republican ranks. They have been in the camps of the Democrats, the Labor Union party, the Socialists, and the Independence League. The Republican phalanx standing behind Gillett remains unmoved.

Only two charges have been made against Mr. Gillett; the first, that he is the "railroad candidate"; the second, that he is "an enemy of labor." Both of these are false. Even if we were not inclined to believe in Mr. Gillett's denial—and he is a truthful and honorable gentleman—there is abundant evidence to the contrary which has been set forth in these columns. It is unnecessary to repeat it here, but we may add to what we have already said that last week in the Los Angeles Times Ex-Senator Bulla gave at length his conviction as to Gillett's independence, saying: "Gillett will be the real chief executive, and not the creature of machine, corporation, or clique, when he is elected Governor." Bulla has been an anti-railroad politician many years, and he was the man for whom Gillett voted steadily for weeks when Burns was the railroad candidate for Senator. This disposes of the first assertion.

As to Gillett's stand on the labor question, he himself in his youth was a laborer and has worked his way up. He has been a friend of labor throughout all his career. He has voted for and worked for practically every measure in the interests of labor in the California Legislature and the House of Representatives. The statement that he voted in Congress against the "Anti-Injunction Bill" demanded by Gompers is false, because that bill has never yet reached a vote in the House. We believe Gillett is opposed to the Gompers bill, and if so, we think he would have voted against it if it had come up, for he is honest and has the courage of his convictions. Furthermore, we think the bill is a bad bill and that he would have done right to vote against it.

It is useless to make forecasts on the eve of an election, but as we write it would seem as if Gillett's election is an assured fact. In round numbers the vote of the State is a little over 300,000. Of this number Pardee polled about 147,000, a trifle under half. Of the remaining half, Lane polled about 144,000, the Socialists about 10,000, and the Prohibitionists about 5,000. There is reason to believe that Gillett will poll a much larger vote than Pardee. But suppose we give him only 3,000 more, say 150,000 votes. Assuming, for the purpose of argument that the vote of the State is about the same as four years ago, Gillett would leave 150,000 votes to be divided between Bell, the Democrat; Langdon, the Independence Leaguer; Lewis, the Socialist; and Blanchard, the Prohibitionist. The Socialist vote this year will probably be larger than four years ago, as the candidate then had an unattractive personality. The candidate this year is Austin Lewis, who is a lawyer, married, a father, young, well educated, good looking, and full of enthusiasm. Internecine troubles in the organized labor camp are driving many of the extreme members into the Socialistic camp. Correspondingly many radicals in the Democratic party will vote for Lewis rather than for Bell.

The following of Langdon is an unknown quantity. It will not be decreased by the startling events in San Francisco during the past fortnight. The prestige of success will certainly swell Langdon's vote. Where can this accretion come from but from Bell? There is no reason why any Republican voter should decide to abandon Gillett because Langdon was forced to indict Bell labor union followers, who had brought shame on themselves and the unfortunate city of San Francisco.

refare, we say that Gillett's phalanx of 150,000 men still stand as they stood at the beginning of the campaign, like Stonewall Jackson's stone wall. The winning, the balking, the readjustment—all this will place in the other 150,000. Concerning the defeat of this readjustment the Argonaut is not particularly interested, and such predictions and calculations at present would for us have a merely mathematical interest. Whatever the changes may be, whether from Bell to Langdon, from Langdon to Lewis, or from Lewis to Bell, they can not affect Gillett. His election may be predicted as certainly as anything human can be.

The Argonaut has not believed from the beginning of any attempt to placate Organized Labor by throwsops to it would result in any gain of votes for Gillett.

We believe that the Republican workingmen intended to vote for him from the beginning, and that still so intend. Therefore, we resented the attacks upon him by the howlers of Organized Labor. One of our Republican contemporaries have been much disturbed over this course of the Argonaut, and have kicked and clucked thereat like setting hens. They warned us of the danger of saying anything against McCarthy, Mr. Tveitmae, Mr. Parry, and numerous Labor Union Ministers, who have been performing exercises on their hot-air bazoos. We thank our contemporaries for their counsel, but we have no use for Labor Union yappers. They are out for themselves first, the Democratic party next, and the Republican party last. Is Mr. Gompers opposing any Democratic Congressmen? Not on your life.

We would like to call our contemporaries' attention to the fact that in the last days of the campaign Mr. Gillett, when informed that he had been hissed at a Labor Union meeting in San Francisco, said in a public speech: "Thank God that audience hissed my name and not cheer it. If there could have been any question in the minds of honest men as to where I stood, that question must have dissipated it. If Bell were to be elected Governor he would undoubtedly turn over to the leaders of this Labor Union meeting the control of State government, just as the control of the government of San Francisco has been turned over to them. They would have to reward McCarthy, Tveitmae, and Parry, and he would have to turn over the State to them for such a reward. God forbid that the time shall ever come when the State shall fall into such hands."

This is not dissimilar in tone to an editorial we printed weeks ago, and which greatly shocked our Republican contemporaries. We told them then that the Democrats and the Labor Union men were gulling them with the idea that "the railroad" is the issue in this campaign. We told them that the issue was whether the Organized Labor leaders should rule this State, or whether the people of California should rule their own State. We told them it is working out our way, for that is the issue.

This issue—which the Argonaut laid down in the beginning of the campaign—was not selected by a campaign committee, or by a campaign committee, or by this newspaper. Neither did Mr. McKinley or Mark Hanna select the gold standard issue in the campaign of '96. They wanted to stand on the tariff. But the silver issue would not down. So it is in California in this campaign. It is folly for campaign committees or stump-speakers to attempt to discuss issues which are not in the people's minds and which they will not discuss. The issue of this campaign is not "the railroad." The people are not thinking or talking of "the railroad." The people of this State are looking at poor San Francisco, paying in pity, partly in scorn. They see her in the hands of Organized Labor—a Niobe among cities—uncared for, discredited, outraged, ashamed. And the issue in the campaign in the minds of the people of the State is whether California shall be turned over to Bell and the Labor Union buccaneers to be dragged in the mire with all like the hapless city, San Francisco.

Let us say here that the Argonaut is responsible for its utterances; the "organization" and the candidate are not responsible for what we say. The San Francisco Star in copying some of our remarks against the alleged dictation of Organized Labor, says: "The San Francisco Argonaut is Mr. Gillett's principal newspaper organ." This phrase it repeats frequently, adding that "Gillett's organ, the Argonaut, denounces laboring men as helots, slaves, and a danger to the State." This is not true. We do not consider working men a danger to the State. In fact, they are the most necessary element in a State. But we do consider the attempt of Organized Labor Unions, led by walking delegates, to bring about class government, as a danger to the State. In regard to the accusation of the Star that "The Argonaut is Mr. Gillett's principal newspaper organ," we have only to say that the editor of the Argonaut does not know Mr. Gillett, never met Mr. Gillett, never saw Mr. Gillett, never wrote to Mr. Gillett, never was written to by Mr. Gillett, and never has had any communication whatever with Mr. Gillett. None the less, we have a great admiration for Mr. Gillett, and have done all we can in our wrong-headed way to help his election. If we have injured his cause, we are sincerely sorry.

But we do not think we have. It is our belief that after next week's election, Congressman Gillett will be called "Governor-Elect Gillett."

Bell is the Labor Union Nominee.

"S. C. M." writes us and says: "You state in your last issue that Mr. Bell, Democratic candidate for Governor, is the nominee of the Labor Union party. Yet the cards of the various Republican candidates nearly all say 'Republican Nominee' and 'Labor Union Nominee.' Which party is it that is affiliated with the Labor Union party?"

It is the Democratic party, as a party. Mr. Bell is the head of the Democratic ticket, has been nominated by the Labor Union party, and has accepted their nomination. While various Republican candidates, judicial, municipal, and State, may have been individually endorsed by the Labor Union party, Mr. Gillett has not accepted any such endorsement. He is the head of the ticket. Therefore the Republican ticket is not affiliated with the Labor Union party. The Democratic ticket is.

FRIENDS OF THE COURT.

A Dream and a Forgetting.

Scene—A Court of Justice in San Francisco.

On the right, Grafters' District Attorney, supported by Prize Fighters, Detectives, and Uniformed Police.

On the left, Anti-Grafters' District Attorney, supported by Prominent Citizens, College Students, and Amateur Fighters. All are heavily armed.

From without is heard the howling of a mob, one faction shouting "Hang the Grafters!" to which come counter-cries of "Down with the Citizens' Alliance!"

The doors are heavily barred. From time to time a door is opened slightly by a Police Officer, whereupon a Prominent Citizen or a Grafters is popped through the aperture like a cork out of a bottle.

The police proceed to search the Anti-Grafters' Attorney. A violent altercation arises in consequence. The Grafters accuse the Anti-Grafters of being assassins. The Anti-Grafters retort that their opponents are thugs.

At this moment A Stranger arises and attempts to address the Court.

The Judge (speaking to The Bailiff)—"Who is this person?"

The Bailiff—"I think he's wan of them Citizens' Alliance guys, yer anner."

The Stranger—"If the Court please, I am the Attorney-General of the State."

The Court—"Attorney-General?"

The Attorney-General—"Yes, your Honor."

The Court—"Attorney-General of the State?"

The Attorney-General—"Yes, your Honor. If the Court please —"

The Court—"Of what State?"

The Attorney-General—"Of California."

The Court—"Are you a member of the bar?"

The Attorney-General (with surprise)—"Yes, your Honor, I am admitted to the bar of the Federal Supreme Court."

The Court (wearily)—"I am not speaking of the Federal Supreme Court. We have very little to do here with Supreme Courts, Federal or State."

The Attorney-General—"I am also admitted to practice before the Supreme Court of California."

The Court—"California again! But I asked you, sir, if you are admitted to the bar of San Francisco."

The Attorney-General (confusedly)—"Really, your Honor, I was under the impression that —"

The Court (turning to the grafting and anti-grafting District Attorneys, who with their henchmen are glaring angrily at the stranger)—"I believe, gentlemen, that a condition of comity exists between the courts of San Francisco and those of California. This gentleman purports to be a law official of California. Is there any objection, gentlemen, to the Court hearing him?"

The Grafting District Attorney—"Your Honor, I protest! What is this man doing here? What have these high-handed satraps from afar to do with the courts of this municipality? Who is this man claiming to be the Attorney-General of California? Why is he butting in here? Let him show his hand. If, as I have every reason to believe, he is on the side of the bulldozing gang of rich and corrupt Citizens' Alliance men who are attempting to stifle justice here, I denounce him! I call upon your Honor to refuse him a hearing within the walls of this temple of justice where he has no right to stand. I hold him up to public scorn. I spit upon —"

He stops to expectorate. His rival swiftly takes advantage of this and jumps in.

The Anti-Grafting District Attorney—"If the court please, I denounce the person who has just sat down as an infamous liar and blackguard. Further, I believe he is the secret ally of this unknown person who is trying to inject himself into this case. This self-styled Attorney-General has nothing to do with us. We know nothing of his designs. Who is the Attorney-General of the State of California, anyway? What has the State of California to do with us? What has it to do with the proceedings of this court? What concern have we with the California Department of Justice? Is this a court of justice? No—a thousand times no! It is a court of law. It is a San Francisco court. I call your Honor's attention to the fact that we in the city of San Francisco are working under a charter which gives us complete autonomy. What has this hayseed pettifogger here to do with the case at bar? I call upon your Honor to bid him withdraw, and if he refuses let him be imprisoned for contempt of court!"

The Court (moodily, gazing at The Stranger)—"You hear, sir. If you choose to divest yourself of your pseudo-official character—and I wish to call your attention to the fact that I have no judicial knowledge of the fact that you are Attorney-General of the State of California, or that it is a State, or that it is called California, or that you are its Attorney-General, or that you are an attorney at all—if, I say, you temporarily allay the natural suspicions excited by your extremely dubious entry into this case, and appear solely as an attorney, a member of the bar —"

An Amicus Curiae (rising)—"If your Honor please, I represent the San Francisco Bar Association in these proceedings. May I ask whether this person belongs to the Bar Association?"

The Attorney-General—"I take pleasure in informing the gentleman that I have the honor to be a member of the Bar Association."

Three or four Amici Curiae confer feverishly in whispers, and then take notes.

First Amicus Curiae—"Do you claim, sir, that you are a member of the San Francisco Bar Association? My learned friends here by my side, also amici curiae, all profess the utmost ignorance of you."

The Attorney-General—"I am a member of the State Bar Association of California."

The Amici Curiae confer again.

Second Amicus Curiae (rising)—"Your Honor, it is evident that the gentleman belongs to some other Bar Association of which we have no knowledge. It is probable, however, that there is a California Bar Association, and we may assume, purely for purposes of argument, that it is an association in good standing and that this person is a reputable attorney. Therefore, your Honor, the representatives of the San Francisco Bar Association temporarily withdraw their opposition—without prejudice—to the court hearing what this person has to say."

The Grafters and Anti-Grafters come together and confer, glaring the while at the Attorney-General. A messenger is sent to the crowd without. The previous yells of opposition die away, and shortly the cries of the crowd are heard in one unanimous yell, "Hang the Attorney-General!"

The Attorney-General (rising)—"If the court please, I beg to say that my appearance here today is forced upon me by the Political Code. I regret it extremely. I know that this is purely a family quarrel with which the State has nothing to do. I am aware, also, that the judiciary, the bar, and the citizens of San Francisco resent with justifiable indignation any attempt by the officers of the State to interfere in their affairs. It is true that you have a municipal charter, but, unfortunately, we all of us are governed by the codes as well. This is true, even in San Francisco. Under the Political Code it is my duty to repair to any county in the State when the District Attorney's office is threatened with any trouble, external or internal. I regret very sincerely this disagreeable duty. I shall make my functions purely nominal. I hate to intrude. I agree to say nothing which could offend anybody, and I will promise to do nothing at all. I only ask your permission, as the law is so stringent, to attend at these proceedings. The people of the State seem to think that I ought to do something. I know they are very unreasonable, but there are nearly two millions of them. Dear, good, kind, San Francisco, do not be too severe on them and me."

At this moment loud knocking is heard at the barred doors of the courtroom, which shake under the assault from without. Wild cries are heard: "Hang him! Hang him! Hang the Attorney-General!"

The Court (coldly)—"You see, sir, to what a pitch of justifiable indignation your unwarranted conduct has wrought up the citizens of San Francisco. I shall be forced to place you under restraint for the purpose of protecting you from physical violence. You will understand, sir, that this is not to be considered in the light of imprisonment, but merely as a formal protection. This court, sir, does not consider itself responsible for your safety since you have seen fit to intrude where you were not wanted, but considerations of common humanity impel us to grant to you that protection which you certainly do not deserve. The bailiff will escort you to a place of safety."

The Bailiff (catching hold of the Attorney-General by the collar)—"Come on, you. G'wan now!" (pushing him through the door). "We'll put you where the b'ys won't be after persuadin' you wid a gas-poipe."

The Attorney-General is put in the cooler, while the little family dispute up-stairs is resumed with renewed vigor, the outside cries gradually changing to "Hang the Judge!"

JUDGE JAMES A. COOPER'S SUPPORT.

Judge James A. Cooper is receiving active support from the leading members of the bar of San Francisco. An active canvass is being made in Judge Cooper's behalf by such leading legal lights as G. W. McEnerney, Charles W. Slack, Francis V. Keesling, Jos. S. Tobin, Chas. S. Wheeler, Reuben H. Lloyd, C. P. Pomeroy, W. P. Cope, J. F. Sullivan, Alexander P. Vogelsang, I. I. Brown, William Denman, Oscar Sutro and John S. Drum. These gentlemen stand for the dignity and integrity of the profession, and are recognized everywhere as leading lawyers. This endorsement is itself a distinguished honor, and in the politics of California has seldom before been achieved by any candidate.

Judge Cooper is at present an Associate Justice of the District Court of Appeals for the First District, and in the position since his appointment in 1905 he has written more than five hundred opinions, covering almost every phase of the law, and many of these have become leading cases. During his present term of office his friends point with pride to the fact that not one of his decisions has ever been reversed by the Supreme Court. His qualifications are unusual, his integrity unquestioned.

There are now thirty-one negro banks in the United States, with a combined capital of $350,000. Their deposits amount to $1,192,000. Twelve are in Mississippi, four in Georgia, six in Virginia, two in Tennessee, two in Arkansas and one each in North Carolina, Alabama and Florida. There are also two in Muskogee, I. T.

END OF THE NEW YORK FIGHT.

Hearst Chiefs Confident and Liberal—Hughes Men Not Ready to Guess.

Hearst's meetings in New York City continue to be notable exhibitions of enthusiasm. This is a paragraph from a report sent out on the 24th inst.:

The greatest demonstration of the night was at the close of his fourth and last speech, which he made at a theatre in the North End. He had hardly finished when the crowd swept upon the stage and practically mobbed the candidate. It was all the police and the committee could do to rescue Hearst from the enthusiasts.

At Saratoga Mr. Hearst's lieutenant, Shearn, made a great hit by a sudden personal allusion:

The crowd howled with delight when Clarence J. Shearn began his speech with these words: "Mr. Chairman, Jefferson Democrats, Lincoln Republicans, and Senator Brackett."

He had, indeed, spotted the Republican leader at Saratoga, the most popular citizen for whom every man would delight to vote for any office up to the presidency. The discovery that Brackett was in the same boat with themselves tickled his fellow-townsmen, and they roared with laughter.

"There he is over there," shouted Mr. Shearn. "You know him. He was too honest for the corporation Republicans at the convention here a few weeks ago. What use had they for him—for a man who had the courage to introduce a resolution demanding the resignation of Tom Platt and Chauncey Depew?"

In Boardman Hall at Cornell College a campaign meeting was held by the Cornell Hughes Club, and this report is printed:

The principal address was made by Professor Henry A. Sill, of the Department of History, a one-time Democrat. Professor Sill accused Hearst of insincerity, unscrupulousness and demagoguery.

"Which one of his gifted staff wrote his last speech?" he asked. He called Hearst an unscrupulous politician. He lauded the World for exposing the falsity of Hearst's "quotation" from Lincoln, and accused Hearst of deliberately lying. In conclusion he urged the students to support Hughes.

Speaker Cannon spoke at White Plains, New York, a few evenings ago, and mentioned Hearst once and Hughes not at all. An explosion of flashlight powder startled him during his speech and he said:

"That is the second of those things, and I think two is enough." Mr. Cannon told of the record of W. J. Bryan as a Congressman. "And," he said, "this peerless one is going to be the next candidate of the Democratic party for the presidency of the United States, if Hearst doesn't crowd him out. But, if you put all of that kind in a bag together and shake them up they'd come out either skunk or polecat. One man wants to cure our ills by tearing up all the railroad tracks in the United States. God bless you, I haven't any sympathy with such men. You can't put any dependence in a man who says he'd tear up every damn railroad track in the country if he had his way."

A hand accompanied Speaker Cannon from the Omawaupeum Hotel to St. John's Hall. He walked the few blocks between the two points. Before leaving the hotel he drank a large cup of hot water. He complained of indigestion, and when pressed to take something that would keep him warm, said that there would be plenty of time when the meeting was over.

Richard Watson Gilder, editor of the Century Magazine, felt called upon to write a letter denouncing Hearstism and Hearst methods, and it was given to the press. This is the comment it provoked, an editorial, probably by Arthur Brisbane, in the Evening Journal:

Did you ever see the sensitive, little, quivering nose of the sensitive, little mouse?

Then you have seen Richard Watson Gilder. Who would hurt him?

One of our friendly readers writes: "Have you seen the letter against Mr. Hearst written by Richard Watson Gilder? Why don't you go at him and rip him up?" Our answer is: "Reader, you surely have never seen Mr. Gilder."

We should as soon think of "ripping up" the fluffy, feebly-scratching incubator chick as to attack Mr. Gilder. The tender apple-blossom blowing in the spring wind has more manliness in it than Mr. Gilder's body and soul. He is a zephyr, a breath. In face, in form, in voice, and in movement he is a pathetic imitation of a young girl. Nobody would hurt him.

Has our reader who asks for such harsh words ever seen a quivering little sensitive mouse slip across the floor in search of a crumb?

That is, to the very life, Mr. Richard Watson Gilder, with his gray hair falling around his little mouse eyes, and his thin body shivering in his black cape, gliding into a room among men.

The man who would attack Mr. Gilder by word or deed would be capable of attacking the eleven-ounce baby in the Coney Island incubator.

Like the apple blossom in the wind, the mouse in the great steel building, the premature citizen in the hot incubator, Mr. Gilder is to be admired for the fact that he is alive at all. Only our kind thoughts are for him.

The correspondent of the World furnished this picture of a meeting between Mr. Hearst and a discontented delegate:

There was a strike on by the newsboys against the man who handles the Hearst newspapers in Rochester. A local speaker at the Germania Hall meeting spoke of it and said: "It first strike Mr. Hearst ever had, and this won't last an hour, he learns of it, if there is any merit on the boys' side." Hearst, on his way to Germania Hall five minutes late startled by a ragged boy, who jumped on his carriage stuck his head inside. In two minutes he had finished a word which told the newspaper proprietor all about the Mr. Hearst said he hadn't heard of it. He thanked the boy said he would take the matter up as soon as he reached York.

The Chicago Chronicle describes a recent occurrence in the Illinois metropolis as an illustration of the manner in which Mr. Hearst is supposed to condemn:

William R. Hearst and Victor F. Lawson, publishers of cent afternoon newspapers, formed an agreement to advance price of their papers from fifty cents per 100 to sixty cents per 100. As this reduction cut down the already small margin carriers' profits to the vanishing point, a certain proportion of the carriers exercised their undoubted rights and declined to handle the American and the News. The next morning Tuesday morning—these carriers found themselves locked out of every morning newspaper establishment with the exception of the Chronicle. They were thus given to understand that they did not carry the Hearst and the Lawson afternoon papers, or at least without any profit, they could not have the papers to serve to their patrons. This was and is a more flagrant and outrageous from the fact that the law is committed at the behest of William R. Hearst.

At the close of last week the Hearst leaders confident and generous in their estimates of the popularity of their candidate would receive. Tammany Leader said 74,000 in the city; Chairman of the State Committee, William J. Connors, said 148,000; Max sen, Hearst's campaign manager, said 150,000. Accompanying these reports is this from the Herald:

During the day Timothy L. Woodruff, chairman of the Republican State Committee, and State Committeeman V. Barnes, Jr., of Albany, talked with thirty-one of the sixty chairmen of the Republican party throughout the State. Various chairmen reported the conditions of their home counties. Asked what the reports were, Mr. Woodruff said:

"I don't care to discuss them."

"Will you say anything about the political situation throughout the State?" Woodruff was asked.

"Yes," he replied. "I think about 9 o'clock on the morning of November 6 I shall say something."

Visions of possible action by Hearst in the gubernatorial chair are called up by some apprehensive politicians:

The possible removal from office of Mayor McClellan, District Attorney Jerome by Mr. Hearst, if elected Governor of New York, is apparently agitating many minds. Under the constitution of the State, Hearst would have the power to remove them both, and scores of other officials in addition. President Roosevelt, when Governor, exercised this prerogative and manly removed District Attorney Gardiner, of New York, Sheriff Guden, of Kings County.

As usual in New York large sums are being wagered on the result of the election. This report was sent last Friday:

As a result of a great influx of Hearst money in the hours of the afternoon, the odds dropped from 3 to 1 on Hughes to 2 to 1 and 2½ to 1. It was reported in the curb market that about $100,000 had been placed at that price.

The Los Angeles News has these editorial notes on the situation:

Among the correspondents of important papers who are sending daily dispatches from New York on the campaign, are Hornaday of the Indianapolis News and Raymond Patten of the Chicago Tribune, both men of the highest standing in the profession, and both are convinced that Hearst is likely to win. They comment particularly upon the great crowds which attend the Hearst meetings everywhere. As to this the Indianapolis News remarks editorially, that in 1872 another newspaper editor (Mr. Greeley) ran for office in similar circumstances and when he made his tour, the crowds that greeted him were enormous. But no candidate ever was more badly beaten. People wanted to see him. They cheered him, too. Election day, "the great American sterling common sense" won its way.

The largest factory in the country for the making of fine writing-paper is to be erected in Holyoke, Mass. The estimated cost of the six buildings, together with the necessary machinery, is about $700,000. Nearly 400 operatives will be employed. The plant will have a capacity of thirty tons of writing-paper daily. The mills will form an extension of the American Writing Paper Company's property, which now includes sixteen factories.

It was Admiral Dewey who said the Filipinos are as capable of self-government as the Cubans, observing that the Atlanta (Ga.) Constitution, and asks: Hasn't the hero of Manila Bay?

FAILURE OF PARIS SUNDAY LAW.

Restaurateurs Perplexed, Barbera and Bakers in Confusion and Distress.

It has been attempted many times to make each and every day happy by law, and still the attempts are to be counted by failure than of success. At this moment in Paris we are in the excitement of a new effort to force employers to make their holidays more frequent and longer. As before, the accomplishment is uncertain. Because of Socialist and Radical demands, a new law to enforce a weekly day of rest was produced, and for some time the government has endeavored to carry out its provisions. To the surprise of many well-meaning persons, the ones to be benefited are making the enforcement a work of difficulty. The law does not require that in all cases Sunday shall be chosen for the holiday. Employers of labor desire to obey the law, but without interruption to their business and great inconvenience to the public. They planned with their workmen for alternate rest-days, a part of the employees to have their holiday while others worked. But the plan failed, and confusion and actual want of the necessities have followed.

To present the spectacle in its absurdity: The barbers on the Boulevards St. Germain and St. Michel heard the decision of the Prefect of Police that they must close their establishments Sundays, but they preferred to work Monday. The workmen gain from Sunday tips were well pleased. But the barbers from other establishments which had closed, surrounded the ones still open and demanded that work should cease, and making to quiet their demands the workmen laid down their razors and scissors. Patrons were left in their stalls still draped and with soaped and half-shaven faces. The dogs were like Russian poodles, partly shorn. Waiting lists of idlers and watching deputations jeered the few admitted ones.

It was much more annoying, but not without amusement. In other departments of trade and labor there were disturbing incidents. About the bakeries there were throngs of inquirers of two species—workmen who demanded that the fellows should cease from labor and join them, and others desiring Sunday supplies. Three thousand families were affected by the declarations of the workmen. Where bakers persisted in their duties there was disorder. Windows were broken, sand and stones thrown, unbaked bread. Master bakers who had closed their factories went in parties to bakeries that remained open, bought all the bread ready for sale and distributed it without cost to the people. One prosperous poplectic proprietor was so affected by the outcry and struggles that he fell in a fit and did not recover. That meant loss and endless difficulty for some was a source of gain by others. At the wine-shops in the districts there were procured, for the first closed day, supplies of bread for the demand foreseen, these loaves were bought eagerly by the poor, but at exorbitant prices. With all this there were many who could not be supplied, and fresh bread was not to be had on the Monday following. Stale loaves only can be found in the bakeries now on Mondays.

At the restaurants there are even more insurmountable obstacles to a complete enforcement of the law. The Sunday dinner is not only the necessity of the individual, but the need of the family that on other days dines in their own apartments. But the chefs must rest, and to take their places no competent ones can be found. Waiters, too, must for one day desist serving and accepting the tips of the served. The police have complete control of the employees at each cafe and restaurant, and enforce the rule that only six days of labor shall be performed by them. Those who would rest on another day and work on Sunday are prevented, if possible, by those who are not employed. The Limonadiers' Union, which includes the better part of the restaurant and cafe proprietors, seriously considers the proposal to close entirely and allow the government to observe the distress of the public that would result. This is not to be regarded calmly.

A change is already to be observed in the appearance of the boulevards. There is less of gayety, good humor, and holiday aspect. From place to place of anticipated disagreement go parties of dissatisfied workmen. It does not seem possible that Paris shall come to present such scenes of desolate quiet as the streets of London on Sunday.

There is yet a large and important division of laborers not affected by the law. For seven years railroad engineers and firemen have been assured legally one day of rest in every ten; conductors, guards, and starters, one day in every fifteen; agents at the stations two half-days in the month. In the railroad workshops, however, and in the luggage and goods transportation departments, are many thousands for whom no provision has been made. They will add their appeals for consideration to the differing complaints of those who have been contemplated by the new law, but who are still discontented. Without doubt there will be a revision of the law. A day of rest is an agreed necessity, but it seems beyond possibility that it may be made of general application for the same day of the week for all in one department of industry. The most determined Socialists and Radicals will not longer insist upon such a regulation. The experiences of the past month have swept away unnumbered illusions.

St. Martin.

Paris, October 9, 1906.

"It has probably not escaped the attention of William Jennings Bryan that the Democrats who are denouncing Hearst are the men who bolted his nomination for the Presidency in 1896 and 1900," remarks the Oakland Tribune. "Belmont, Ryan, Jerome and all that crowd opposed Bryan with all their might each time he was a candidate. The New York Times, New York World, New York Evening Post and Brooklyn Eagle could no more stomach the Nebraska statesman than they can Hearst. They found an ideal candidate in Alton B. Parker, but Parker was the worst-beaten man that ever ran for President. The majority against him in his own State—New York—was phenomenal. Hearst will probably be defeated, but it is quite certain that no other Democrat is able to poll the vote he can. The fact is, that the Democracy of the Empire State is split into two factions as far apart in aims and purposes as the poles. A negative, colorless man might get the nominal support of both factions, but could poll the full strength of neither and would satisfy nobody. The bolters are prominent by reason of their wealth and position, but they are numerically insignificant."

Daniel Drew added to the language; Theodore Roosevelt is subtracting from it, remarks the Washington Post. Drew's contribution was "watered stock," and it grew out of the fact that when he sold a drove of oxen he weighed them to the buyer immediately after they had drank copious quantities of water. After the old drover got to be a magnate of Wall street, this practice of his gave addition to our financial nomenclature. Commodore Vanderbilt was the first to practice it, and for the reason that it was the only way in the world to keep the New York Central Railroad as then chartered out of perpetual bankruptcy. At this reading the "water" the old commodore put in the Central is worth $1.44 to the dollar.

Senator Edward Wolcott had a more genial view of William McKinley than is expressed by John S. Wise in his recent book, notes Harper's Weekly. "I go into the White House," said he to a friend in the Senate, "for some of the luscious fruit of patronage hanging on its inner walls. The gracious gardener receives me so sweetly that I go away satiated with the rich odors of the things I seek, and it is only when I see you and other friends of the administration that I realize—so sadly—that the fruit itself is hanging there still."

In accepting his renomination to Congress, Nicholas Longworth declared to the Republican convention in Cincinnati: "Upon questions of party policy I am first, last, and all the time a follower of President Roosevelt. Not because he is my friend and counselor in many things; not because we are of near family connection; not because of my admiration for him as a man, but because, upon great public questions, I believe that he is right, and because that, by following his leadership, I shall be doing that which is right."

In Alabama, a couple of weeks ago, at a Republican convention, there was not a negro present—one of the details indicating a general drift of the Republicans in the South toward leaving the negroes out of their politics.

SEISMIC OBSERVATIONS AT SANTIAGO.

Professor Curtis Writaea of the Chilean Earthquake and Its Effect.

The earthquake at Valparaiso and Santiago, Chile, was four months after the San Francisco convulsion, lacking two days, and the events of that fateful night, August 16, and the succeeding week of continued tremors, are now being described with calmness and completeness. A few days ago Professor Kroeck, of the Pacific University at San Jose, received a letter from Professor Heber D. Curtis of the Santiago observatory, which gives an account of many striking scenes and incidents of the catastrophe. Professor Curtis was for many years connected with the Pacific University, and later was at the Lick Observatory. He was put in charge of the observatory at Santiago, equipped through the generosity of D. O. Mills, when work began there. He says:

I think we can go California one better as far as simon-pure earthquakes are concerned. Chile has been pretty hard hit, as most of her wealth and resources are situated in this central portion of her territory. On the whole her people are standing it as well as could be expected of this kind of people, but not like San Franciscans of course.

As in San Francisco, the first shock was the most severe:

The California shock was about one minute in length; here it lasted four minutes and fifty seconds! The din and shrieks of the natives made a great uproar, and the ground shook so that it was difficult to walk. . . . All Santiago slept outdoors that night despite the rain, in coaches, public and private, street cars, or in the open; all, except fool foreigners like ourselves. None of us slept, however, except the two younger children and my wife, who has no nerves and is probably the only woman in Santiago who undressed and went to bed that night. I stayed up on guard and got a few "cat-naps" between shocks. There were 23 that night and the total number of after-shakes since then must now be well over 130.

The Chilean weather bureau had vaguely predicted seismic disturbances for the 16th, basing them on an alleged conjunction between the moon and Jupiter, although, as Prof. Curtis points out, the conjunction occurred on the 14th. It was thought that the astronomers could give further information concerning the future:

For a week our little home was literally besieged with thirsters after earthquake information, poor peones, detachments of mounted police from every station in the city and several from the chief army officers, and even a brilliant aide-de-camp from His Excellency the President of Chile, all with the same question, "Will there be another terremoto tonight?" I assured them all that, in my opinion, all danger had passed, there was no probability of another heavy shock, though the small after-shocks might continue some time.

I gave to the press similar statements, and have recently, owing to the prevalence of rumors of other shocks predicted by "los astrónomos yanquis," sent out a statement that shocks had absolutely no connection with astronomical phenomena, that the observatory had never predicted and would never attempt to predict the time of an earthquake shock, and that all such rumors were absolutely false.

Dread significance was given by the Chileans to the most trifling things, especially if there was any mystery connected with them:

Some picnickers had previously placed on the highest point of Mount San Cristobal, about a quarter of a mile from the observatory, a small flagstaff with a white flag at the top and a bunch of brush tied beneath it. This had been in full view of the city for nearly two months. But this day it got on their nerves. Why was this black flag being displayed from the Cerro? Was "el astrónomo yanqui" predicting another terremoto? This and other rumors took possession of the people. Paddock and I and two helpers were at the top all day and so knew nothing of the panic till the afternoon, when some mounted policemen came to the top to ask the meaning of the "black flag." I was much puzzled, but when I found out the trouble I urged them to cut down the pole at once, and finally did it myself just as a mounted policeman was sent up for the purpose. That night there came an emissary from the president asking the meaning of the signals which I was displaying from the Cerro, and would I favor them with a code? I explained in a letter, which was published the next day, the harmless character and age of this "flag" and told where it could now be found.

Prof. Curtis is convinced that the shocks were tectonic in character:

A commission has been appointed to study the shock and its causes. I published a statement that the primary cause was doubtless the same as at San Francisco, the slipping or sliding of one stratum past another, due to the well-known geological fact that the coast of Chile is very slowly rising. I learn since that the Bay of Valparaiso is now ten feet shallower. So I think that the displacement in this shock will prove to be mainly vertical. It may be that the centre of disturbance was under the sea, as Valparaiso suffered much more than Santiago.

Among those who handle high explosives there runs this proverb: "In this business a man never makes more than one mistake."

A RIVER TRAGEDY.

An Experience of a Logger's Life in the Redwoods.

The Mendocino redwood country is not the pleasantest place in the world to be in during rainy weather. Once the wet season has regularly set in, the belt that stretches for miles north of the Gualala River along the coast presents about as cheerless and dismal a prospect as a depressed imagination would care to picture. Life, however, is stirring at such times. The freshets which then occur upon the river carry down immense quantities of timber to the coast, where it is collected, assorted, and held ready for transport to San Francisco or other commercial centers. This, of course, entails activity commensurate with the fall of the rain and the extent of the freshet.

The Gualala River is the natural drain for the great basin of the Mendocino redwoods, and though its actual course is short compared with other California rivers, its north, middle, and south forks together form a very respectable aggregate of water highway, the logging business on which is by no means the least of the industries of the State. Two or three winters ago I chanced to be in this section of the country, just as the first heavy rains were setting in. and, as luck would have it, had got caught in the district lying between the middle and south forks of the Gualala River. When heavy rains set in it is no uncommon thing for the dwellers between the forks to be kept water-bound for several days at a time, with the alternative of either crossing the swollen torrent or making a difficult passage over the plashing, soggy mountain divides to the stage road in the interior of the country. Such was the state of affairs when I found myself unexpectedly caught at a small logging camp near the banks of the creek, thankful enough, however, under the circumstances, to have shelter over my head, a roaring fire to sit at, and a bunk to turn into when I got ready.

"Rain's a-comin' down purty lively," remarked one of the three woodsmen who occupied the cabin, as he finished cleaning the supper dishes and lit his pipe. "Startin' in purty early, ain't it, Jim?"

"Waal, no," replied the party addressed from the bunk, where he was lying stretched upon his blankets, reading some old papers by the light of a candle. "I reck'lect it comin' down heavier nor this afore January. Seventy-six, warn't it, Bill, when the forks was a-boomin', an' we cudden make the Point for nigh onto two weeks?"

The third personage, addressed as Bill, assented with a nod of the head, from a stool before the fire, where he sat with his chin upon his hands.

"No, nor I wouldn't keer to make the Point on sech a night as this," observed the first personage who spoke, as he drew up a stool beside Bill and myself, and puffed away at his pipe.

"It's a matter of some difficulty then, crossing the river, is it?" I asked, with the tinge of anxiety, as I knew very well that the "Point" alluded to was the settlement of Stewart's Point, toward which I was then traveling, and to get there it was necessary to cross the fork of the river we were now on.

"Well, stranger, I should remark," said Bill, who had hitherto said nothing, looking up. "The fords is all up, the crick hez riz more'n five feet senst mornin', and there's nary bridge 'cept ye take the logs, and it's a mighty dang'rous thing to do, ev'n fur a 'sperienched hand, let alone a tenderfoot. Why, fust thing ye know'd, the hull pile might break up, an' ye'd find yerself at the Point quicker'n ye had use fur, ev'n s'posin' ye didn't git crushed to sawdust or drowned afore ye was fifty feet on yer way." And the old logger relapsed into meditation, with a cough in which I thought I could detect a tinge of pity.

The slight smattering which I possessed of woodcraft was enough to tell me that the remarks just made related to an enormous pile of heterogeneous logs and trunks of trees, that formed a compact mass bridging the stream some quarter of a mile above, the slippery and treacherous nature of which might well prove fatal to a tyro in the redwoods, should he attempt to cross that rude and perilous causeway, which, I noticed on passing in that afternoon, constituted then the only practicable connection between shore and shore.

The company had relapsed into silence, only broken by the swish of the driving rain upon the cabin's walls, when suddenly the door was thrown open and a fourth woodsman stepped unceremoniously in.

"Hello, Dan Higgins!" exclaimed the trio, almost in a breath, as the newcomer brought his dripping, oilskin-clad figure nearer the fire.

"What's brought ye out in sech a night as this?" said Bill, making room for him: "I'd ha' thought you'd rather ha' stayed in doors wi' the old woman. I shud, in your place, you bet."

"I came down to borrr yer hook," returned the person addressed as Dan Higgins, shaking the rain from his clothes; "mine's broke."

"What ye want with a hook t'night?" chorused the crowd.

"Gwine ter cross the creek an' git med'cine for the little gal," replied Dan. "She's took awful bad wi' the newmoany, and nothin' 'll do the old woman but to git medicine from the Point right away. Whar's yer hook? Oh, thar it is in the corner," he continued, walking to one end of the cabin and taking up a long pole tipped with steel, something like a boat-hook, used occasionally by loggers to steady themselves upon such passages as Dan now proposed to make.

"How were the logs lookin' as ye come along, Dan?" asked Bill, reflectively.

"The water was lappin' 'em purty lively," replied Dan; "but that there big trunk's layin' right 'cross stream below, and it'll take a might big push to start her. Guess she's all right for a day or two yet, anyways."

"Waal, ef ye're bound to make it," said Bill, getting up and suiting the action to the word, "I'll see ye acrost the creek with the lantern;" and so saying, both men stepped out into the dark, pulling to the cabin door with some difficulty behind them.

It might have been ten or fifteen minutes after, that a low, deep sound, quite distinct from that made by the wind and rain dashing outside, or the swirl of the water lapping the banks of the stream some fifty yards below the cabin, suddenly fell upon our ears. Both the woodsmen in the cabin jumped to their feet simultaneously, and I did likewise.

"The logs hez busted!" cried Jim, "an' the chances is as how Dan Higgins an' Bill hain't got acrost yet. Like enough they's got caught, an', ef so, God help em!" and the logger caught up a lantern and jumped out of the cabin without waiting to put on his hat, speedily followed by his partner and myself, all of us making our way in the direction of the creek. The muffled sound, like the deep, distant rumbling of thunder, came heavier, and began to resolve itself into the grinding and groaning of the trunks of the gigantic trees, now rather felt than seen, moving down the creek slowly to the position where we stood.

"Thar they are!" exclaimed Jim, his already blanched face looking even more ghastly beneath the rays of the lantern carried in his partner's hand. "Thar they are, both the two o' them! Don't yer see their lantern shinin' up from the front logs?"

There certainly, about a hundred yards up stream, flickered and danced a fitful spark, oscillating from side to side with the motion of the log on which the men evidently stood, though I could not distinguish their forms through the darkness and blinding rain.

Two minutes more and the dread procession had approached near enough for us to distinguish the figures and their peril. They were standing near the hither end of a gigantic redwood trunk, the foremost of the floating squadron of trees and logs, coming down, as inexorable rear guard, directly upon it, and threatening to overwhelm, or snap, or crush it by sheer weight if it offered the least obstacle to their majestic onward sweep. The two woodsmen had evidently chosen, or rather shifted, their position as near to the shore as possible, where they could now see their friends standing by our lantern, just as we saw them by theirs. But the unequal distribution of gravity which this very step of self-preservation involved, was every moment causing the tree to assume a more and more transverse position to the stream, so that it became evident to an experienced eye that it was only a matter of time before it would again stretch the same barriers from shore to shore it had done before starting upon its compulsory voyage. This, however, ineffectual as it would have been to protect the lives upon it from the irresistible force being projected against it, was not destined to be accomplished. Foot by foot the wall of trees and behind it was approaching, owing to the decreased momentum of the transversely floating tree in front.

Suddenly a shriek divided the comparatively stillness of the night, so intent had all the actors been the pressing necessity of the moment, even to hazy exclamation. A female figure came flying down slope from the camp above, and as she dashed to bank of the creek it became evident that she was swinging a riata above her head. The leather thong whirled through the air straight for the men, standing now more than fifty feet abreast of us on the trunk of tree. Bill, who was holding the lantern, caught noose, and, slipping it over the head of Dan Higgins till the thong caught around his waist, said, in a voice we could hear from the bank:

"Thar ye are. I kin ketch on to the back o' the tree an' make the bank's quick's yerself. I hain't got time to waste on my wife 'n' family to s'port, noways. Jump!"

So saying, both men leaped headlong into the air, eight strong arms straining every energy to catch them through the eddy made by the tree, now relieved of its weight, swinging slowly around toward length of the stream. Thirty feet and both men would have been safe, but, at last, the great supporting beam being driven sheer endways down the channel, shorter logs, now with free room to play, surging driving past it on every side. One of these bore straight down upon the woodsmen. With a gigantic effort, both men, from the deadly danger before them, the pull upon leather rope by the men on shore seemed for a moment to make the nearly submerged bodies fairly leap from the water. Next moment both men disappeared from view beneath the ponderous trunk, and when, five or six seconds later, the burden at the end of the riata dragged to shore, it was lighter by one.

Nothing could be done for the generous and venturesome man who had in a measure sacrificed his single life to save that of his married partner—for might well have appropriated the saving noose. When, three days afterward his body was washed back from the bar at the river's mouth, not an eye was cast at it, and not a man was absent from the funeral procession of the rude woodsman who was not known—and, as far as my inquiries could stretch, never had been known by any other name than that of "Bill."

The lavish establishment and entertainments of the Ambassador Reid, which have amazed even the English, have frequently given rise to comment on the extent to which our diplomatic service is becoming limited to very wealthy men, notes the Springfield (Mass.) Republican. The American embassy at Berlin presents for the moment an even more striking example. Ambassador Tower himself is reputed to have a very large fortune. But just now American society in Berlin impatiently waiting the coming of Spencer Eddy, new first secretary. The special cause of interest in Mr. Eddy is that he comes from his last post in St. Petersburg with "a reputation for magnificent living that he has 'seven automobiles' and that since leaving St. Petersburg he has married Miss Spreckels, the San Francisco heiress of the famous sugar family. A second secretary at Berlin is Robert Garrett, a Baltimore millionaire in his own right, while the third secretary, Nelson O'Shaughnessy, is the son of a New York corporation lawyer said to be worth more millions still.

POST HOMERICA.

By Andrew Lang.

As one that for a weary space has lain
Lulled by the song of Circe and her wine
In gardens near the pale of Proserpine,
Where that Aegean isle forgets the main,
And only the low lutes of love complain,
And only shadows of wan lovers pine,
As such an one were glad to know the brine
Salt on his lips, and the large air again—
So gladly, from the songs of modern speech
Men turn, and see the stars, and feel the free
Shrill wind beyond the close of heavy flowers,
And through the music of the languid hours
They hear, like ocean on a western beach,
The surge and thunder of the Odyssey.

PISIDICE.

The incident is from the "Love Stories of Parthenius," who ed fragments from a lost epic on the expedition of Achilles
Lesbos, an island allied with Troy.]

The daughter of the Lesbian king
Within her bower she watched the war,
Far off she heard the arrows ring,
The smitten harness ring afar;
And, fighting from the foremost car,
Saw one that smote where all must flee;
More fair than the Immortals are
He seemed to fair Pisidice!

She saw, she loved him, and her heart
Before Achilles, Peleus' son,
Threw all its guarded gales apart,
A maiden fortress lightly won!
And, ere that day of fight was done,
No more of land or faith recked she,
But joyed in her new life begun—
Her life of love, Pisidice!

She took a gift into her hand,
As one that had a boon to crave;
She stole across the ruined land
Where lay the dead without a grave,
And to Achilles' hand she gave
Her gift, the secret postern's key,
"To-morrow let me be thy slave!"
Moaned to her love, Pisidice!

Ere dawn the Argive's clarion call
Rang down Methymna's burning street;
They slew the sleeping warriors all,
They drove the women to the fleet,
Save one, that to Achilles' feet
Clung, but in sudden wrath cried he:
"For her no doom but death is meet."
And there men slayed Pisidice.

In havens of that haunted coast,
Amid the myrtles of the shore,
The moon sees many a maiden ghost—
Love's outcast now and ever more.
The silence hears the shades deplore
Their hour of dear-bought love; but thee
The waves lull, 'neath thine olives hoar,
To dreamless rest, Pisidice!

HOMER.

Homer, thy song men likened to the sea,
With all the notes of music in its tone,
With tides that wash the dim dominion
Of Hades, and light waves that laugh in glee
Around the isles enchanted; nay, to me
Thy verse seems as the River of source unknown
That glasses Egypt's temples overthrown
In the sky-nurtured stream, eternally.

No wiser we than men of heretofore
To find thy sacred fountains guarded fast;
Enough, thy flood makes green our human shore.
As Nilus Egypt, rolling down his vast,
His fertile flood, that murmurs evermore
Of gods dethroned, and empires in the past.

HOMERIC UNITY.

The sacred keep of Iliou is rent
With trench and shaft; foiled waters wander slow
Through plains where Simois and Scamander went
To war with gods and heroes long ago.
Not yet to tired Cassandra, lying low
In rich Mycenae, do the Fates relent;
The bones of Agamemnon are a show,
And ruined is his royal monument.

The dust and awful treasures of the Dead
Hath Learning scattered wide, but vainly thee,
Homer, she mateth with her tool of lead,
And strives to rend thy songs; too blind to see
The crown that burns on thine immortal head
Of indivisible supremacy!

TWO SONNETS OF THE SIRENS.

Les Sirenes estoient tant intimes amies et fidelles-compagnes Proserpine, qu'elles estoient toujours ensemble. Esmues du euil de la perte de leur chere compagne, et enuyees au ir, elles s'arrestèrent a la mer Sicilienne, ou par leurs chantes elles attiroient les navigans, mais l'unique fin de la volupte de leur musique es la Mort," Pontus de Tyrad, 1570.]

I.

The Sirens once were maidens innocent
That through the water-meads with Proserpine
Plucked no fire-hearted flowers, but were content
Cool fritillaries and flag-flowers to twine,
With lilies woven and with wet woodbine;
Till forth to seek Aelnaen buds they went,
And their kind lady from their choir was rent
By Hades, down the irremeable decline.
And they have sought her all the wild world through,
Till many years, and wisdom, and much wrong,
Have filled and changed their song, and o'er the blue
Rings deadly sweet the magic of the song,
And whoso hears must listen till he die
Far on the flowery shores of Sicily.

II.

So is it with this singing art of ours,
That once with maids went, maidenlike, and played
With woven dances in the poplar shade,
And all her song was but of lady's bowers
And the returning swallows, and spring-flowers,
Till forth to seek a shadow-queen she strayed,
A shadowy land; and now hath overweighed
Her singing chaplet with the snow and showers.
And running rivers for the bitter brine
She left, and by the margin of life's sea
Sings, and her song is full of the sea's moan,
And wild with dread, and love of Proserpine;
And whoso once has listened to her, he
His whole life long is slave to her alone.

"A horse who has always been made to obey quickly will respond to commands from any one, whereas the creature who has been petted and talked to accords, unless hungry, scant attention to any one. We talk to horses altogether too much, and it is a silly and dangerous custom," declares F. M. Ware in "Outing Magazine." The animal's attention is kept if you are silent—he does not know what you will do next, and as he dis-trusts and merely tolerates you, even as he fears you, his anxiety is always to find out what you wish done, or what move you will next make.

The better Chinese are reported to have a strong feeling against the enormous extension of the growth of the poppy throughout the empire. A Pekin correspondent of the London Times indicates that China will ask India to consent to an annual reduction in the import of opium to China, which would have the effect of extinguishing the trade in ten years, and as an evidence of good faith will issue an Imperial edict condemning the use of opium and forbidding the employment in the Government service of any opium eater, and order an annual reduction in poppy cultivation leading to its extinction in ten years.

Congressman John Sharp Williams, the Democratic leader in the House, aspires to a seat in the Senate. He intended to open his campaign at Brookhaven, Mass., October 5, where it was expected that Governor Var-daman would speak from the same platform, as he had announced his candidacy for the Senatorship. The latter, however, sent word that he would make no speeches this year, and, accordingly, Mr. Williams confined his address to a general statement of Democratic principles, and will refrain from urging his candidacy at other appointments.

The annual report of Robert J. Tracewell, Comptroller of the Treasury, has been issued and the title-page reads "controller." When the President issued his simplified spelling rules the Comptrollers of the Currency and the Treasury pointed to the fact that the law provided for "comptrollers" not "controllers." Mr.
Tracewell often tells the story of how President Grant, desiring to have a comptroller change a decision, remarked that while he could not compel the comptroller to change his views, he could change comptrollers.

The multiplication of electric car lines and the rapid increase in the use of automobiles do not warrant the conclusion that horses are going out of use or growing scarcer. From an investigation by the Government it appears that the aggregate of horses in the United States, the first of the year, stood at 18,718,578, against 14,364,367 on the corresponding date of 1897.
The supply of mules has also been growing, for whereas there was record in 1897 of 2,215,654, there were 3,404,061 in 1906.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Should George H. Utter, of Rhode Island, be re-elected Governor next week it will be his third term. He is the Republican candidate.

The London magazine which was threatened with a libel suit by Richard Croker will print a retraction and apology. It had charged Mr. Croker with having used his office as chief of Tammany Hall for purposes of financial profit.

Governor Folk, of Missouri, traveled with William J.
Bryan on a recent campaign tour and spoke from the same platform, but he opposes Bryan's idea of Government ownership of the railroads. He proposes, instead, a Government supervision of the roads, similar to that exercised over the national banks.

Oscar S. Strauss, the announcement of whose pending appointment to the position of Secretary of Commerce and Labor has been made, will be the first citizen of the Hebrew faith to enter the cabinet. He was born in 1850, and is well known as a merchant, diplomat, and author. He represented the United States as minister to Turkey on two different occasions and was appointed by the President to fill the vacancy caused by the death of former President Harrison as a member of the permanent court of arbitration at The Hague.

An Associated Press dispatch of October 23 said that the following statement regarding prospective conditions in President Roosevelt's cabinet had been made public at the White House: "On the retirement of Secretary Shaw and Attorney-General Moody from the cabinet the following changes will be made: Secretary of the Treasury, George B. Cortelyou; Postmaster General, George Von L. Meyer; Attorney-General,
Charles J. Bonaparte; Secretary of the Navy, Victor
H. Metcalf; Secretary of Commerce and Labor, Oscar
S. Strauss."

The California State Bar Association has issued an address to the citizens of San Francisco recommending that Judges Coffey, Graham, Lawlor, and Hosmer be returned to the Superior bench by the electors of this city and county. The address concludes with these words: "The past services of these men entitle us to indorse them as absolutely honest judges, well qualified to perform the duties of their office. Without regard to political faith we recommend to the citizens of San Francisco, for the best interests of our city and our people, that Judges Coffey, Graham, Lawlor and Hosmer be retained at the coming election in their present positions as judges of our Superior Court."

The first public utterance by President Roosevelt touching on the campaign in New York State was conveyed to a mass meeting at Cooper Union, October 27, in the form of an indorsement of the gubernatorial candidacy of Charles E. Hughes. The message follows:
"Anyone who believes or who tries to convey the impression that I am not heart and soul for Mr. Hughes is either willfully or inadvertently laboring under a delusion. I am first, last, and all the time for Mr.
Hughes, because I know and feel that he stands precisely for the same principle that I stand for. I authorize you to make that statement to your friends and my friends on the East Side with all the emphasis that is in you."
The expression from the President was received with tremendous applause.

Illustrating Speaker Cannon's methods on the stump, the following is given from a report of his speech at Rum-ford Falls, Maine: Citizen—"Mr. Cannon, how is it that the trusts sell their goods cheaper in Europe than they do here?" Mr. Cannon—"What is your name?"
Citizen—"Never mind my name. That doesn't matter.
Answer my question." Mr. Cannon—"My name is Joe Cannon. What's yours?" Citizen—"I say again that doesn't matter. Answer my question." Mr. Cannon—"Do you work? Do you earn an honest living?" Citizen—"Yes,
I work for the paper company up here thirteen hours a day for 90 cents." Mr. Cannon—"Come out to Illinois and you can find a better job."

Senator Foraker of Ohio delivered an address at the reunion of the Society of the Army of the Cumberland at Chattanooga a few days ago which is claimed to have contained a veiled attack on President Roosevelt. The portion of his speech criticised is as follows:

It is important to protect Cubans in Cuba, but it is even more important to protect Americans in America. It is as important as the regulation of trusts and railroads and business corporations, on account of which we have been invoking the powers of the Federal Government and with respect to which powers the President has recently announced in public speech that they are hampered and hindered by decisions of the courts that he does not hesitate to say are, in his opinion, erroneous and which should be, therefore, I presume, in some manner reversed or avoided. If I understand what decisions are referred to I do not believe they were erroneous, and I do not like the veiled suggestion that they should be reversed, for I am less afraid of the greed of avarice than I am of the greed of power.

LINCOLN, THE LAWYER.

Importance of His Twenty-Three Years of Experience.

Lincoln's twenty-three years' experience as a lawyer has been dismissed by the biographers with a paragraph or a chapter; most of them use the great President's legal career as a peg on which to hang time-worn and usually apocryphal stories. But it was while traveling the circuits of the Eighth District of Illinois that Lincoln developed the wonderful latent powers that gave to the country an extraordinary legal mind to guide her in her great crisis. Frederick Trevor Hill has written an exhaustive summing-up of the War President's career at the bar in a readable and valuable volume, "Lincoln, the Lawyer." Lincoln's work as an attorney has been so little dwelt upon by other writers that one is surprised at the extent and activity of his legal experience. Mr. Hill says:

In his twenty-three years at the bar, Lincoln had no less than one hundred and seventy-two cases before the highest court of Illinois, a record unsurpassed by his contemporaries; he appeared before the United States circuit and district courts with great frequency; he was the most indefatigable attendant on the Eighth Circuit and tried more cases than any other member of that bar; he was attorney for the Illinois Central Railroad, the greatest corporation in the State, and one which doubtless had its choice of legal talent; he was also counsel for the Rock Island Railroad, and other corporations and individuals with important legal interests at stake; he was sought as legal arbitrator in the great corporation litigations of Illinois and he tried some of the most notable cases recorded in the courts of that State.

Many stories of doubtful authenticity are told of the youthful Lincoln's legal apprenticeship. We know, however, that he was a great reader, and that he borrowed every book he could lay his hands on. One of these volumes, a musty, dry-as-dust copy of the Revised Statutes of Indiana, was his first law-book. Popular tradition says he read it "with all the excitement and avidity with which an ordinary boy would read the romances of Dumas." Mr. Hill proves this statement to be absurd, for the book is "dull as only statute law can be dull, about as easily memorized as the dictionary and of no enduring authority." After Lincoln's return from the Black Hawk War, a dissolute fellow named Berry proposed a partnership in a grocery store. Lincoln grasped the opportunity as it would allow him some leisure for study:

Lincoln afterward remarked that the best stroke of business he ever did in the grocery line was when he bought an old barrel from an immigrant for fifty cents and discovered under some rubbish at the bottom a complete set of Blackstone's Commentaries. That was a red-letter day in his life, and we have his own word for it that he literally devoured the volumes. They must, indeed, have been refreshing after the dry Indiana statutes; and if Lincoln's choice of a profession must be attributed to a law-book, no more plausible selection than Blackstone's Commentaries could possibly be made.

Berry and Lincoln virtually lived on their stock of merchandise. Berry drinking and Lincoln eating it up, and matters soon reached a crisis which drove the junior partner into the fields again, where he undertook all sorts of rough farm labor, from splitting rails to plowing. As a man-of-all-work, however, Lincoln did not prove altogether satisfactory to his employers. He was too fond of mounting stumps in the field and "practicing polemics" on the other farm hands, and there was something uncomfortable about a plowman who read as he followed the team, no matter how straight his furrows ran. Such practices were irritating, if not presumptuous, and there is a well-known story about a farmer who found "the hired man" lying in a field beside the road, dressed in his not too immaculate farm clothes, with a book instead of a pitchfork in his hand.

"What are you reading?" inquired the old gentleman.

"I'm not reading; I'm studying," answered Lincoln, his wonderful eyes still on the pages of his book.

"Studying what?"

"Law, sir."

The old man stared at the speaker for a moment in utter amazement.

"Great—God—Almighty!" he muttered as he passed on, shaking his head.

Lincoln was admitted to the bar in March, 1836, and immediately was offered, and accepted, a partnership with Major Stuart of Springfield, Illinois. Mr. Hill gives this interesting account of professional life at that period:

Illinois was only just emerging from the condition of a frontier state in 1836, and all departments of the government were still very simply administered. The judges were, in some respects, still very superior to their brethren of Indiana, but they were not overburdened with learning, and although Governor Ford's "History of Early Illinois" records the names of half a dozen of attorneys of reputed ability and scholarship, it is doubtful if the rank and file of the primitive bar knew much more than laymen of equal intelligence.

Most of the court-houses were log built, as in Indiana, but in some districts the sessions were held in the bar rooms of taverns, and the absence of all formality in the proceedings is best illustrated by the fact that in the Circuit Court of Washington County, held by Judge John Reynolds, the sheriff usually heralded his honor by singing out: "Come in, boys! Our John is a-join' to hold court!" to which cordial invitation those having business with the law responded.

Another sheriff in Union County made a laudable effort to meet the requirements of the occasion by shouting this singular announcement:

"O, yes! O, yes! O, yes! The honorable judge is now opened!"

But the pioneer judges were prudent in civil as well as in criminal cases. They never instructed the jurors on the legal effect of testimony, and rarely told them what they could or could not find from the facts. Occasionally, however, some Solon, bolder than his fellows, would depart from this noncommittal practice, with results not always satisfactory. In one case a judge who desired to display his learning instructed the jury very fully, laying down the law with didactic authority; but the jurors, after deliberating some hours, were unable to agree. Finally the foreman rose and asked for additional instructions.

"Judge, this 'ere is the difficulty," he explained. "The jury want to know if that thar what you told us was r'ally the law, or on'y jist your notion."

The firm of Stuart & Lincoln soon built up an extensive practice. His skill at the rough-and-tumble debates at the general store, the village forum, won many admirers for the junior partner, but his ungainly appearance seems to have been a real disadvantage when he came in contact with strangers. Mr. Hill mentions the following incident:

Shortly after he became associated with Stuart, the latter sent him to try a case in McLean County for an Englishman named Baddeley, giving him a letter of introduction which advised the client that he could rely upon the bearer to try his case in the best possible manner.

Baddeley inspected his counsel's partner with amazement and chagrin. The young man was six feet four, awkward, ungainly, and apparently shy. He was dressed in ill-fitting homespun clothes, the trousers a little too short, and the coat a trifle too large. He had the appearance "of a rustic on his first visit to the circus," and as the client gazed on him, his astonishment turned to indignation and rage. What did Stuart mean by sending a bumpkin of that sort to represent him? It was preposterous, insulting, and not to be endured.

Without attempting to conceal his disgust, Baddeley unceremoniously dispensed with Lincoln's services and straightway retained James A. McDougall, later a United States Senator from California, to take charge of the case. History does not relate whether the irate Englishman won or lost the cause, but we know that he lived to become one of Lincoln's most ardent admirers.

This was not the last time Lincoln's personal appearance was to prejudice him in the practice of the law. Many years later, Stanton, then one of the leading lawyers in the country, was to snub "the long-armed creature from Illinois," who presumed to assist him in a celebrated case; and he also lived to revise his judgment and acknowledge the superiority of the man he flouted.

Joseph Jefferson describes Lincoln's defense, in 1839, of a company of strolling players. Mr. Hill quotes the following from Jefferson's Autobiography:

"Springfield being the capital of Illinois, it was determined to devote the entire season to the entertainment of the members of the Legislature. Having made money for several weeks previous to our arrival, the manager resolved to hire a lot and build a theatre. . . .

"In the midst of our rising fortunes a heavy blow fell upon us. A religious revival was in progress at the time, and the fathers of the church not only launched forth against us in their sermons, but by some political maneuver got the city to pass a new law enjoining a heavy license against our 'unholy' calling. I forget the amount, but it was large enough to be prohibitory. Here was a terrible condition of affairs. All our available funds invested, the Legislature in session, the town full of people, and we, by a heavy license, denied the privilege of opening the new theatre. . . .

"In the midst of these troubles a young lawyer called upon the manager. He had heard of the injustice and offered, if they would place the matter in his hands, to have the license taken off, declaring he only desired to see fair play, and would accept no fee, whether he failed or succeeded. The young lawyer began his harangue. He handled the subject with tact, skill, and humor, tracing the history of the drama from the time when Thespis acted in a cart to the stage of today. He illustrated his speech with a number of anecdotes, and kept the council in a roar of laughter; his good humor prevailed, and the exorbitant tax was taken off. . . .

"This young lawyer (continues Mr. Jefferson) was very popular in Springfield and was honored and beloved by all who knew him, and after the time of which I write, he held a rather important position in the Government of the United States. He now lies buried near Springfield, under a monument commemorating his greatness and his virtues—and his name was Abraham Lincoln."

The young practitioner early won a reputation for fairness; he had his own ideas of professional ethics, with an "old-fashioned lawyer's sense of morality." He always advised his clients to keep out of litigation, when possible. His advice to lawyers was:

"Discourage litigation. Persuade your neighbors to compromise whenever you can. Point out to them how the nominal winner is often the real loser—in fees, expenses, and waste of time. As a peacemaker the lawyer has a superior opportunity of becoming a good man. There will always be enough business. Never stir up litigation. A worse man can scarcely be found than one who does this. Who can be more nearly a fiend than he who habitually overhauls the register of deeds in search of defects in titles, whereon to stir up strife and put money in his pocket? A moral tone ought to be infused into the profession which would drive such men out of it."

It has been truly said that these words should be posted in every law office in the land, and it will be seen, when Lincoln's record is fully examined, that it was not a mere theorist who wrote them, but an active practitioner of wide experience who lived up to his own teaching.

That Lincoln's standing was high among his brother lawyers is evidenced by his second partnership, that with Stephen Logan, one of the leading attorneys of the country. Lincoln cared little for office routine, and as junior partner of Mr. Logan, and later as senior partner of the firm of Lincoln & Herndon, he spent most of his time "traveling the circuit." Of that picturesque feature of pioneer days, Mr. Hill writes:

In those days lawyers in active practice spent a great part of their time following the local judges, on horseback or afoot, from one town to another, journeying in small parties, and stopping at the same taverns, like a company of players on the road. Some of the leaders, like Judge Logan, had cases to try in the various villages and towns on the route, but others picked up business on the way, and, from all accounts the pickings must have sometimes been painfully lean, for Douglas's fees on one trip amounted to only five dollars, and his was an unusually magnetic personality. There was hardship and discomfort in this work, but even in those early days, when the roads were almost impassable and the hotel accommodations belied the name, the life had its peculiar charms, for the members of the bar were persons of no little distinction in the eyes of the country villagers, and the advent of the nomadic court was the red-letter day of the country calendars.

Riding and tramping the circuit month after month brought Lincoln into close touch with almost all the local members of his profession and he took high rank among them almost from the start. There is a story that he used to be sent ahead as a scout when the rivers were swollen, to test the fords with his long legs, and doubtless it is true; but there is another story that he once interrupted a too personal debate as to the proper length of a man's legs by remarking, "I should think they ought to be long enough to reach from your body to the ground," a quiet retort which is said to have put some of the debaters in the air.

It is easy to understand the fascination of the circuit life. The members of the bar formed a bright, congenial company who strove mightily with each other in the court rooms, but ate and drank as friends. They were persons of credit and renown in the eyes of all the assembled country-side, oracles to the political gossips, and leaders of public opinion whose words were often law. Every man knew every other man, and the close, daily contact in the court rooms and on the road created a spirit of comradeship which no mere professional interest could supply. There was little of dull routine in the life, less of cold formality, nothing of the anxieties and cares which characterize modern practice, and the "play-instinct" which few men ever entirely outgrow, was strongly in evidence at every term of court. One group of the merry company founded a mock tribunal which formulated all sorts of ridiculous charges against their fellow-practitioners and tried the offenders with burlesque pomp and severity, to the delight of all beholders. Others were good at song and story, and many of the evenings passed in the judge's private room were all-night sessions of mirth and good-fellowship which made for lasting friendship and an esprit de corps destined to have a marked effect on more than one career.

So valuable was this experience to Lincoln that the author believes it is possible that without it he would never have been called to his high station. Mr. Hill adds:

It was Judge Davis and a handful of men who had learned to know and appreciate Lincoln as a lawyer—a small group of his fellow-practitioners on the Eighth Circuit: Davis, the judge; Swett, the advocate; and Logan, the leader of the bar, but especially Davis—who forced Lincoln upon the Chicago Convent 1860, and thus gave him to the nation.

Lincoln was known as the best all-round lawyer of his day in Illinois. The effect of his method is illustrated in the following

A successful jury lawyer must needs be a thing of an actor at times, and during his prentice years Lincoln displayed no little trionic ability in his passionate appeals to juries. Indeed, his notes in the Wright show that he occasionally reverted to first principles even after he had reached the age of cretion. This case was brought on behalf of the widow of a Revolutionary War soldier whose pension had been cut in two rapacious agent, who appropriated half of sum collected for his alleged services. The aroused Lincoln's indignation, and his oration for summing up to the jury is as follows: "No contrast. Not professional ices. Unreasonable charge. Money ret by defendant—not given by plaintiff. Revolutionary War. Describe Valley Forge tions. Ice. Soldiers' bleeding feet. Plaintiff. Soldier leaving home for army. defendant. Close."

Mr. Herndon, who quotes this memorandum, testifies that the soldiers' bleeding feet and pathetic properties were handled very effectively, and that the defendant was skinned to entire satisfaction of the jury.

On one occasion when he was defending a case of assault and battery, it was proved the plaintiff had been the aggressor, but opposing counsel argued that the defendant had protected himself without inflicting injury on his assailant.

"That reminds me of the man who was tacked by the farmer's dog, which he killed a pitchfork," commented Lincoln.

"What made you kill my dog?" demanded the farmer.

"What made him try to bite me?" retorted the offender.

"But why didn't you go at him with the end of your pitchfork?" persisted the farmer.

"Well, why didn't he come at me with other end?" was the retort.

Lincoln not only made effective use of a with the jury, but frequently employed in arguing to the court, and he once completely refuted a contention that custom makes law, an anecdote drawn from his own experience. "Old Squire Bagley from Menard," he once came into my office and said: "Lincoln want your advice as a lawyer. Has a what's been elected a justice of the peace right to issue a marriage license?" I told him had not. "Lincoln, I thought you was a lawyer he retorted. 'Bob Thomas and me had a on this thing, and we agreed to let you do it; but if that is your opinion, I don't want for I know a thunderin' sight better, been Squire now eight years, and I've do all the time!'"

Lincoln's national reputation dates from early 27, 1860, when he delivered the memorable address at Cooper Union, New York, on the slavery issues. This speech, as Mr. points out, could have been made only by a fully equipped lawyer, and his triumph was direct result of three and twenty years of ice in the courts. The men who made his at Chicago for the presidential nomination, lawyers who learned his worth on the Eighth Circuit of Illinois. His last visit to his office to attend to some business on the day his departure for Washington is told in a characteristic episode:

"After all these things were disposed relates Mr. Herndon, 'he crossed to the posite side of the room and threw himself on the old office sofa, which, after many of service, had been moved against the for support. He lay there for some moments his face toward the ceiling, without either speaking. . . . He then recalled some cidents of his early practice and took pleasure in delineating the ludicrous features many a law suit on the circuit. . . . The gathered up a bundle of books and papers wished to take with him, and started to go before leaving he made the strange request the sign-board which swung on its rusty h at the foot of the stairway should remain. it hang there undisturbed,' he said, with significant lowering of his voice. 'Give clients to understand that the election of President makes no difference in the . . . If I live, I'm coming back some and then we'll go right on practicing law nothing had ever happened.' . . . lingered for a moment as if to take a last at the old quarters, and then passed into narrow hallway."

Mr. Hill's book is a great contribution to the literature of Lincoln. The illustrations in a new portrait of Lincoln, and reproduction of historical documents and interesting manuscripts.

It suggests the probability that brain work is conducive to longevity.

The news that Mrs. Phoebe Hearst will settle in Paris for the next two years has been somewhat of a surprise to her friends there. She has tied herself with the marriage of her young daughter, Miss Antonia Cistue, whose wedding to M. Dacquin, the correspondent of the Hearst papers, has just taken place. The bride is a daughter of a Spanish friend of Mrs. Hearst, the Infanta Eulalia, who was at the wedding breakfast.

Mr. Thomas Lipton, replying to a female interviewer who questioned him on the subject of his matrimonial intentions, replied that he would not be married long ago if he had only been a woman. This recalls the reply made by Sir Richard Burton, the famous oriental traveler, to a jealous mother who asked him what his intentions were concerning her daughter. "Ah, my dear lady," said Sir Richard, "in a country like Great Britain where a man is allowed but one wife at a time he can not be too careful."

According to report, the most heavily dowered among American girls who have married abroad was the Duchess of Roxburgh—born

Miss Goelet—with a fortune of $40,000,000. Others in the list are: The Duchess of Marlborough, $10,000,000; Lady Curzon, $5,000,000; the Countess Castellane, $15,000,000; Mrs. Vivian, $12,000,000; Lady William Beresford, $3,000,000; the Countess von Larrisch, $4,000,000. It is estimated in London that over $200,000,000 of American money has gone to titled foreigners through their marriage with rich Americans.

The serious illness of Joseph Chamberlain has been made more of by American correspondents than by the English papers. Mr. Chamberlain's secretary writes that he "is improving steadily, but his medical adviser imperatively orders a complete rest for several months." The attempt to conceal the true character of Mr. Chamberlain's illness from the British public is inexplicable, remarks the New York World. It will be almost a miracle if he is ever seen in public again. Gambling on his chance for life is going on at Lloyd's, where ten guineas per cent. must be paid to insure him for six months, fifteen guineas for a year.

Mrs. Patton Fleming, a native of Dundee, who has just been elected a member of the Royal Astronomical Society, is not the only British woman who has succeeded in comprehending the mysteries of the heavens. Miss Henrietta Leavitt discovered twenty-five new variable stars some years ago. Lady Huggins diligently helps her husband, Sir William Huggins, in his astronomical observations. In their house in South London they possess a very finely equipped observatory, which contains the enormous telescope presented by the Royal Society to Sir William in recognition of the work accomplished by Lady Huggins and himself in astrophysics.

Miss Harriet Freebey, of Los Angeles, will soon begin the practice of law in Washington, D. C., where she is now serving as librarian of the department of arts and sciences in the George Washington University. Miss Freebey's career has already been notable. She studied in the University of Chicago, and to secure funds to meet her expenses, acted as principal of the Lincoln public school at Chicago Heights. Afterward, she taught in a normal school in Manila, Philippine Islands. During the year that she remained, Miss Freebey studied Spanish procedure in Manila, under Calderon. She won her LL. B. from the law department of the University of Michigan, and later obtained the degree of LL. M. from the George Washington University.

Unlike some Latin-American ex-presidents, Mr. Palma will not proceed from Havana to Paris and live like a millionaire. Mr. Palma began to be a Cuban president over 30 years ago, during the 10-years' insurrection against Spain, when he was made the head of the revolutionary government, which never really governed. After his capture and imprisonment in a Spanish dungeon in the Pyrenees, he always described himself to his jailers as "president of the Cuban republic." Spain banished him from Cuba when peace was restored, and it was during the ensuing 20 years that he conducted a private school in a small interior town of New York State. Our government considered him the ablest and safest man available for the Cuban presidency in 1902, but he had lived so many years away from the island and its people that he had lost touch with the new generation. Mr. Palma is now 71 years old.

Georges Clemenceau, who is spoken of as the Warwick of French politics, as minister of the interior is demonstrating his capacity as a constructive statesman and a rigid disciplinarian. He is rather below than above the middle height, with a squarely built, strong but elastic figure, a fine head and capacious forehead, with coal-black eyes of almost dazzling brilliancy, and close-cropped hair. Clemenceau's right-hand man at the ministry of the interior is Albert Sarraut, the under secretary, and when, a while ago, Sarraut fought a duel with Pugliesi-Conti, the liberal deputy, his famous chief acted as his second. When he was only 19 he was thrown into prison for shouting "Vive la republique!" at a medical students' meeting. He was kept three months in jail for this, and the experience left an indelible impression on his powerful and rebellious character. As soon as he was released he started for the United States. Here he spent four years, and was married, but his American wife is now divorced from him. His attitude on the religious question will be of prime concern. He has pretty well established his record on Socialism.

VANITY FAIR.

The progress of the Lord Mayor of London through the streets of Paris is an international incident more picturesque than the visits of kings. Just what the Parisians imagine is the real rank of the worthy merchant who happens to be the present representative of his fellow traders is a question to be guessed only by those who are familiar with the average Frenchman's vague notions of all other nations.

In all likelihood they look upon him as a noble of lineage as ancient as that of any duke in the peerage, remarks the New York Evening Mail. He is "milord," and that is the one English title, as "prince" is for all Russians. Ruler of London means that he governs all the millions of that mighty capital. They know nothing of the survival of the ancient City within the city. The "Lormaire" is surely a sort of co-ruler with the king. The "entente" is popular. So the good-humored Parisians cheer the visitors in much the same spirit as they welcomed America in the person of Buffalo Bill.

Reverence for gilt coaches decked with "naughty, naked cupids"; for fat men in scarlet robes; for ribboned horses and attendant flunkies was lost by the Parisians some 114 years ago. They still love dearly any pageant. But they are not fools in their frolics, and it is not surprising to learn that the bewigged and corpulent coachman was promptly christened Louis Seize and received an ovation equal to that of his master.

Two national traits stand out in striking fashion. The Lord Mayor in his mediæval finery; head of a city that is less fact than tradition; followed by his gorgeous train of aldermen and councilors, a corporation corpulent and ablaze with every tint of tinsel, is a sign of Britain's conservatism clinging stubbornly to all that is British, even when it is useless and an anachronistic absurdity. Their hosts, municipal councilors of Paris, entitled by law to wear uniforms little less gay than the apparel of their guests, explain their presence in black coats by saying simply that they had never thought to have their uniforms made. France has its faults, but it is still strong in the simplicity, economy, and common sense of its citizens.

"El Camino Real" does not mean "The King's Highway," but the true road, says the Los Angeles Herald, and the Oakland Tribune makes rejoinder in forthright terms: "Whatever the term may mean, there never was any 'Camino Real' in California. There were roads of a kind, to be sure, connecting the missions and settlements up and down the coast, but the tale of a great highway traversing California from south to north is a pure fiction. It was not the work of Spanish hands, but of the Gringo imagination.

"A vast deal of sentimental rubbish has been written and spoken about this mythical grand road, and it is about time the bubble of nonsense were pricked. Every public road of whatever kind or character was denominated the King's Highway, just as all public highways are now called county roads, and any public road in Spain is today termed 'El Camino Real.'

"But there never was a decent road in California till the Americans came, and no great continuous thoroughfare stretching from one end of the State to the other. There was no need of one, for the ordinary means of conveyance for travelers and freight were the saddle-horse and the pack-mule. The Spanish have never been noted as road builders, save in a few instances, and the poetic fiction of their building a great highway hundreds of miles in length where there were few people to travel it, save Indians and vaqueros, and hardly any vehicles, is about the rankest moonshine that was ever palmed off on a gullible public.

"What has become of this road, if it was ever built? Works of that kind can not wholly disappear for centuries, and here we have one reputed to have vanished utterly within the lifetime of living men. Old Spanish documents refer in places to 'El Camino Real,' but such references are merely to whatever passed for a public road at any point, all roads being legally denominated the King's Highway."

"Early American settlers, accustomed to use the descriptive terms employed by the native Californians of Spanish extraction, called a public road 'El Camino Real.' Out of the fact that there were a few stretches of primitive road in California during the days of Spanish sovereignty called by custom 'El Camino Real,' a lot of shallow-pated humbugs have manufactured a great military road from Sonoma to San Diego. It is about the rawest fiction that was ever imposed upon a credulous public," continues the Oakland critic. "A fool architecture has been evolved out of the simple fact that the Spanish friars built their missions in a form to which the constructive material—adobe—was best adapted, and the varied uses—sanctuary, fort, corral, and habitation—for which they were designed. A halo of mock romance has been created to envelop these kindly, hardworking, unromantic, unselfish missionaries and the lazy, dirty aborigines they strove so hard to Christianize and civilize. Lastly, to cap the climax, as the public has swallowed every other sort of fable and nonsense relating to the early Spanish occupation, there has been invented this Munchausen 'El Camino Real,' along which marched mythical cohorts of Spanish soldiers and over which came rich old dons with their ravishing daughters and sour duennas, in coaches with liveried outriders, guarded by retainers. It is all a fantastic echo of Washington Irving's 'Spain.'"

"The whole romantic business of the early days is rank with bathos and cheap humbug," concludes the Tribune. "The early Spaniards were pioneers, and they lived under exceedingly primitive conditions. Their wealth was mainly in horses and cattle of wild, inferior breeds, the latter being chiefly valuable for their hides and tallow. They owned vast areas of land, but what is land worth that is only valuable for grazing mustang horses and wild cattle? There was hardly any money in the country, and few of the comforts of life as we understand them. The amusements were restricted to mescal, the fandango, the tinkle of the guitar, horse racing, and gambling. There was little furniture, and no ornamentation in the adobe houses. A bath robe would have been regarded as a swell ball dress by a majority of the women. The diet was as limited and simple as the wardrobes of the women and men. There was not at any one time a regiment of Spanish soldiers in all California. A fake taste for antiquarian research has given us a phantom society and a phantom military state, and for the accommodation of the two has constructed a phantom highway."

No sooner had Dana Gibson turned his back on Paris than European newspapers commenced to cast doubts on the hitherto unquestioned beauty of the "Gibson Girl." One scribe actually likened the figure and carriage of the "Gibson Girl" to what he scornfully terms "an emaciated kangaroo."

After all the popularity that the "Gibson Girl" has enjoyed this denunciation comes as a shock.

Eustace Miles, the exponent of physical culture, said in an interview in Paris: "I think the 'Gibson Girl' not only untypical of the American female, but also far from the ideal of womanhood.

"In the first place, she has an unpleasant expression, as if she were far superior to the people around her. Such an expression may not be intentionally haughty; it may be the result of dyspepsia. The American woman is not—and does not look—haughty. So far as externals are concerned, she is pleasant and facile.

"In the second place, she has an exaggerated and almost grotesque carriage. Although it is a common fault of women to obtrude the elbows and abdomen forward, and not to hollow the back sufficiently, the 'Gibson Girl' goes to the other extreme. She appears unnatural.

"The average American girl of the age of the 'Gibson Girl' is I think, not only more agreeable in expression, but also less exaggeratedly stately in pose. She has larger hips and larger ankles."

At the doorways of the New York garages, not only children, but grown men and women gape and stare as the chauffeurs come and go in the shining, big, new motors. For the masses, there is the same swagger and pride, the rakish bearing and affected hauteur in the present-day chauffeur that won admiration for the old-time jockey, the soldier on leave, and the animal tamer in the circus cages—only this chauffeur is a brand-new product. He is the idol of the sporting classes, the terror of pedestrians, invaluable to his employer, and at the same time the problem of his master's household. More often than not there is no "master."

The chauffeur is greater than the cook, says the New York Evening Post. He is boss of his boss, boss of the household, and frequently a disturber of the domestic peace. So far as he is concerned, he is not "hired help," and has no rating with servants. He is a mechanic, if you please, and good enough to hohob with his employer and the latter's friends. No livery togs for him, if he can help it. No matter if he is driving the "missus" out to five o'clock tea, to a reception, or for a round of calls, he is just as likely to appear in tattered blouse, leather breeches, and puttees as he is to get into his "Sunday best." Broadway, in the gasoline belt, is the place to see the driver in his element. He is king of the pavement, and as he passes by, the small boy, the clerk, the scrub woman, and delivery lad will turn and stare. "There goes Castorhill's chauffeur," they say, or "That is Huggenheimer's man. He gets all kinds of money, he does. Ain't he swell?"

If you stand by a garage entrance and watch these drivers switch their cars out or in, there is no better place to get a line on them. They take the turn from doorway to pavement at a smart clip, one hand on the steering gear and the other carelessly lying free. No one appreciates the lime-light more than they. The power in their cars gives a confidence and boldness that they otherwise might not possess. This is most noticeable in a jam of carriages in the shopping district or on the Avenue, where the chauffeurs have the heretofore obstreperous "cabbies" cowed into meekness and submission.

A new solution of the theatre-hat problem has been devised during the last season by the proprietor of the casino at one of the Mediterranean watering places, according to the Journal des Debats. He made no attempt to compel women to remove their hats. Hatted or hatless they were allowed to enter the auditorium without question.

The rule was rigidly enforced, however, that all women wearing hats should take seats on the left-hand side of the house, while those who were bareheaded were placed on the right. Naturally, all men unaccompanied by women joined the hatless crowd on the right, so that the left-hand half of the audience was practically a solid mass of hats.

The women who were seated there found it absolutely impossible to see the stage. The gaps which the hatless usually furnished in the barrier of finery were lacking and when they tried to peep between the hats immediately in front of them those still farther forward blocked their vision.

After a few object lessons of this sort the left side of the house became practically empty every night, and the rule fell into disuse for lack of occasion.

A half-moon of eighteen boxes, which form the grand tier of the new Manhattan Opera House, on Thirty-fourth street, near Fifth Avenue, furnishes the secret for the necessity for such an institution, even though opera apparently has been adequately housed in the Metropolitan, says the New York American.

Not all of the eighteen boxes have been sold, but enough have become the property for a long period of wealthy New Yorkers to prove that the Metropolitan, and particularly its famous horseshoe, in reality have become too small for the city's enlarged musical and social demands.

When many persons found they could not get grand tier boxes at the Metropolitan one man saw his chance, and the Manhattan was built.

Among the holders of grand tier boxes in the Manhattan are Charles M. Schwab, E. J. Thomas, Joseph Pulitzer, Frederick G. Bourne, J. R. De Lamar, F. W. Woolworth, E. C. Coerver, James Gayley, W. E. Corey, and Mrs. S. Levy.

Three boxes have not been sold, and while applications are in for the remaining five they have not been assigned. Mr. Hammerstein, owner of the new opera house, has made his list of grand tier box holders a matter of great secrecy, but the names given show how far it completed.

New York history repeats itself in the erection of the Manhattan Opera House. In 1883, when the demand for boxes in the Academy of Music at Irving Place and Fourteenth Street, had greatly outgrown the capacity of the house, the Metropolitan Opera House was opened. From 1883 until the opening of the Metropolitan, the Academy had been the home of grand opera in New York. Boxes purchased years before the demand for a new opera house made itself felt became family property and were passed down from father to son. Five years after the Metropolitan was opened the old Academy found itself out of the race entirely and entered the dramatic field.

Among the men who formed the corporation that rebuilt the interior of the Metropolitan after it was destroyed by fire in 1892, and most of whom are yet box holders, were George G. Haven, Adrian Iselin, Elbridge T. Gerry, Edwin Cooper, J. Pierpont Morgan, S. D. Babcock, S. P. Wetmore, Perry Belmont, D. O. Mills, Henry Clews, John Jacob Astor, and Cornelius Frederick, and W. K. Vanderbilt.

Mr. Hammerstein originally announced the opening of the Manhattan for November 19, but when it was seen that the big building could not be completed by that time the date was postponed until December 3. He spent the greater part of the summer on the continent, signing the artists with whom he hopes to rival the performances in the Broadway house.

Midwinter will find a dual opera season in full swing in New York.

STAGE GOSSIP.

Dramatic Notes

Henry Woodruff, who is known for his act in the "Brown of Harvard" play, and with N. Goodwin in "When We Were Twenty-or" has been forced to leave the stage on account of throat trouble.

Mr. Sothorn and Miss Marlowe deferred the production of their play, "John the Baptist," which was announced to open the third week of their engagement at Philadelphia, October 25, as a courtesy toward Henry B. Irving, Jr., who made his debut in that city Monday evening.

Eda Rehan, whose return to the stage has been expected, has decided not to act this season. She is now at her cottage near Drigg, in Cumberland, on the shore of the Irish sea. Miss Rehan intends to remain in England for some time.

"The Hypocrites," Henry Arthur Jones's latest success, is beginning its third month at Hudson Theatre in New York.

President Roosevelt has under consideration an invitation from George H. Brennan and John Sinclair to attend the first performance of "The Jungle," a dramatization of Mr. Sinclair's novel of the same title, at Trenton, N. J., November 5.

William Gillette is appearing in his latest play, "Clarice," at the Garrick Theatre in New York, and it is said the piece is a weak bit of mentalism. Marie Doro, in the title-role, is noted for newly developed emotional strength.

Raymond Hitchcock, now playing the title-role in Richard Harding Davis's farce, "The Operer," is one of the few successful comedians who has never yearned for an opportunity to play "Hamlet" or "Richard III." "It is not that I thought I could do something else better than what my friends tell me I am fitted for," says the actor, "but the truth is, musical comedy reached a point where either myself or the actor in the white duck suit had to go. Not that I was at all jealous of the long pale man who sings 'My heart is bursting for love of you—oo-oo-oo,' but I objected to being compelled to sit on a green bench beneath an artificial tree eight times a week and hold hands with the musical comedy aunt of the baby-faced man trying to marry, while that confounded operer is interrupting the action of the piece."

Samuel Clemens produced his play, "Samuel Clemens," at the Garden Theatre in New York City a few days ago, and won some praise from the critics, but all say the piece is too long and unconvincing in its emotional passages. The comedy scenes are said to be more taking.

Thomas Q. Seabrooke and Pauline Hall, backed by a company of five, are appearing in New Orleans in a one-act playlet entitled "The Eight Favorites."

A gambol of the Lambs Club a night or two ago, Edwin Stevens entertained the members with a monologue in the shape of a joint debate between Mr. Hughes and Mr. Hearst. It made the leading vaudeville managers want to hear Mr. Stevens in it.

Nearly every theatre in London the officials of the house applaud at the end of each act, when the "star" makes his or her appearance. But it is only in a couple of big variety theatres in the West End that a paid claquer employed to applaud all the year round. The manager of a London theatre said to a Daily Mail representative recently: "My people do their duty here better than it is done in Paris. There they see the claquer at work; here you would suspect its existence. My men watch the performance apparently with the keenest interest, and what they do seems genuine."

George V. Hobart, who has won fame with the "Dinkelspiel" stories, went from New York to Baltimore to witness the first production of his new play, "Mrs. Wilson—That's All," in which Miss May Irwin appeared at the Academy of Music.

Edmund Stoker is not the only one to appear in an effort to revive the popularity of the lecture in England. He will give reminiscences of Sir Francis Burnand, long the editor of Punch, will speak on famous contributors to the humorous weekly; Walter Emanuel will do the same, in another lecture, his work on the same paper; E. T. Reed, still another Punch writer, will give an illustrated talk on humorous pictures; Spencer Leigh Hughes, a newspaper reporter, will lecture on oddities of Parliament; Professor Hubert von Herkomer, R. A., will lecture on art; Mme. Sarah Grand will also appear and renew her triumphs of former years.

William H. Crane and Ellis Jeffreys are continuing in a revival of "She Stoops to Conquer." George Giddens will play Tony Lumpkin and Mrs. Fanny Addison Pitt will play

Mrs. Hardcastle. Margaret Dale will take the role of Constance Neville, and Walter Hale that of young Marlow.

The effectiveness or propriety of apparitions upon the stage has long been a matter for critical discussion. The subject again arises in Percy Mackaye's generally admirable "Jeanne d'Arc," which the Sothorn-Marlowe alliance gave for the first time at the Lyric Theatre in Philadelphia two weeks ago. The marvelous and supremely beautiful story of Joan of Arc can not be presented without reference to her celestial visitations, and these visitations can not be treated like Macbeth's "false creation." They must be actually shown upon the stage or the entire tale loses point and purpose. The spirit of Mackaye's play as given at the Lyric is wholly and deliberately medieval. The spectator views it strictly from the standpoint of the Maid; the visions all are concretely represented; the abiding faith of the Deliverer of France triumphantly confirmed, and the beauty of the drama thereby increased manifold. Some complaint has, indeed, been registered of a superfluity of angels in "Jeanne d'Arc." Inadmissible as regards the central figure, the objection may have some force as applied to other characters in the play. It has been very plainly Mr. Mackaye's intention to tell his story from Joan's point of view—Joan believed and the angels were real to her. Therefore, let them be seen by the audience. But does it not lessen the effect to vouchsafe such privileges to both the Dauphin and the Duc d'Alencon? Mr. Mackaye may argue that the spirit of the naive Middle Ages in which his play is undoubtedly conceived admits of such license.

Musical Notes.

Yvette Guilbert and Albert Chevalier are drawing well on their tour of one-night appearances, but succeeding notices are not so generally laudatory as those printed in advance.

A young San Francisco musician is being heralded in this style by an energetic press agent: "Pietro Marino, the youthful violinist who attracted the attention of American musicians when he came to this country as leader of Mascagni's orchestra, has been signed by Henry W. Savage as concert master for the Madam Butterfly orchestra. Although only twenty-four years old, Marino is spoken of abroad as the coming violin virtuoso of Europe. He is a pupil of Ysaye, and when eighteen years old won the Royal Conservatory first prize at Berlin. During the past two years he has been concertmaster at the La Scala Opera House, Milan. In addition to his other duties he will be first violinist in the Butterfly orchestra, which is to consist of sixty-five musicians. Signor Marino will arrive from Europe next week with Conductors Walter Rothwell and Alfred Feith from the Royal Opera in Berlin." Young Marino played the violin for a turn at the Orpheum a year or two ago, and has been heard in other resorts of San Francisco.

A Vienna lawyer has recently attempted to prove that Wagner's earlier works, from "Rienzi" to "Lohengrin," are under a previously existing copyright law and have consequently been free for performance without royalties for a long time. While he has not been able to prove this conclusively, the National Theatre at Prague has nevertheless made use of this legal loophole to incorporate "Der Fliegende Holländer" in its repertoire.

The orchestra, chorus, and technical personnel of the Budapest Court Theatre are threatening a strike, unless higher salaries are promised for January 1. A deputation from the company called upon Director Mahler and stated that unless a concession were granted them the entire force would refuse to appear. As the question is one that must be controlled by a budget from the Parliament, which does not convene until June 1, the opera will in all probability be closed. The strike is so consolidated that even those members of the orchestra who are eligible for the pension list for twenty-five years of service have cast in their interests with the others. The management hopes either to secure a special appropriation from the Parliament, or to get together a new ensemble, which would be ready for public performances in six weeks.

A series of lectures on "Great Books" by Professor Charles Mills Gayley, of the University of California, is announced by Miss Sarah D. Hamlin. The lectures will be given on Tuesday afternoons at 2230 Pacific street. The schedule will be as follows, after the opening lecture, which was Tuesday afternoon of this week: November 6, Ibsen, "Rosmersholm" and "The Doll's House"; November 13, Goethe's "Faust"; November 20, Maeterlinck in general and "Les Aveugles"; November 27, Maeterlinck, "Pelleas and Melisande" and "Aglavaine and Selysette."

Popular Matinee Concerts in Oakland.

The first of the series of Wednesday matinee concerts to be given at Ye Liberty Theatre, Oakland, during the winter under the management of Will L. Greenbaum, will be given Wednesday afternoon, November 7, at three o'clock, the attraction being that well-known but rarely-heard piano virtuoso, Hugo Mansfeldt. Mr. Mansfeldt was a favorite pupil of the great Liszt and belonged to that famous class in which Rosenthal, Sauer, Reisenauer, and other celebrities studied.

The program to be offered is as follows:
Mozart—Sonata, A major; Beethoven—Sonata, C sharp minor (Moonlight Sonata); Schubert—Minuet, B minor; Schumann—Romance, F sharp; Aufschwung; Warum?; Scherzo, F minor; Nocturne, F major; Weber—Perpetual Motion; Chopin—Berceuse; Nocturne, F sharp; Funeral March; Waltz, A flat; Elkus—Song Without Words; Liszt—La Campanella (the little bell); Wagner-Liszt—Romanza (Tannhauser); Mendelssohn-Liszt—Wedding March and Fairy Dance (Midsummer Night's Dream).

The prices for seats at these "Pop." concerts are $1.75 cents, and 50 cents, which includes reservation. General admission will be 50 cents.

The second of the series will be given the Wednesday following, and this will be a grand orchestral concert by an organization of selected musicians under the direction of Mr. Paul Steindorff.

The Orpheum.

Vasco, known all over the world as "The Mad Musician," will make his first appearance in America at the Orpheum Sunday afternoon. He comes from London, via Australia, and, during the course of his act, plays on twenty-seven musical instruments. Mlle. Alexandra and Mons. Bertie, novel and refined French aerialists, will give a graceful but perilous act, entitled "After the Ball." The Wilson brothers, German fun manufacturers, promise fifteen minutes of hilarity. Frances D'Arcy, a soprano of renown, will be heard, but her engagement is limited to one week. The members of the Empire City Quartette promise a complete change of entertainment. Augusta Glose will vary her musical monologue; Max Millian, the talented young violinist, will be heard in new selections, and Collins and Hart, the amusing "strong men," and Orpheum motion pictures will complete a program that should prove popular. Election returns will be announced from the stage Tuesday evening. On the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located, amusement devices of every conceivable kind are to be found.

Signor Donatelli and his Italian band of fifty artists will give a grand concert this afternoon and evening at Grauman's, the new pavilion, corner Page and Fillmore streets. There is every indication that this new amusement enterprise will very soon be popular with the public. There is no skating during the concert hours.

LITERARY NOTES.

Travels and Researches in Persia.

"Persia, Past and Present," by A. V. Williams Jackson, professor of Indo-Iranian languages in Columbia University, is the result of years of preparation, an enthusiasm for his subject, and three years of travel and research among the antiquarian remains of the land of Zoroaster and Hafiz. Professor Jackson has consulted his fellow-laborers in the field, from Herodotus to Curzon. Historically Persia is, of course, one of the great nations of antiquity, one, moreover, that alone preserved its independence and individuality from Grecian and Roman dominancy. Rawlinson, the English explorer, has made us familiar with the great archaeological wealth of the arid desert stretches; Persian literature has fascinated and influenced Occidental writers from Shakespeare to Tom Moore and Fitzgerald; and in its religions, the picturesque Empire is most interesting. It was Professor Jackson's interest in Zoroaster and the ancient faith of the Magi that led him to traverse the territory the Prophet himself made celebrated.

The book contains a mass of important data about the little-known cities of Persia, their people and customs. The author labored hard to obtain accurate information, and the book throws light on a number of historical points which were not previously clear. Among his achievements was the scaling of the precipitous rock of Behistan to confirm the copies of inscriptions made many years ago by Rawlinson, whose accuracy had been challenged.

The book is illustrated from a collection of photographs made by the author on his journey. Published by The Macmillan Company, New York; $4.00 net.

Miriam Michelson's New Story.

One can not successfully compare Miriam Michelson's new story, "Anthony Overman," with her first novel, "In the Bishop's Carriage," so unlike are the tales in theme and in method of treatment. Miss Michelson has written a clever story in "Anthony Overman."

The title character is a dreamer, an altruist, a reformer, a crank, if you will. Jessie Incell, a rather disagreeable heroine, is a newspaper woman, "who walked into people's holy of holies or most grisly skeletoned closet with clicking heels." Jessie is sent by her editor to visit a strange colony of "Renunciants" in the high Sierras, where recent happenings promised a good "story." Her interest in Overman, one of the leaders of the cult, grows into love. The altruist follows her to San Francisco and becomes editor of a labor journal during one of our perennial strikes. Newspaper work has left the reporter with few ideals, and the contrast between her own sophisticated character and Overman's primitive faith attracts her to him. The destinies of both are worked out logically and the story ends sanely and happily.

The novel is illustrated by some pleasing drawings in color by John Cecil Clay.

Published by Doubleday, Page & Co., New York; $1.50.

Life in Social London.

There is nothing that appeals more to the average feminine novel-reader than a story of a neglected wife who, too early faded, rejuvenates herself, turns the tables on a rival, wins admiration and love, and finally, with the magnet of social success, attracts to herself again the chilled regards of a husband whose indifference has emancipated her from the slavery of an absorbing love. Such a story has Netta Syrett told in "The Day's Journey," a bright, clever, entertaining novel of life in social London.

There are plenty of sharply silhouetted characters, and an ingredient of crisp satire, which, softened by a strong romantic interest, and by an agreeable atmosphere of upper classdom, renders "The Day's Journey" a highly acceptable accompaniment to a few hours of leisure.

Published by A. C. McClurg & Co.

New Publications.

"To every little girl who has wished for an hour to be a little boy," is dedicated Beulah Marie Dix's "Merrylips," an historical novel for young folks. "Merrylips" is an exciting story of the times when King Charles and the Roundheads went to war. The Macmillan Company, New York; $1.50.

There are a dozen readable essays in "Friends on the Shelf," by Bradford Torrey. The life and works of Hazlitt, FitzGerald, Thoreau, Stevenson, and Anatole France are sketched interestingly in the volume. Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; $1.25 net.

A new edition of George W. Cable's famous tales of old New Orleans, "Old Creole Days," is beautifully illustrated and attractively made up. There are eight full-page pictures, and head and tail pieces in photogravure by Albert Herter. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $2.50.

The Mystic Maid of Domremy is the central figure in a five-act drama, "Jeanne D'Arc," by Percy Mackaye. Mr. Mackaye has given us a more human Jeanne than the traditional warrior girl. The Macmillan Company, New York; $1.25.

Turn your steps where you will in Paris, and you will scarcely ever be out of sight of some historic house whose walls have sheltered soldiers, statesmen, preachers, teachers, workers in art and letters, illustrious men of all sorts and conditions. If every other guide to historic Paris were destroyed, "The Stones of Paris," by Benjamin Ellis Martin and Charlotte M. Martin, would be all sufficient. A new and attractive illustrated edition of this book has just been republished. Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $2.00.

Sill's Poems.

Editor Argonaut:—In the Household Edition of the "Poetical Works of Edward Rowland Sill," edited by Mr. William Belmont Parker, and just published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., occurs the following poem:

HER FACE.

I stood in sombre dreaming
Before her image dear,
And saw, in secret wonder,
Living my darling appear.

About her mouth a smile came,
So wonderful and wise,
And tears of some still sorrow
Seemed shining in her eyes.

My tears, they too were flowing,
Her face I could not see,
And oh! I can not believe it,
That my love is lost to me.

I have before me an old volume of "Eighty-two Songs with Pianoforte Accompaniment, by Franz Schubert," edited by E. Paner, printed by Breitkopf & Hartel, in Leipzig and published by Sugener & Co., London; year not stated. In this book appears the following:

IHR BILD.

Ich stand in dunklen Traumen
Und startt ihr Bildniß an,
Und das geliebte Antlitz
Heimlich zu leben begann.

Um ihre Lippen zog sich
Ein Lacheln wunderbar
Und wie von Wehmuths thränen Erglantzte ihr Augenpaar.

Auch meine Thränen flossen
Mir von den Wangen herab—
Und ach, ich kann es nicht glauben,
Dass ich dich verloren hab?

And accompanying and preceding the German text is the following translation:

HER PORTRAIT.

Before her charming portrait
I stood in waking dream,
And those beloved features
Seem'd with life's movements to beam.

Around her lips grew slowly
A smile of wondrous grace,
And as of mournful weeping
Her eyes show'd the glis'ning trace.

And my tears, too, are flowing
Adown these cheeks pale and wan,
Alas! I can not believe yet
That thou my darling art gone.

Is not this song by Heine? And is it exactly fair to an author of Sill's originality and genius, or to any author, or to the public, to publish his translations, however beautiful, of others' work, with no note to indicate the origin?

But perhaps I am wrong. Is Sill's the original? I have now no convenient access to Heine's works. But the German is so much more beautiful than either Sill's, or the other, English version, that I think I am not mistaken. Perhaps the fire spared some of the Argonaut's German poems, and you can tell us. H.

Palo Alto, October 29, 1906.

Middle-aged poets may consider themselves squelched by Paul Bourget's dictum in his "Etudes et Portraits": "The poetic gift dwindles with the years. It remains, saving a few exceptions, the privilege of youth. Most of the poets resemble those birds who sing only in the love-time." The "exceptions" in this matter, if one casts one's eyes back over the history of poesy, appear to outnumber the instances, remarks the New York Evening Mail.

Robert Roosevelt, Sportsman and Author

In a series of reminiscences, "Some Authors I Have Known," W. L. Alden, an American journalist now living in London, writes: "I was for some time sub-editor of a weekly New York paper, which was owned and edited by Robert B. Roosevelt, the uncle of President Roosevelt. When I read of Mr. Roosevelt's death the other day at the age of seventy-nine I could hardly realize that the vigorous athletic man whom I knew in my youth had nearly reached his eightieth year. He was a short, stout man, a clever and forceful writer of leading articles, many of which he furnished to the New York Herald, an enthusiastic fisherman, a bon vivant. While Roosevelt never indulged in dissipation of any sort he was certainly what most people regarded as a free liver, and the fact that he lived to be nearly eighty certainly seemed to justify his disapproval of a regular life. He was a genuine humorist, and he wrote a book entitled 'Five Acres Too Much,' a burlesque of a book that was popular at the time and which undertook to show people how to grow rich by cultivating ten acres of land. Roosevelt's book was immensely funny, but it is nearly forty years since it was published, and it was long ago forgotten.

"Mr. Roosevelt wrote a number of other books, chiefly books dealing with fishing and kindred sports. He could throw a fly further than any other man in the United States, and proved it in various contests. He was a good yachtsman, although he never went in for racing. In politics he was a Democrat, and at one time was the leader of a faction of the Democratic party in New York City which revolted against the rule of Tammany Hall. However, he ultimately made his peace with the Tammany wing, and was nominated and elected by Tammany to Congress.

"I notice that several papers have spoken of Mr. Roosevelt as one of the destroyers of the Tammany ring. That is a mistake, for, as I have said, he made his peace with Tammany. The real destroyer of the ring was Louis Jennings, late Member for Stockport, and at one time the political mentor of Lord Randolph Churchill. Jennings was for some years the editor of the New York Times, and his attacks on the Tweed ring were begun without the help of any one, and at the cost of no little peril to himself."

LITERARY NOTES.

A Tale of the Renaissance.

Italy of the early sixteenth century, when the life of the Renaissance was struggling through a veil of feudalism and scholasticism; when every city was a cockpit of murderous factions; when showy pageant and glittering parade stalked blackest misery heedlessly; when saint and spot were each typical of the times—this significantly picturesque period of paradoxes is the scene of Egerton R. Williams's romance, "The Coming of the Dawn." Ridolfo "the magnificent Baglione" is the incarnate diabolical war-lord, splendid in his despotism and his magnanimity; the lovely Gismonda, who rises on the dark mind of Ridolfo the spirit of kindness and love, is a type of the unconsidered but heroic women who did so much that great crisis; and Fra Bernardo, living life utterly at variance with the pomp and fishiness of the times, has a prototype in Saint Bernardino of Perugia. Mr. Williams has written a powerful historical novel that will be read with gripping interest. J. C. Leyendecker has interpreted the spirit of the story with fine success in his illustrations in color. Published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago; $3.00.

Rambles Along the Riviera.

To the "personally conducted" tourist and envious stay-at-home, the strip of Mediterranean coast-line known as the Riviera suggests memories only of Cannes, Nice, Mentone, and not a "beautiful, subtle, sinister place, Monte Carlo." Very lovely is nature at these conventional resorts, and very luxurious are the palatial hotels and casinos, but the author of "Rambles Along the Riviera," Francis Moulton, believes the region is not the peer of southern California in geography or climate. Mr. Moulton bids us our next trip abroad to visit the wonderful up of Provencal towns and the mountain country lying but a few miles back from the sea which "have what California never has had, a tory-strewn pathway traversing its entire length." Starting from Marseilles for his trip along the Riviera proper, and from Arles for a journey through romantic Provence, the author takes us on a delightful tour chiefly by highway and byway, in and out of the beaten track, the most beautiful touring-grounds of the world. The book is illustrated from paintings made on the spot by Blanche McManus. Published by L. C. Page & Co., Boston; $5.00.

A Dominion Story.

Marguerite Merington has acquired the habit of the confirmed playwright, and it is now almost impossible for her to write a story that is not suggestive of stageland. "Scarlett of the Mounted," her latest novel, is a case in point. From beginning to end it is crammed with theatrical unrealities, situations that fairly gallop to a certain climax, repartee that recalls the twining of wits in "Captain Letterblair," and a perfectly open and unaffected appeal to the official tastes of the confirmed play-goer. Scarlett is a sergeant of the mounted police in the mining precincts of the Dominion of Canada. She is impossibly Quixotic; the girl she loves is possibly impractical; the Klondike miners are possibly spectacular, and it is quite out of the question to regard the story, from the point of view of plausibility, as anything but impossible. All the same, it has qualifications that allow one to recognize its possibilities of effectiveness if properly translated to the domain to which it belongs—the light, ephemeral stage literature of the day. Published by Moffatt, Yard & Co.; $1.25.

Where London Amuses Itself.

F. Berkeley Smith asks us not to expect instruction or serious information from his new book, "In London Town." He guides his reader to the music halls and the coziest "pubs," along the Strand, chatting entertainingly the while, but there is not a reference to the Tower, the British Museum, in the volume. His impressions might have been gained "by any traveler who crossed the Channel, hired a hansom at Charing Cross, and lost himself in the throng." Mr. Smith is plainly disappointed in the night-life in the British metropolis. Piccadilly is a "nocturnal centre of sordid gaiety," streets with that which is purely bad, for it is that sole redeeming feature, charm. "Kings Road, Chelsea, is the nearest approach to the Quartier Latin in London," but there is not enough "color" in the artistic life of Chelsea to justify even a one-page leaflet on the subject. And Englishmen make sad work of their attempts at Bohemianism. "No matter if three-quarters of their lives have been passed in the Quartier Latin of Paris, they remain in thought the character British to the end, amused at the show, seldom, if ever, a part of it. I have never seen a Frenchman and an Englishman pals." However, the author finds plenty of frolic in London town, and describes his rambles in a sprightly and impressionistic style.

There are upward of fifty illustrations by the author and other artists. Frank Reynolds's pictures are notably good.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

"Industrial Peace," edited by Arthur H. Dutton and published in Stockton, Cal., is a new magazine, to be the organ of the National Industrial Peace Association. It has for its aim the end of warfare between capital and labor.

The Maine coast, and the fisher and sailor people, do duty in two books to be published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Clara Louise Burnham's novel, "The Opened Shutters," and Henry Rideout's three tales grouped under the title, "Beached Keels."

Bronson Howard, once foremost among American dramatists, offers for the first time a play in book form. His new play, "Kate: A Comedy," makes its appearance, first, in a reading version, to be published at once.

The Macmillan Company publishes this week Marion Crawford's new novel, "A Lady of Rome"; and the fifth and final volume of "A History of Modern England," by Herbert Paul.

"The Gate of Death: a Diary," a book about death and the life after death recently published anonymously in England, is now generally credited to Arthur C. Benson, author of "From a College Window" and other notable works. Mr. Benson also wrote "The Upton Letters" anonymously.

There is announced for publication this week, "Why They Married," by James Montgomery Flagg. The book is issued by the Life Publishing Company, as may be imagined, for Mr. Flagg is a regular contributor to that sparkling weekly. Last year his "If: A Guide to Bad Manners," was one of the successes of the day.

Mrs. Mannington Caffyn's ("Iota") new story, "Smoke in the Flame," begins in Ireland, but most of the action takes place in a remote corner of Switzerland. It will rely, as most of the novels by the author of "A Yellow Aster" have done, on the development of character rather than upon dramatic qualities.

Washington, D. C., is called a "Lucille" town by those who know that Owen Meredith's story in rhyme was written in that city. More copies of the book are sold in the national capital than in any other city in the country.

Charles Scribner's Sons' publications for October include W. T. Hornaday's "Camp Fires in the Canadian Rockies"; Oliver Herford's latest verses, "A Little Book of Boredoms"; Ernest Peixotto's travel book, "By Italian Seas"; essays by Barrett Wendell, "Liberty, Union, and Democracy"; "Real Soldiers of Fortune," by Richard Harding Davis; "Industrial America," by Prof. J. Laurence Laughlin; "The Prisoner at the Bar," by Arthur C. Train; "The First Forty Years of Washington Society," from the letters and journals of Mrs. Samuel Harrison Smith.

Owen Davis, the well-known playwright, has practically completed the dramatization of Arthur Stringer's recent novel, "The Wire Tappers," and arrangements are now under way for its early production.

A merry war is going on in the advertising columns of English newspapers between the publishers and the London Times Book Club. The book club insists that the difference between the technical cost of producing a book and its price is 800 per cent on the cost, of which the publisher gets an unfair share; also that the book trade is in a decadent condition because books are far too expensive. The publishers reply with vigor.

Among the publications just issued is "The Silent War," by John Ames Mitchell, author of "Amos Judd," "The Pines of Lory," "Villa Claudia," and other volumes. This is announced as a story "based on the greatest problem of our time—the millionaires against the masses"—and it discusses "the mysterious conspiracy of the People's League." It is illustrated by William Balfour Ker. Many people think Mitchell's book, "Amos Judd," one of the most notable of recent years, while "Villa Claudia" was by no means far behind it. Therefore his new book will be looked to with much interest.

Struggling young authors may find help in the following suggestions for new and striking titles, offered by a literary man in the Washington Star. They are supposed to contain hints as to locale and treatment: "The Appeasing of Alice Alpaca," "Sadness of Sadie Sinsabaugh," "The Primness of Priscilla," "Swayback Sue's Sauciness," "The Meddlesomeness of Mickey," "The Fascinations of Fannie," "The Joking Jockey's Josh," "The Roguishness of Rosie," "Sensitiveness of the Senator," "The Fickleness of Friskie Fitzsimmons," "The Sameness of Sarah's Sayings."

"The Stars and Stripes and Other American Flags," the title of a comprehensive history of our national standards, is announced for early publication by Little, Brown & Co., Boston. (Price, $3.00 net). Pelag D. Harrison, the author, has been at work on this history for years. The book includes not only the origin and history of our flags, but the army and navy regulations concerning the national standard and ensign.

Miss Anna Rearden's Bequest.

The death of Miss Anna Rearden, a former school teacher, occurred recently at her home in Cleveland, Ohio. Miss Rearden was seventy-two years of age. She was a teacher in the Cleveland public schools for more than forty years. Her will provides that the income from her share in her mother's estate, together with her savings, shall be applied to the publication of "Sappho."

This is the work of her deceased brother, Judge Timothy H. Rearden, of San Francisco. Judge Rearden was a native of Wooster, Ohio, and was graduated from Kenyon College. After his removal to California he became the associate of Bret Harte and other literary lights. "Sappho" was intended as a kind of compendium of all that is known of the Grecian poet and her works. Miss Rearden took a deep interest in her brother's work. She had helped to educate him. The manuscript of "Sappho" was destroyed in the San Francisco disaster. But a corrected proof was found in an old haversack that the judge had carried during his service in the Civil War. It was safe in his library and is now in the hands of Mrs. Badger, a sister, in Kenilworth, Ill.

Del Monte Offers

During the reconstruction of San Francisco, Hotel Del Monte offers a welcome shelter to those desiring a home-like place for rest and recreation. The park-like grounds, the golf links, the flowers, the many walks and drives were never more attractive than at the present. The entire hotel has recently been renovated and improved, with steam heat, electric lights, hot and cold water, telephones in every room. Why not make this attractive resort near San Francisco your permanent home? Special terms for families. Address Geo. P. Snell, Manager, Del Monte, California.

MRS. DYE'S LATEST BOOK

McDONALD
OREGON

By EVA EMERY DYE

AUTHOR "McLOUGHLIN AND OLD OREGON," "THE CONQUEST," ETC.

MRS. DYE has now established her unequalled position as the historian-novelist of the Northwest. Not only is her knowledge and authority beyond question but she has developed the possibilities of history in fiction form farther than any other American writer.

The chance casting away of a party of Japanese on the Oregon coast many years ago inspired Ranald McDonald, a fully historical personage, to enact a similar drama in his own proper self with the characters and continents reversed. In Japan he was permitted to establish a school, and it was actually his pupils who acted as interpreters during the negotiations with Commodore Perry. Mrs. Dye learned her facts from McDonald's own lips and only deferred publication until his papers finally reposed in her hands.

Notes and Gossip.

A chronicle of the social happenings during the past week in the cities on and around the Bay of San Francisco will be found in the following department:

It is announced that the wedding of Miss Burney Owens, the daughter of Mr. and Mrs. I. B. Owens, and Mr. George Herrick will be celebrated in February.

It is announced that the marriage of Miss Lavina Hoffacker, daughter of Mr. and Mrs. B. J. Hoffacker, to Mr. Raymond Splivalo, will take place on Thursday, November 15th.

It is announced that the wedding of Miss Edana Collins, daughter of Mrs. John Collins, to Naval Constructor Thomas F. Ruhen, U. S. N., will take place on Saturday evening, November 17th, at the home of the bride, 702 Miner avenue, Seattle, Washington.

The marriage of Miss Edna Montgomery to Lieutenant Edward A. Sturges, U. S. A., took place on Sunday evening, October 21st, at the home of the bride's mother, Mrs. Montgomery, on Russian Hill. The ceremony was performed at 8 o'clock by Father Prendergast. Miss Alice Poorman was the maid of honor and Mr. Laurence Harris the best man. Lieutenant and Mrs. Sturges went to the Grand Canyon on their wedding journey, and thence to Fort Riley, Kansas.

The marriage of Miss Ella McClure, daughter of Captain W. G. McClure, U. S. A., and Mrs. McClure, to Lieutenant Stanley Koch, Fifth Cavalry, U. S. A., took place on Monday morning of last week at Santa Barbara. The ceremony was performed at 10 o'clock by the Rev. W. C. Merrill. Miss Helen Burton was the ring-bearer and only attendant. Lieutenant and Mrs. Koch have gone East on their wedding journey and will go, on their return, to Huachuca, Arizona, where the groom is stationed.

The engagement is announced of Miss Martha Gottig and Captain A. P. Lundin. The wedding will take place some time in November in New York, where the young people will make their permanent home.

The Gayety Club has reorganized for the winter and Miss Lucy Gwin Coleman is elected president and Miss Maizie Langhorne the secretary. The hostesses at the dances will be Miss Natalie Coffey, on November 21st; Miss Frances Howard, on December 11th; Miss Louise Boyd, on January 16th, and Miss Emily Wilson and Miss Gertrude Josselyn together on February 20th.

Mrs. James A. Robinson was the hostess at a dinner last week in honor of Rear-Admiral Swinburne, U. S. N., at which she entertained Commander Charles R. Gove, U. S. N., and Mrs. Gove, Miss Laura McKinstry, Miss Hooker, Miss Ethel Cooper, Lieutenant Constern, U. S. N., Lieutenant Potet, U. S. N., and Mr. Porter Robinson.

Miss Jeannette Hooper was the hostess at a luncheon in honor of her sister, Mrs. Oscar Beatty, of Woodside, on Friday of last week. Her guests were: Mrs. George Somers, Mrs. Alfred Suto, Mrs. Alexander Baldwin, Miss Emma Grimwood, Miss Anne Field, and Miss Bertha Sidney Smith.

Mr. Edward M. Greenway has set November 16th as the date of his birthday dinner, which is to be given in the banquet hall of the new Palace Hotel.

Commander Richard T. Mulligan, U. S. N., of the United States gunboat Yorktown, was the host at a dinner on Wednesday of last week, given on board the vessel at Mare Island. Those present were: Captain and Mrs. Alexander McCrackin, Medical Director and Mrs. Frank Anderson, Lieutenant-Commander and Mrs. George R. Slocum, Naval Constructor and Mrs. Holden A. Evans, Mrs. Mary Turner, Commander Cameron McCr. Winslow, and Ensign Robert A. Dawes.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a resume of movements to and from this city and Coast and of the whereabouts of absent Californians:

Miss Marietta Havens of Oakland is visiting in Los Angeles.

Mr. and Mrs. Thomas Eastland and Mr. Joseph Eastland left on Sunday last for New York. They expect to be absent about six weeks.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Arthur Walkington (formerly Miss Elsie Harrison) has been brightened by the advent of a son in their home.

The home of Mr. and Mrs. Robert Greer has been brightened by the advent of a daughter.

Sale of a Club House.

The Lotus Club of New York has been installed in its present club house for not very many years. It seems but a short time ago that it was "downtown," as was the Union Club. But both of these, as well as other clubs, secured new quarters on upper Fifth Avenue. Just as the Union Club is settling itself into its new quarters, however, the Lotus Club is preparing to move out. The Union Club men do not manifest any too much satisfaction over their new location, and the Lotus Club men have concluded that they would rather be elsewhere. Therefore they have sold their property for $750,000, and they will make a tidy sum in profit over what they paid for it. The president, when interviewed, said that the Club had sold its property for the reason that it desired to get "quarters in a quiet side street." Shades of Father Knickerbocker! Who would have believed—when the Lotus Club left its old quarters not so many years ago—that upper Fifth Avenue would have been found so busy that a club would be driven, in self defense, to move out? Yet such is the fact. Nowadays, Fifth Avenue from Central Park to Washington Square is a mass of vehicles, and "little old New York" is one of the noisiest cities on earth; it is probable that other clubs will soon seek quieter and more agreeable neighborhoods, following this movement in which the Lotus is the pioneer.

W. V. Stafford, Commissioner of the Bureau of Labor Statistics, has submitted a statement to Governor Pardee on the cost of living in San Francisco as compared with what it was before the fire. His investigation covered 175 dwellings, 18 of which are new. On the old 157 dwellings there was a total rental of $3,896 prior to April 18th. The same 157 dwellings are renting today for $4,953.50, an increase of $1,057.50 making a percentage of increase of the present over the rates prevailing before the fire of 27.1 per cent, which he takes to represent the actual increase in rentals in San Francisco. Investigation shows that pine lumber has increased 19.3 per cent in cost and redwood has increased 12.2 per cent; redwood shingles have increased 33.3 per cent and cedar shingles 23 per cent, according to the actual schedule prices. No discounts are allowed for cash, and this represents an increase of about 4 per cent. He failed to discover any material difference in the cost of living in this city outside of house rent. Meats, if anything, are a little cheaper; clothing apparently just about the same. Some dairy and poultry supplies have been a little cheaper than in previous years, no doubt, through the lack of cold storage facilities.

The Board of Regents of the University of California have decided on plans for the establishment of an academy of Pacific Coast history, with the great Bancroft library as a foundation upon which to build up a great collection of works dealing with the ethnology, geography and history of the whole Pacific Coast, Hawaii, Alaska and Spanish America. It is proposed to house this vast library in the new building which will be constructed with the Charles J. Doe bequest of $750,000. It is estimated the expense of maintaining the institution will be $10,000 a year. Aid will be sought from the Bureau of Historical Research, recently established in Washington by the Carnegie Institute, and an active campaign will be inaugurated to secure sufficient funds for the proper maintenance and increase of the collection.

A handsome loving cup was presented to Raphael Weill a few days ago as a token of esteem by the women of San Francisco. More than five hundred women were interested in the fund subscribed for the token, and all were glad to show their recognition of his generosity as a citizen and appreciation of his many beneficent acts at the time of the recent disaster. Following the fire and earthquake Mr. Weill gave away five thousand dresses and suits to the refugee women of San Francisco. This act, it is said, carried more happiness into the camps than any other single item in the relief work, and it was done so unostentatiously that few people outside of the relief workers knew of Mr. Weill's generous act.

Herman W. Hellman, one of the prominent and wealthiest business men of Southern California, died at his residence in Los Angeles, October 19. Mr. Hellman was associated with many financial institutions of Los Angeles and Southern California. He was the owner of the Hellman block and much other valuable realty in this city. Mr. Hellman was born in Recken-dorf, Germany, September 25, 1843. With his brother, Isaac W. Hellman of San Francisco, he came to California in 1858. He was married in Italy July 26, 1874, to Miss Ida Heilmann. The widow and four children, two sons and two daughters, survive Mr. Hellman.

Paymaster John Irwin, Jr., U. S. N., is detached from the Lawton and ordered to temporary duty at the Navy Yard, Mare Island.

Paymaster G. M. Lukesh, U. S. N., is detached from the Navy Yard, Mare Island, and ordered to duty on the Lawton.

Mrs. Franklin K. Drake left last week for Bremerton Navy Yard, where she goes to join her husband, Captain Drake, U. S. N., who is commanding the Wisconsin.

The Real Property Investment Corporation will put up a two-story store and office building on the land on Montgomery street, which it purchased from Mrs. Oelrichs before the fire, formerly the site of the Lick House. It is expected that it will require six months to complete the structure after the work is started. This will be one of the biggest office and store buildings in the city. The property has a frontage of 200 feet on Montgomery street and 315 feet on Sutter, including Lick alley. There is also a frontage of 85 feet on Post and 275 on Lick alley. There will be ten stores on Sutter street, eight on Montgomery, one on Post, to cover a space of 85x100, and ten stores on Lick alley. On the upper floor there are to be 142 offices.

The publication of the late Queen Victoria's letters written and received by her during the most interesting part of her reign, has again been postponed. The real truth is that so many painful family revelations, which would affect living members of well-known families, have been discovered that a wholesale revision of the three volumes is now being made. Many heads of families have approached the King on the matter, fearing lest their private affairs should be made public, with the result that His Majesty has now ordered that no letter shall be printed until it has been read and approved by himself. Thus the three volumes will be robbed of much "spice," but they are expected to be of absorbing interest in spite of the liberal "cutting."

Several receptions and banquets have been given during the past week in honor of Captain Roald Amundsen, the Norwegian navigator who accomplished the Northwest passage in his vessel, the Gjoa. City officials, the presidents of the two universities, and numerous citizens joined in honoring the hero of the Arctic journey. The Norwegian societies have been especially active in attentions to their famous countryman.

The exhibition of recent paintings of William Keith, at the gallery of Vickery, Atkins & Torrey, is a source of delight for all art lovers. Among the favorites of the visitors may be mentioned especially, "The Oak Farm," "Golden October," and "Afternoon Sky." There are sixty-eight paintings in the collection.

Madame Gadske has started on a tour with the pleasing prospect of all time being booked solidly up to Christmas, when she returns to Germany. Considering that this is the prima donna's third successive American concert tour, this record is something to cause comment.

Another feature of the Original Vienna Cafe and Bakery, 1014 Van Ness avenue, is the dainty service. Breakfast, lunch and tea, hot rolls, delicious coffee and chocolate served by natty young ladies.

HOME-COMING OF DINWIDDIE.

How the Dormitory Joined in His Appeal to the Closed Door.

Mr. Dinwiddie was a very nice, innocuous little man, begins Huntley Murray, in the Broadway Magazine. Indeed, there was something almost obtrusive about his harmlessness. He shrank from a strange child with looks of pathetic appeal to the bystanders. He always said, "No, thank you," to clamorous newsboys, and it is a miracle that his respect for Mrs. Dinwiddie had ever relaxed enough to allow him to marry her. She was a large, gusty woman. When she spoke to you it seemed that she was perpetually about to shake her first in your face, while in conversation with Mr. Dinwiddie, one never got rid of the uneasy sensation that he was keeping his fingers crossed behind his back.

It was out of regard for his Better Two-Thirds that Mr. Dinwiddie came to the university town just before Commencement time. Mrs. Dinwiddie had been a prom. girl in her lighter days, and wished to behold those scenes again. The first evening of their visit, Mr. Dinwiddie was packed off to the club to meet people, with strict orders not to come home too early. Mrs. Dinwiddie went with Lucy and the girls to a musicale.

At seven minutes past one the next morning Mr. Dinwiddie picked his way daintily across Alden street and turned down Glen street to his temporary home. The left side of Glen street is lined by dry, little, late-Colonial houses; on the right rise, cliff-like, the long, red, many-windowed walls of a University Dormitory. Mrs. Dinwiddie's sister's husband's house was the fifth—a thin, ashamed house, with concrete urns in the front yard. Let it be understood past question that, in spite of the hour, Mr. Dinwiddie was profoundly sober. He was not feeling very well, because he had been drinking horse's necks while the other men drank Black-and-White highballs; and he had conscientiously kept even—and five bottle of ginger ale at a sitting is a strain.

Mr. Dinwiddie found the fifth house, verified the number, looked at his silver watch, went through the gate sidewise, and with a sigh of relief rang the bell. He glanced across at the dormitory and a vague thought sniffed at the skirts of his mind—a thought which, had Mr. Dinwiddie been Wordsworth, would have resulted in the sonnet on Westminster Bridge. He sighed and pushed the button again. An aching stillness followed. A cab clacked down Alden street and lumbered out of hearing. Mr. Dinwiddie's face hardened. He leaned long against the button, until he could faintly hear the querulous voice of the bell. He listened until his own pulses were as the tread of multitudes hurrying to open the door. Still held the hollow hush. Had Mr. Dinwiddie been a scholar he might have reflected that the Greeks and primitive people generally have been quite correct in locating the seat of the emotions. Instead of philosophizing, he groaned gently and alternated his bell-ringing with such tentative batterings at the door as it seemed must arouse the neighborhood. But Glen street is insured to nocturnal noises, and all its mighty heart continued to lie still. Mr. Dinwiddie desisted, listened at the keyhole—then delicacy abdicated. He retreated to the sidewalk and called his wife's name aloud in the public street. "Mary," wailed Mr. Dinwiddie, "Oh, Mary! Let me in!"

Across the way a restless sophomore with a headache heard that wail, and rose. Leaning half way out of his window, he contemplated the serenader.

"Mary! Mary! Open the door!"

The sophomore reached for the water bottle on his windowsill, uncorked it, and slowly drank one pint. Then he wetted his head. Other students awoke and roused their roommates. The invocations in the street gained volume. The psychic sense of something doing pervaded the dormitory. Presently every window held one or two mist-white wraiths, observant, grinning. A handful of matches spattered on the sidewalk, raising little pale flames. A voice cried, "Fi-er!" and the multitudinous amusement became audible. Mr. Dinwiddie started and grew hot. His hair itched. He was desperate.

"Mary! Mary! Let me in! It's I—it's Arthur!" The sophomore nearly threw himself past his balance. "Now, then, fellows, all together!" Three hundred pairs of sturdy lungs filled at the word. "Are you ready? One, two, —"

"Oh, Mary! Stick-your-head-out-of-the-window!"

Mr. Dinwiddie nearly fainted with shame and rage. His heart was alternate flame and ice. He shook his thin fists overhead and remonstrated passionately. But by this time a foghorn would have been inaudible. The strains of "Don't You See I'm Lonely?" at one end of the building contended with a hastily extemporized version of "Everybody Sleeps But Arthur" at the other. The splatter of matches was incessant.

All the more noisy domestic animals were imitated at once. One man was firing blank cartridges, another was displaying his ignorance of the bugle; flaming newspapers, floating earthward or sticking among the telephone wires, cast a gruesome light over the scene. And from an upper window a stentorian wretch with a megaphone was conjuring Mary by all known gods of classic and modern times to cut out pounding her ear and produce poor Arthur's nightie.

"Gentlemen! Gentlemen!" shrieked Mr. Dinwiddie in a momeotary lull, "consider! How can you—"

"Bottle night!" roared a senior. And immediately every man in the building hurled his water-bottle crashing into the street, and followed it with his washbowl and pitcher. Broken glass slithered over the stones, bottles rang and clashed, pitchers popped, washbowls boomed. And amid the scattering fire of the last ammunition the Dormitory chanted with one organization:

"Ain't dat a shame—
A measly shame—
To keep your honey
Out in the rain?"

A carriage with frightened horses drove crunching through the fragmentary potsherds. Therefrom descended Mary, indignant, and the family of her sister. Mr. Dinwiddie tucked himself under her arm, with a squeak of joy. And as the door of the house with the concrete urns in the yard banged after the company, the sophomore, weak with laughter, sent forth with his last remaining breath the immemorial amen of midnight carousals:

"All O-o-ver!"

L'Envoi.

When Earth's last scandal is printed and the forms are battered and pied,
When the newest muck-heap has crumbled and the oldest raker has died,
We shall rest, and, faith, we shall need it—lie down for an aeon or two,
Till Saint Teddy, the Master Critic, shall find us something to do.

And those that were good shall be happy; they shall sit on a cloud and rail
At the swing of the stars in their course and the curve of a comet's tail—
Thomas and David and Upton, Sammie and Ida and Ray,
They shall censure and kick and cavil, and never be tired a day.

And only Saint Teddy shall praise us, and only Saint Teddy shall blame;
And no one shall kick for money, and no one shall kick for fame,
But just for the joy of kicking; and each shall be perfectly free
To change and arrange Creation as he thinks that it ought to be.

HOTEL RULES AND REGULATIONS.

One of the first things the delegates to the annual convention of the Rocky Mountain Hotel Men's Association, recently held in Denver, were called on to consider, was the adoption of new rules for use in their hostilities. According to the Tourist, the following rules have been recommended by the Denver contingent:

Travelers without trunks will be fastened to the bedpost with a chain and the chain will be locked. The key will be placed in the safe over night. Any one caught filing the chain will be charged $2 extra.

The elevator in this hotel has been running for three years and must now be about 11,987 miles away. Those who fall down stairs when they don't feel like it do so at their own risk.

There are three departments—upstairs, downstairs, and outdoors. Outdoors is the cheapest. If the sun shines in your room too feverishly, notify the clerk and he will remove the sun to the other side of the house.

When a bride and groom appear at the table for the first time, nobody must refer to them as tablespoons under a penalty of sixty cents and ten years in jail.

Washing not allowed in rooms. Ladies giving an order to "put me on a flat iron" will be put on one at any hour of the day or night.

Corner froot rooms, upon only one flight, for each guest.

Any guest who thinks his bill exorbitant may argue the matter with the bull terrier in the backyard, who is kept hungry for that purpose.

If the bellboy doesn't come when you call, run down to the office and report the matter. The exercise will do you good; besides, this is the bellboy's day off.

In case of fire jump out of the window, turn to the left and go three blocks north.

The imitation ice in the pitcher is copyrighted and must not be removed from the premises.

Children will be welcomed with delight and are requested to bring hoops, wagons, dogs, etc., to bang furniture, run through the halls, fall down stairs, carry away dessert in their pockets and make themselves as disagreeable as the fondest mother could desire.

Guests who would invite the proprietor to have a drink with them are reminded that he drinks but three times a day—before meals, after meals, and between meals.

Guests wishing to get up without being called may have self-rising flour for supper.

Guests afflicted with hay fever will please not sneeze when passing grass widows.

"My gracious, Mary," said Mr. Wappley, "why do you keep these trunks and satchels here in the hall where people have to fall over them every time they try to get into the house? We've got a storeroom for such things, haven't we?" "Well, what's the use going to Europe and getting labels pasted on your trunks if they are to be hid away in storerooms? You ain't got any more family pride than a Navajoseph Indian."—Chicago Record-Herald.

Funny-Paper Whiskers Out.

The gentlemen who make cartoons for humorous periodicals of the East long ago decided that the typical citizen of Oklahoma was a lean, hungry-looking individual, with a moustache that could be tied behind his ears, or whiskers that expanded generously over his moustache and were beautifully tinted with tobacco juice, remarks the New York World.

The Oklahoma Journal of Commerce has issued an illustrated edition which shows a little caricaturist often know about their business. Of its 105 portraits of more or less prominent citizens there are only five exhibits of whiskers and four of these are as closely cropped as Vice President Fairbanks'. The sole exception is a type of funny-paper whiskers, but of the old-fashioned American beard that is believed have had its roots in the fertile soil of the Western Reserve.

Mustaches are more numerous. There are twenty-five among the 105—not Alkali like mustaches, but rather of the well-trimmed New York kind. None of these Oklahoma mustaches would attract particular attention in Wall Street.

But beards and mustaches are in a hopeless minority. Out of eight editors seven have smooth faces. Seventeen out of twenty-nine Republican politicians are smooth-faced, and only two have beards. In the Democracy whiskers are held even less esteem, forty-four out of fifty-two prominent Democrats being smoothly shaven.

A good story is going the rounds on President Jordan of Stanford University (says the San Francisco Chronicle).

At 10 o'clock on the morning of April 1 Dr. Jordan prophesied that there would be no other earthquake. He ordered all persons connected with Stanford University to get out of the houses and be prepared. He gave similar orders in regard to his own home.

As an upper servant was getting things shape for the expected temblor, he observed there was a fire in the kitchen. He at once went down to have it out with the Chinese cook.

"Put the fire out," he said. "Didn't you tell me what the doctor said? There will be another shake."

"Umph," grunted the cook. "If Doctor Jordan's second shake come, why he no teller first shake."

President Eliot, of Harvard, is no believer in the Rooseveltian spelling reform. Once it was a student who was a candidate for the degree of doctor of philosophy. This man adopted spelling reform as his particular line of work and as commencement day drew near he went to President Eliot with a request.

"You know, Mr. President," he said, "you are proposing to make me a Ph. D. Now I have a specialty of spelling reform and always spell philosophy with an f. I therefore called to ask you if you could not make degree F. D. instead of Ph. D."

"Certainly, my dear sir," replied the president of Harvard. "In fact, if you insist we will make it D. F."

Jack London's

NEW NOVEL

WHITE FANG

There has been nothing since his "The Call of the Wild" at all like this story of a wolf-nature tamed, of the fight for life of men and animals with the still cold of the north, stronger than either. It is written in the same spirit of adventure as "The Call of the Wild," but with vastly different incidents, and even more dramatic development.

WHITE FANG

By JACK LONDON, whose "The Call of the Wild" swept the country, in an exceptional success, "marvellously interesting," said the Times; "wholly satisfying," The New York Sun.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

I taking testimony in the Colton will case last in Washington, a quick-witted old lady been on the stand for some time on behalf of the proponents of the will. She had testified, among other things, that she was the editor of the Book of Lineage of the Daughters of the Revolution—of which the late Mrs. Colton had a member. Joe Redding took her under examination and he commenced in a casual suppose, my dear madam, that you and Colton may have compared your recollections in some of your conversations?"

"Never," replied the old lady: "I never asked her. I would not dare take such a liberty with myself."

Redding made one more effort. "Ah!" said the attorney, "but I can find out both of the ages in the Book of Lineage of the Daughters of the Revolution?"

"No you can not," replied the dame. "It is not the constitution to mention any member's age it would break up the society."

And Joe gave up in despair.

Gladstone was once addressing the House of Commons on the Irish question. An observation of the honorable gentleman tickled the fancy of Mr. Labouchere. "The honorable member said the G. O. M. "No," said Mr. Labouchere shortly. "I hear him do it," said Gladstone promptly, and then the whole House was heard to smile. It was in the same that an impassioned Irish member declared: "The Government is taking a leap in the dark compared with which all previous leaps were mere flea bite," and when the uproar had subided, Mr. Labouchere interposed to say he had no doubt that what the honorable member meant to say was a mere flea leap.

Gladstone once declared that "we must make our stand on the shifting sands of politics that are hatched from day to day." A known member once ended an impressive oration as follows: "All classes, all creeds, all ranks—from the Queen sitting on her throne to the laborer sitting on his cottage," etc.

A ambassador of a well-known European church was riding in the streets of Constantinople when one of the Sultan's carriages passed by. Seeing it was guarded, his curiosity got the better of him, and when the carriage passed him he was daring enough to peep in at the passenger.

He was surprised and pained to receive a look in the face from an attendant in charge.

With rage, he demanded audience of the Sultan.

The Sultan listened attentively, and for a moment appeared lost in thought. At last he said: "My dear —, I have gone carefully into the case and see exactly how it stands.

Moreover, of course, a gentleman, therefore you will never have committed such a breach of manners as you allege to have taken place. Therefore no attendant could possibly have tried you. The whole affair seems to be a product of your fancy. Let us dismiss it."

An engineer from Sunderland was spending a few days in London with a friend, and after by morning sightseeing the Londoner chose to go to a restaurant for luncheon, thinking it would be a novel experience for the man from the north. The visitor appeared to enjoy his luncheon, but kept looking in the direction of the door. "What are you watching?" asked his landlord, rather annoyed. "Well," was the quiet reply, "A's keepin' an eye on a ma topcoat." "I don't bother about that," said the other, "I don't see me watching mine."

"No," observed the guileless engineer, "these things call to—it's ten minutes sin' thine went."

B. Wright is a country storekeeper in Pennsylvania, and went to Philadelphia to purchase a lot of goods. The goods were shipped immediately and reached home before he did. When boxes of goods were delivered at his store by the payman his wife happened to look at the label; she uttered a loud cry and called for her husband. A neighbor, hearing her screams, came to her assistance, asking the cause of the trouble. The wife, pale and faint, pointed to the had been well known as a stern opponent of the use of tobacco. But presently Bishop Eastburn rushed to the sideboard and got a box of cigars, at the same time remarking lugubriously, "Dr. Potter, I presume that you don't smoke."

"Whenever I get a chance, I do," answered Potter.

Whereupon Bishop Eastburn's face broadened into a smile, and he exclaimed, "Thank God! I was afraid you had inherited the detestable prejudices of your father!"

P. R. Lund, chief train-agent of the Southern Pacific, has recently been promoted, after years of service (says the San Francisco Chronicle) and is getting congratulations from all sides, including the fair sex.

"Oh, Mr. Lund, delighted," said one. "Isn't the train-agent the man who holds up the trains?"

There was a general laugh, and it was explained that a "road-agent" performs that office for the company.

"It's all the same," said one of Lund's friends. "A road-agent holds up the trains and a train-agent holds up the company."

A senator hurried into the United States Senate chamber one morning early, and said to a page:

"Young man, did you find a $10 bill on my desk last evening? I wrote a letter, intending to inclose the bill, but somehow I failed to do so, and left it behind on the blotter."

"Yes, Senator," said the page, taking out his wallet, "I did find that bill, and here it is. And it's a lucky thing for you, sir, that none of the other senators happened in before I saw it."

When Queen Victoria visited Manchester, one thing she did was to go over a certain convent there. In every department she visited, the Sisters made profound curtsies. This annoyed the Queen, and she said reproachfully to her guide:

"Ah, mother, I thought I told you emphatically that I wished to be treated quite as an ordinary visitor. Why, then, is every one curtsying?"

"Your wishes, madam, have been obeyed," the mother replied. "The reverence shown by the Sisters is not intended for you, their queen, but for me, their superior."

The Vixen was bought for the Spanish War. How she got her present name is a favorite navy story. Commander Alexander Sharp, Jr., now of the cruiser Chattanooga, was naval aid to Theodore Roosevelt, Assistant Secretary of the Navy, at the outbreak of the Spanish War, and he applied for the command of a vessel. He was then only a lieutenant, and was not entitled to a large ship. John D. Long, Secretary of the Navy, decided to assign him to command the Josephine. "Mr. Secretary," said Sharp, "my wife's name is Josephine, and I wish you would change the name of the yacht I am to command."

"And what does Mrs. Sharp say?" asked Mr. Long.

"She said," answered Sharp, "that if you kept the name, it would be the only Josephine I ever commanded."

"Ah," said the Secretary of the Navy, "I shall change the vessel's name to the Vixen." And the Vixen she became.

One day a man, apparently white, came into the best restaurant in Atlanta. The head waiter looked him over and thought he had negro blood in him. In fact, he was a very light quadroon.

"Here you," the head waiter said, "you are colored!"

"Oh, no, I ain't," the man replied. "Not in the sense you mean."

"But you are mighty dark."

"I know I am, but that is because I am a Malay."

The head waiter was nonplussed. He looked again and then asked suspiciously: "What is a Malay? Where is he from?"

"Why," said the man easily, "Malays are from Malasia."

Victor Hugo had a very exalted opinion of his own importance. Walking with a friend one day, he abruptly asked, "Can you imagine what I would say to the Creator, should I meet him?"

"Yes," replied his friend. "You would say 'My dear Confre!'"

A meteorite fell on a Vermont farm in 1896. It was a valuable meteorite, and the landlord at once stepped up and claimed it. "All minerals and metals on the land belong to me," he said. "That's in the lease." But the tenant demurred. "This meteorite," he said, "wasn't on the farm, you must remember, when the lease was drawn up."

The landlord perceived the justice of that claim. He thought a moment. Then he said, decisively: "I claim her as flying game."

But the tenant was ready for him. "She's got neither wings nor feathers," he said. "Therefore, as ground game, she's mine."

They continued their argument, and in the heat of it a revenue officer, arriving with a truck, proceeded to put the meteorite aboard. "I claim her for the Government," he said, "as an article introduced into the country without payment of duty."

Charles Hawtrey once when making a trip through Europe found himself in a small village minus his luggage and razors. There was no barber's shop, but having heard of a man in the village who occasionally had shaved people, the famous actor sent for him, and was astonished at being requested to lie flat on his back before operations were commenced. Thinking it a custom of the country, he lay down, and was shaved with ease and dexterity. He asked the man the reason why he requested his customers to adopt so peculiar a position. "Because, sir," was the naive reply, "I never before shaved a live man!"

A senator from a central Western State sought an interview with the President, asking him to appoint to a foreign consulate an applicant to whom the senator was in some way bound, but who was heartily disliked by reason of his offensive persistence in seeking favors.

"Where do you want him sent?" the senator was asked.

At this the senator took a step or two to the center of the room, where stood a large globe. Putting one arm around it as far as he could reach, the senator said:

"I don't know what locality my finger touches, but please send him there!"

Among the passengers on an Atlantic liner when it left New York recently was a charming young woman from St. Louis, who was making her first trip abroad. The vessel had not proceeded far when the fair passenger approached the captain and said:

"The ship appears to be stopping, captain. Why should we stop here?"

"We stop here to let the pilot off," was the reply.

"To let the pilot off?" exclaimed the young woman in a tone of polite incredulity. "Do you mean to say that the pilot doesn't cross the ocean with us and direct our course?"

"I mean just that," answered the captain.

The fair passenger pondered for a bit. Then smiling as if a bright idea had occurred to her, she added: "Oh, I suppose after he has set the rudder pointing to the right direction that there's nothing left for him to do, so he goes."

When Frank Stockton started out with his Rudder Grange experiences he undertook to keep chickens. One hen brought out a brood late in the fall. Stockton named each of the chicks after some literary friend, among the rest Mary Mapes Dodge. Mrs. Dodge was visiting the farm some time later, and happening to think of her namesake, she said:

"By the way, Frank, how does little Mary Mapes Dodge get along?"

"The funny thing about little Mary Mapes Dodge," said he, "is that she turns out to be Thomas Bailey Aldrich."

LIQUEUR

PÈRES CHARTREUX

— GREEN AND YELLOW —

This famous cordial, now made at Tarragona, Spain, was for centuries distilled by the Carthusian Monks (Pères Chartreux) at the Monastery of La Grande Chartreuse, France, and known throughout the world as Chartreuse. The above cut represents the bottle and label employed in the putting up of the article since the Monks' expulsion from France, and it is now known as Liqueur Pères Chartreux (the Monks, however, still retain the right to use the old bottle and label as well), distilled by the same order of Monks, who have securely guarded the secret of its manufacture for hundreds of years, and who alone possess a knowledge of the elements of this delicious nectar.

This Number of the Argonaut

Is sent to a certain number who are not on its subscription lists. If it should happen to fall into the hands of those who already are subscribers or readers, they are asked to hand it to any person who in their opinion may be interested in such a journal. There are many pressing topics in these stirring days. In this issue we discuss National politics, California politics, and the interesting campaigns now progressing in the various States. Likewise the questions so vital to San Francisco in her present needs—insurance, relief, rehabilitation, rebuilding, labor—all these and many kindred topics are now being discussed in the Argonaut. Our regular readers know that this journal has not missed an issue, and that practically all of the time since the disaster it has been issued in its old form. Others may not know it, hence some of these issues are sent free to strangers.

The Argonaut will be sent free up to Jan. 1st, 1907, to all new subscribers who send in one year's subscription during November and December.

THE ALLEGED HUMORISTS.

"What makes you think he married her for her money?" "She does."—Cleveland Press.

Every man has his faults, but no man has as many as his wife thinks he has.—Chicago Record-Herald.

"Weren't you fired by the college spirit when at Yale?" "No. By the president."—Cleveland Press.

"Will they hang the prisoner?" "Not yet. His lawyers managed to hang the jury."—Baltimore American.

"I would share your every sorrow." "But I have no sorrows." "Wait till we're married."—Cleveland Leader.

"You kiss like an expert," said the pretty maid. "How do you know I do?" queried the mere man.—Chicago News.

"How much did he make out of that latest graft scheme?" "A clean million." "You mean a million."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Mrs. Hoyle—I hear that your son had to leave college. Mrs. Doyle—Yes; he studied too hard, learning the football signals.—Puck.

Friend—"Well, did you get your copy right for that last work?" Author (mournfully)—"I did, but the printers didn't."—Baltimore American.

"What do you think of this theory of living out of doors?" "It all depends on whether you leave the house voluntarily, or are put out."—Detroit Free Press.

"Bobby, did you have a good time at the picnic?" "Yes, mother." "Why didn't you stay until it was over?" "What was the use, mother? We were through eating."—Milwaukee Sentinel.

"The ancients thought the world was flat." "Well, I don't blame 'em. They had no chorus girls, no cigarettes, no bridge, no society journals. It must have been in those days."—Philadelphia Bulletin.

"Here's something about the Dutch stealing one of the Philippine Islands. I wonder what Uncle Sam will do about it?" "Well, it would serve them right if he refused to take it back."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

"I suppose your motto is, 'Be sure you're right, and then go ahead.'" "Not in the financial game," answered Mr. Dustin Stax. "My motto is, 'Be sure you're ahead; then you're all right.'"—Washington Star.

"Alas!" sighed the poet. "We can no longer keep the wolf from the door." "Oh, I don't know," rejoined his wife. "You might sit on the front step and read one of your poems aloud."—Chicago Daily News.

Ascum—"Is your boss going to give you the raise you asked for?" Clark—"Well—er—I'm afraid to say. I told him I thought my pay should be commensurate with the amount of work I do and he promptly agreed with me."—Philadelphia Press.

No Nerve—Chuggerton—"How's your new chauffeur?" Carr—"Had to fire him; he used to be a motorman." Chuggerton—"Too reckless, eh?" Carr—"Reckless, nothing! Why, I couldn't break him of the habit of slowing up at crossings!"—Puck.

"You'll find I'm hard to discourage," said the persistent suitor melodramatically. "Some day I'll make you admit you love me, and then—and not till then—I will die happy." "I'll say it now," replied the heartless girl. "I don't mind telling a lie for a good end."—Philadelphia Ledger.

First Esperantist (volubly)—Lend me a couple of louis, old fellow. Second Esp.—I beg your pardon? First Esp.—I am begging the loan of a couple of louis. Second Esp. (thoughtfully)—Strange, after all, there are still a few words of the new tongue I don't understand.—Figaro.

Hotel Clerk (suspiciously)—"Your bundle has come apart. May I ask what that queer thing is?" Guest—"This is a new patent fire escape. I always carry it, so in case of fire I can let myself down from the hotel window. See?" Clerk (thoughtfully)—"I see. Our terms for guests with fire-escapes, sir, are invariably cash in advance."—New York Weekly.

He was romantic, but bashful for his age. At 25 it is expected nowadays that a man should be matter of fact. She was his equal in romance, but a trifle older, old enough indeed to be a widow. The conversation had turned on the ever-important subject of mothers-in-law. There was a lull in the argument. Gazing far, she sighed and said: "Ah, me! I shall never have another mother-in-law." He looked at her with interest for a moment and then suddenly blurted out: "My mother died when I was very young." It was an inadvertence, but he could not draw back. She threw herself into his arms and they have lived happily—up to now.—Pittsburg Press.

The Japanese in Our Schools.

After the fire of April 18th, the San Francisco School Department temporarily housed Japanese and other Asiatic children in the school houses with the white children. As soon as it was possible, however, the school Board provided a separate building for these Asiatic children, in compliance with the school law of California. This led to a formal remonstrance from Tokio through the Japanese Ambassador at Washington. It was followed by a protest from the Japanese Consul at San Francisco, and the institution of proceedings in the Federal Court to compel the San Francisco School Board to admit a Japanese pupil to be seated side by side with the white children in the San Francisco schools. These formal court proceedings were presumably with the approval of the Japanese Consul, as a Japanese attorney assisted his learned white brother at the bar.

President Roosevelt at once directed a dispatch to be sent by Secretary Root to the Japanese Imperial Government, apologizing for the action of the San Francisco School authorities, and explaining that the local exigencies due to the recent calamity, and the present labor disturbances had probably led to this action. The implication in this dispatch was that the Federal Government would at once take steps to remove the causes complained of by the Japanese Government, and the corollary was that the Federal Government would thus right a wrong. Pending action by the Federal Government toward removing the wrongs alleged to be due to the action of the school officials of California, the Japanese Government has refrained from further action. In accordance with this same course, and probably at the direction of the Japanese Imperial Government, the suit brought in the Federal Court under the direction of the Japanese Consul against the San Francisco School Board, has been dismissed.

In the meantime, Secretary Metcalf, head of the Department of Commerce and Labor, has been sent post haste to San Francisco by President Roosevelt to investigate the matter. Secretary Metcalf has held conferences with the Japanese Consul, the United States District Attorney, Federal Judges Henshaw, Gilbert, and Ross, and the San Francisco School Board. He has expressed no opinion, and has given out nothing for publication. As the Secretary is a discreet man, and particularly on these vexatious Asiatic topics, we are convinced that he will keep his own counsel until he reports to the President. The only significant utterance made by the Secretary was when he asked President Altmann how California defined the word "Mongolian" in that clause of her statute where it provides that separate schools shall be provided for "Indian children" and for "children of Mongolian or Chinese descent." From this it is evident that the Administration will probably hold that the Japanese are not Mongolians.

It seems to us that President Roosevelt need only look out of his windows to note that we need no more race troubles. If he goes along Pennsylvania avenue from the White House to the Capitol he will see more negroes in a mile than he can see of Japanese in San Francisco in ten. Yet already ominous troubles are beginning here over a few score thousand Japanese. In fifteen years from now, if the Administration assumes this welcoming attitude toward the east coast of Asia, we shall have millions of Asiatics on the west coast of America. Are not the thousands of idle and lazy negroes whom President Roosevelt may see any day in Washington an object lesson of the undesirability of further race problems in the United States. Yet the Washington negroes are far superior to the negroes of the Black Belt. We have had the negroes with us for a couple of centuries, and our troubles with them seem but to have begun. We have had the Japanese with us for less than half a century and we are having more trouble with them already on the Pacific Coast than with any other race, not excluding the Chinese.

It was on December 18, 1865, that the Thirteenth Amendment to the Constitution went into effect abolishing slavery. It was in July, 1868, that the Fourteenth Amendment went into effect making the negroes citizens, giving them civil rights, and enumerating certain of those civil rights. This amendment also cut down the representation in Congress of such States as denied to negroes the right to vote. But no Southern State, as a result of this penalizing, ever enfranchised the negro. It was on February 26, 1869, that the Fifteenth Amendment was proposed by Congress; it declared that "the right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude." It went into effect March 30, 1870, ratified by thirty States. It was rejected by California, Oregon, New York, and seven other States.

It is thirty-six years since the Fifteenth Amendment gave to negroes the right to vote. Does President Roosevelt think that negroes freely exercise the right to vote in the Southern States? We do not think so. It is thirty-eight years since the Fourteenth Amendment gave to negroes civil rights. Does President Roosevelt think that negroes are granted equal rights in theatres, hotels, railway trains, or street cars in all the States, Southern or Northern? We do not think so. It may be said that the Federal courts can coerce the States into giving "equal rights" to the negroes. We do not think so. But if there may be those who doubt the soundness of our judgment, we may add that the United States Supreme Court in the celebrated "Slaughter-house cases" decided that the Fourteenth Amendment does not deprive the States of police powers; that court upheld the right of the States to regulate their domestic affairs; it decided that there is a citizenship of the States as well as of the United States; it decided that the States could vest certain privileges and immunities with their citizens. This decision was opposed by many extremists, as the war feeling still ran high. Congress thereupon passed a measure known as "the Civil Rights Bill," which was intended to extort from the white citizens of the Southern States the recognition of the negroes' "equal rights." This law, when brought up before the Supreme Court, was declared to be unconstitutional. In the light of these facts we do not believe that the Federal Government can coerce the State of California in this matter of its school laws.

Since the fire we have not had at hand a copy of the treaty with Japan. It is true that treaties are a part of the supreme law of the land, but we do not believe that even the Constitution could empower the Federal Government to force Chinese or Japanese or other Asiatic children into the California public schools. We believe that the conduct of the public schools is purely a domestic matter with which the Federal Government has nothing to do. That Government is a government of delegated rights, and the States never delegated to it the right to control their public schools.

But, even if this reasoning is wrong, we assure President Roosevelt, Secretary Root, and Secretary Metcalf that it is immaterial to the people of California what construction may be put on treaties and laws in so far as they affect the right to enter the public schools of this State. The people of California will never permit children of Asiatic descent to sit at the same desks and occupy the same rooms with their white children. The Government of the United States is powerful, but it is not powerful enough for that. If it should attempt to force into the public schools of California the children of alien, semi-servile, and pagan races, it may perhaps do so under the Federal law, for the citizens of this State are law-abiding. But the attempt will only result in the school-houses of this State being turned over to the Chinese, Japanese, Ceylonese, Filipino, and Lascar proteges of the Federal Government. And the white men and white women of California will educate their children in schools of their own.

Mayor Schmitz's Opportunity Lost.

Mayor Schmitz has been followed on his vacation with more assiduity than is usually paid to a traveling San Franciscan. Not only have his movements been chronicled, but the size of his hotel bills has been faithfully set forth by his friend, the Examiner. Doubtless Mr. Schmitz could dispense cheerfully with some of this minuteness. One of the drawbacks of this assiduous following was not unamusingly set forth in two cablegrams which reached San Francisco on the same day, October 29. One of these was from Berlin, and stated that the Berlin Fire Insurance Company and the Prussian National Fire Insurance Company had voted to increase their capital stock and pay their San Francisco losses. The other cablegram was a brief one from London, in which Mayor Schmitz was reported as expressing his views on the Japanese question in the San Francisco public schools. The awkward part of this for the Mayor is that he was on his way to Berlin. Had he not been so closely followed by the cable, his arrival in Berlin would have been almost synchronous with the declaration of the two German companies to pay their just debts. At such a distance it is difficult to time a man's movements with a stop-watch. The policyholders here would naturally have believed that the Mayor's arrival in Berlin had something to do with the sudden determination of the insurance companies to plunk up. But as Sir Boyle Roche said, "Nobody but a bird can be in two places at the same time." And it is quite evident that Mr. Schmitz could not have been on October 29 in both Berlin and London.

Our National Debt for a Century.

It is a good thing to know that we, the people, keep a number of bookkeepers busy in Washington figuring out just how much we have, just how much we owe, and just what the debts are. Some of us are not good at bookkeeping. Were it not for those who seem devoted to that sort of thing, and manage, somehow, to make something out of it, we might never know whether we really have anything or owe anything. Sometimes, unfortunately, it is not pleasant to learn the exact condition of our balance, debit or credit.

However, there is nothing saddening or individually oppressive in the statement just completed by O. P. Austin, Chief of the Bureau of Statistics in the Department of Commerce and Labor. It is, on the whole, rather encouraging. The statement brings the figures—with the present year partially estimated—down to June 30, 1906, and reaches back to 1800 for purposes of comparison. Some will be surprised to learn that Americans had become familiar with big figures more than a hundred years ago. The public debt was almost eighty-three million dollars then, and we had been doing business as an independent national concern only twenty-four years. Considering that we started without any paid-up capital, perhaps that may be taken as evidence of business ability. The debt amounted to more than $15 for every inhabitant of the young republic, but economy was a national custom and in forty years the government owed only three and one-half millions, and that divided up among the people represented a liability of only 21 cents each. We were never nearer out of debt than in that year, and it seems a pity now that we did not somehow scrape together enough to balance the books.

Before 1850 we had incurred the expense of the Mexican War, and the debt per capita had run up to $2.74. We had gained some energetic citizens and a lot of productive land, however, and by 1857 the national indebtedness had been cut down to 99 cents for each person. If everybody had sent a dollar in to the national treasury then, on the recent campaign fund plan, we would not only have been out of debt but would have had something laid up for a rainy day. In 1865 the high-water mark of national indebtedness was reached. At the end of the Civil War we owed more than two and one-half billions—to be exact, $2,674,- 815,856.76, or $76.98 per capita. From that time to 1893 the big balance against us was steadily reduced, coming down to $839,000,000, or $12.64 for each inhabitant. There was another upward movement till 1899, then a decline to 1903. In 1905 another raise is noted, but it has declined since, and now the debt is $964,435,686, or $11.41 apiece. Closing the review of this portion of the statement, it may be said that no uneasiness need be entertained concerning the indebtedness. We owe most of it to ourselves.

We have other liabilities, however, besides the national debt. There are State, county, municipal, and school district debts, aggregating on June 30, 1905, the eminently respectable figure of $1,864,195,826. This, added to what the government owes, brings the total up to $35.49 per capita.

There is, perhaps, more satisfaction in noting our growth in wealth as a nation, though the figures on this account do not reach back so far. We incurred debts long before we took an account of stock or even faintly realized what our resources were. Not a good example, by the way, for the young financiers now at their lessons, but there is extenuation in the circumstances. It is estimated that in 1850 there were a few more than twenty-three millions of us, and that all of our property was worth $7,135,780,000, or $307.69 apiece. Notwithstanding the waste of the war, in the decade of 1860-70 the national wealth nearly doubled, rising from sixteen billions to thirty billions. In 1900 it was six times as great as in 1860, amounting to $1,235.86 for each man, woman, and child. The rapid increase continues. It will be noticed that six years ago we could pay off everything, clear the books from the national treasury down to and including the school houses, and still have $1200 apiece left, figuratively and collectively, if not individually and absolutely.

Is There a Postal Deficit?

The widespread popular impression that there is an enormous postal deficit, and that this deficit is caused by too low a rate for newspaper postage, is concisely set forth in the following communication:

Editor Argonaut:—In your article on "A Permanent Postal Tribunal," it seems to me that you wish to convey the idea that a great deal of shortage in handling second-class matter is caused by abuses from transporting department "truck," consisting of furniture, etc. As a matter of information, I would like to know what it costs the Government to handle newspaper publishers' business and the amount of loss it entails. I have been informed that the difference counts up to eighty millions—that is, it costs that much more than the Government receives for the business. If the rail transportation is $136.80 per mile for 5000 pounds per annum, it would be $410,400 for a distance of 3000 miles, and the Government would collect but a cent per pound, or $50 per day, or $18,250 per annum, showing a loss of $392,150 per annum. If that is the condition, is it right?

Following is a fair example how the publishers of Everybody's Magazine must be being benefited by this condition:

In the November number of Everybody's Magazine, the publishers state that their average monthly circulation is 600,000, and that the "ads." are bringing in $74,000 per month—to say nothing about the selling price of the magazine for $90,000—and that they are doing a most profitable business. The magazines weigh twenty-two ounces each, or 825,000 pounds, for the entire circulation; at the Government rate charged by the railroads and the collection of a cent a pound from the magazine owners, it seems there is a very large loss to the Government in assisting these publishers to conduct their business at the profits above mentioned.

Any information that you could give in this matter would be appreciated. Yours respectfully, George W. Hendry.

We would like to answer our correspondent's question: "What it costs the Government to handle the newspaper publishers' business and the amount of loss it entails," but nobody knows, and apparently the Postoffice Department the least of all. It is our belief that if there is a postal deficit—and we very much doubt whether such a deficit in reality exists—it is due to a variety of causes, and by no means can be ascribed to the newspapers alone.

We frequently see figures quoted even higher than those given by Mr. Hendry—figures saying that "the Government's loss on newspaper transportation amounts to eighty million dollars." Among those giving these figures are some of the advocates of one-cent letter postage, who make the following claim:

During the year 1904, there was of second-class matter 610,000,000 pounds, costing to mail 16 2-3 cents per pound, a total of $101,626,000; receipts from second-class matter being only $5,697,198, showing a loss to the Government from publishers' "subsidy" of $95,928,802.

This enormous sum is often given as the "subsidy" donated by the Government to the newspaper publishers. However, the Postoffice Department and the Government auditing experts generally usually estimate the "postal deficit" at $15,000,000 per year. Therefore we will assume that it is the smaller amount. Assistant Postmaster-General Madden estimates the cost of handling the mail at seven cents a pound—five cents for carriage, and two cents for collection, sorting, and delivery. Postal Expert Adams, of the Loud-Walcott inquiry, estimates the average net cost of carriage at from three to three and one-quarter cents per pound.

Under the franking privilege the Postoffice Department pays the expenses of carrying the mails of the Department of Agriculture, of the Treasury, of the Interior, of War, of the Navy, of State, of Commerce and Labor, and of Justice. Likewise, it carries free the mail matter of the Senate, of the House of Representatives, and of all their large force of attaches. Likewise, it carries through the mail all the documents and correspondence of the various departmental bureaus scattered throughout the country, including the Bureau of Chemistry, the Weather Bureau, the Bureau of Plant Industry, the Bureau of Animal Industry, the Bureau of Entomology, and the Bureau of Forestry. There are forty-five Government stations of agriculture in the various States, whose bulletins are continually passing through the mails free. Nearly seven hundred publications issued by the Agricultural Department passed free through the mails last year, including the Year Book, which alone, if paid for at book rates, would bring in twenty-eight cents per copy. There also pass through the mails free, paid for by the Postoffice Department, heavy cases of freight, including postal cards, postal supplies, typewriters, cancelling machines, printing presses, and even, as we said, office furniture, roll-top desks, chairs, and tables.

During the past month both the Republican and Democratic campaign committees have been mailing free from Washington many tons of campaign literature under Congressional franks.

The money-order system is a great convenience to the people, but it is conducted at a loss of two million dollars a year. The registry system is also a great convenience to the people, but it is also conducted at a heavy loss; the postoffice books are so curiously kept that the postoffice experts disagree as to the amount of this loss. The rural free delivery system is a great convenience to the people, but it is conducted at a loss of over fifteen millions of dollars a year, which is increasing yearly. And we will hint that carrying publications at one-cent per pound is also conducted at a loss, although if they were properly classified we do not see why this should be so. For there are many kinds of publications. The great metropolitan newspapers rarely circulate freely more than a hundred miles around the cities where they are published. Eighty miles is about the average limit. Yet it has been demonstrated that the United States Postoffice can carry them nearly three hundred miles for a cent a pound. The express companies would carry them this distance for half a cent a pound, but are too slow for the dailies. The great magazines use the express companies for their short hauls because they are cheaper than the mails. But on the long hauls of several thousand miles the great magazines use the mails at a cent a pound, because then the mails are cheaper than the express companies.

Last April, David J. Foster, speaking of the Postoffice Appropriation Bill, said in Congress:

The mail coming from the various government departments and carried free, when weighed, shows that in the year 1905 it cost the Postoffice more than $9,000,000. It is safe to say that it costs the Postoffice not less than $20,000,000 to carry free the mail of the legislative and executive departments of the Government.

It must not be forgotten that Congressman Foster is an expert on this matter of mail sent out by the legislative and executive departments. He goes on:

But I will be conservative, and say that the expense of carrying all the franked matter, including that of the Postoffice Department itself, amounts to $20,000,000, and then allow $5,000,000 for the Postoffice franked matter; there then remain $15,000,000, charged to the Postoffice Department now; this in no way belongs to it, and should be charged up to the other departments of the Government.

This statement, when made, was not controverted on the floor of the House, and no reply has been made to it by the Postoffice Department, by the Executive, or the Legislative Departments, or by any of the various departments or bureaus of the Government. Therefore, it may be considered as incontrovertible. It is apparent, therefore, that when the Postoffice Department announced a deficit for its last fiscal year of $14,600,000, there was not only no deficit at all, but that in reality it had a profit of $400,000, as it had done fifteen million dollars' worth of work gratis, which was justly chargeable to the other departments. In short, it would seem as if the Postoffice Department is the only one which does not cost the Government anything, that it is making money, and that its apparent deficit is caused by a faulty system of bookkeeping.

In this same speech Congressman Lloyd declared that when the mail matter was weighed to determine the rate of pay for railroad transportation, it was found that more than half of the mail matter consisted of "equipment"; that is, mail bags, heavy cords, cord fasteners, tags, locks, keys, and such things. Congressman Lloyd also averred that there were then in service 1,600,000 mail-bags and pouches, and that if they were all in use and the same amount of mail placed in each, there would be less than two pounds of mail in each mail sack. Furthermore, this equipment is charged for by the railroads on its return as "empties." It would be easy to calculate what transporting 1,600,000 mail-sacks and pouches costs, when carried thus on fast mail trains at the railroad rate to the Government as mail instead of freight. The sum is high up in the millions. But it does not seem to us that the money thrown away in this foolish procedure should be charged up in the Post-office bookkeeping as part of "the deficit caused by the transportation of newspapers at the second-class mail rates."

Our correspondent will remember that we did not in our article declare that the present second-class mail rate on newspapers is a just one, or that it is not abused, or that it should be continued without investigation. What we did declare for was the establishment of a permanent postal tribunal which should pass upon all these questions. As shown above, we do not believe that the popular impression regarding the existence of a gigantic postal deficit is correct; nor do we believe that if such a deficit exists it is justly chargeable to the second-class newspaper mail rate. But we agree with him in thinking that many publications abuse the privileges of the mails. The magazines of which he speaks are notable examples. The second-class privilege was granted to newspapers and periodicals by the act of March 3, 1879, which stated explicitly that such publications "must be originated and published for the dissemination of information of a public character, or devoted to literature, the sciences, arts, or some special industry, and having a legitimate list of subscribers; provided, however, that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to admit to the second-class rate regular publications, designed for advertising purposes."

There can be no question that of recent years this provision of the law has been abused. While the magazines which carry such enormous quantities of advertising may not consider themselves "publications designed for advertising purposes," they are quasi-advertising publications, for they subordinate their reading matter to their advertising. The advertising pages often exceed in number the reading pages. Congress never contemplated carrying at a cent a pound such tons of paper bearing advertisements when the law was passed "for the dissemination of literature, sciences, the arts, or some special industry." This abuse of the second-class privilege has gradually grown up in the publishing business. It is confined only to a few publications, it is true, but he many will now be made to suffer for the sins of the few.

There are many inequalities which the present law permits. For example, Harper & Brothers publish books; likewise, they publish a magazine. In the magazine they print advertisements of their books; this printed matter circulates through the mails at one cent a pound. Were it printed outside of the magazine, as booklets, it would cost to circulate it through the mails eight cents a pound. That is what it costs the publishers who have no magazines. It is only fair to add that Harper & Brothers are not peculiar in this practice, for it is followed by all publishers who possess magazines. It has even been suspected that the incomprehensible existence of some sickly magazines is due to the desire of their owners, who are publishers, to advertise their wares cheaply and circulate these advertisements at one-eighth the postage paid by those of their competitors who own no magazines.

The institution of such a tribunal as we advocate would tend to diminish and perhaps entirely remove these abuses. For that they are abuses no fair-minded man can deny, whether he be a publisher or not. The argument is made that it would not be possible to pay the large expenses of a modern magazine without the abnormal quantities of advertising such magazines carry. Yet this very argument proves that they are "publications designed for advertising purposes."

If a magazine can not live without going through the mails under false pretenses, then it had better die.

Our One-Man Charter.

When San Francisco's present charter was submitted to the electors some years ago, the Argonaut vigorously opposed it. In the minds of many worthy citizens this caused a condition akin to stupefaction. They came in person to protest. "Why," said they, "do you not see what manner of men constitute the free-holders? Have you not observed that among them is the Honorable Blank, Judge Thingummy, and Colonel Blow? Can you conceive of such men formulating a charter which would be other than a good one? And last, but most important, do you not see that the new charter is based upon the new idea of one man who is responsible? Hitherto, we have divided the responsibility. Under this proposed new charter we shall have centered the responsibility. The Mayor practically controls the whole outfit. The Mayor appoints most of the working officials of the city, and the Mayor is responsible for them all. Thus, it is impossible for us to have a bad government. Now, good Argonaut, can you explain to us why you oppose our new-fangled charter?"

We did. We explained repeatedly and at length. We stated that we did not believe in a one-man power in a republic. We said that while the scheme of the Honorable Blank and Judge Thingummy would work admirably under ideal conditions, that the ideal conditions probably did not exist in the United States, and certainly did not in San Francisco. With a one-man power, we maintained, even a good man might give a bad government, while a bad man certainly would. And we pointed out the significant fact that San Francisco had been governed for half a century under a charter which was based on checks and balances; on recognizing the infirmities of human nature; on admitting that many men need watching; that most of them are helped by it; that under the old Consolidation Act the responsibility was divided; it is true, but that each official was responsible to his master, the people; that under this same charter the city had done business for fifty years and had no debt; that in addition to doing business for half a century without a debt, it practically had done business without a defalcation. When we were informed that the reason the city had no debt was because it had acquired no new things for which to create debt, we replied that under the new one-man charter, San Francisco would speedily have a debt without acquiring any new things.

We regret that our prediction has come true. The difference is that under the old charter we had no new things and no new debts, and under the new charter we have plenty of new debts and no new things.

Our worthy burghers remained unconvinced by the Argonaut's argument. "You are too slow," they said. "You are not up to the times. The latest municipal idea is to place large powers in the hands of the Mayor, and then make him responsible. Thus you will get an ideal government." The deluded burghers did not seem to see that even a good mayor may be selfish, and even an honest mayor may be weak, either of which would partially wreck their ideal system of government, while a bad or dishonest mayor would totally wreck it.

The Argonaut is quite satisfied with its record on charters. We opposed the present charter because we were convinced that the one-man theory would prove a failure. It has proved an utter failure. It has practically collapsed. We would like to ask of the worthy citizens who so earnestly pressed the Argonaut to support their one-man charter some years ago, how they like the workings of a one-man power as exemplified in San Francisco now?

A Concrete Auditorium Example.

So nearly completed that a season of grand opera has opened this week in its auditorium—a theatre with a seating capacity of 5000, yet only one of the features of the great composite structure—Los Angeles announces the possession of the largest reinforced concrete building in the world. The Auditorium, as it has been named, is an imposing edifice outwardly and even more remarkable in purpose and inner arrangement. It has a frontage of 165 feet on Fifth street, and a depth ten feet greater. Its central portion, 40 by 60 feet, rises to a height of ten stories. There are two wings, 60 by 60 feet, seven stories high, and the connecting portions, covering the main floors of the structure, are three stories in height. Within are the audience hall first mentioned and two smaller halls, closely connected, of 1000 and 900 seating capacity respectively. A banquet-room capable of holding tables for 1000 guests, with kitchen, buffets, and other appurtenances, is a distinct feature. Six ground-floor rooms for stores and 150 offices take up the remaining space. The building is considered to be fireproof, as the woodwork in it is of the least possible proportions.

In the construction of the building the architect met and overcame many difficulties. Steel and cement were his materials, and they were handled with skill and daring. The roof trusses have a clear span of 112 feet, and weigh fifty tons each. In the theatre is a 26-foot cantilever balcony without obstructive supports. The dome is 68 feet above the theatre floor, and has a central skylight 30 feet in diameter, of stained glass. In perfection of appointments—stage and dressing-rooms, proscenium and mezzanine boxes, lighting and general seating facilities—the theatre is declared to be equal to the best in the country.

The needs of a church and congregation prompted the study of plans for such a building, and the realization of their wishes, that seemed at first beyond hope, is a triumph hardly to be measured. Although the structure was made possible by the organization of a stock company, it was a church affair strictly in the beginning and members of the Temple Baptist Church hold one-third of the stock. The Reverend Robert J. Burdette, well-known humorist, lecturer, and minister, is at the head of the church, and his wife, a woman of wealth and progressive spirit, furnished the first important contribution to the funds of the enterprise and has been an inspiring force in its development and culmination. On Sundays the main auditorium will be occupied by the church for regular services, and the adjoining audience-rooms, Berean and Choral Hall, will be used for Sunday School and association meetings. A grand pipe-organ is already in place in the auditorium.

Los Angeles regards the structure and its capabilities with just pride. It is one of the many presentments of material evidence that the municipality is the home of progress and public spirit. In many ways the people of that beautiful and striking city have proved their distinction, and that they will continue to show pride in their possessions, unflagging energy in adding to them, and enduring faith in a glorious future founded on their works is certain. They hope to be known as the city of great meetings, and look forward to the coming of large conventions, which they are now in a position to entertain with every comfort and facility.

San Francisco had no opera house of inviting appearance and adequate size, no convention hall of more than ordinary dimensions, before the disaster of last April. There is no promise in the immediate future of such an opera house or convention hall. The lack is more than a deprivation of artistic opportunity—it is a cumulative injury and material loss. There should be little need of appeal to pride of place or public spirit for the building of an auditorium of capacity and attractiveness. Such a building would be a sterling business investment.

In Los Angeles the stock of the new Auditorium is already above par. The building will pay good interest on its cost. There is no possibility that a larger opera house and convention hall would be a disastrous venture in a greater community.

There are still many wealthy men in the city now rising from its ashes, and among them there should be some who could well seize this opportunity to build an enduring monument and at the same time gain not only the applause of the multitude but a willing recompense. Street-car complications and labor difficulties have not diverted the attention of Los Angeles capitalists from pressing needs and profitable projects. Discordant issues of municipal life, greater or lesser, should not be allowed to clog the activities of the builders of the New San Francisco.

A Committee of Safety.

Recently a mass meeting was held in Union Square, San Francisco, called together by a committee of citizens who had met a week previous for the purpose of formulating measures for the clearing of the city of crooks, and for putting a stop to graft, municipal and otherwise. When the meeting convened it was evident that there were some dissonant elements. It was apparent that certain factions there present looked upon the meeting as levelled at them or their friends, and were determined to break up the meeting, or to seize it and shape it to their own ends. Therefore, a committee appointed by the original meeting hurriedly called the meeting to order, hurriedly read certain prepared resolutions, and adjourned with equal hurry. Thereupon, the opposing faction called another meeting. Its chief men were associated with or representative of the Administration and the labor unions. The meeting practically broke up in disorder. Hardly any speaker was permitted to end his remarks without interruption. But the labor men held possession of the meeting at the end.

For some days after the meeting there was considerable unrest in the camp of the labor unions. This finally shaped itself into resolutions denouncing the Committee of Safety; denouncing any attempt at "interfering with the municipal government"; and proffering aid to the municipal government from the labor unions in the shape of "five hundred men, physically strong and capable," and well armed, for the purpose of aiding in patrolling the city and in suppressing vice and crime.

After this move the party of the "Committee of Safety" either changed its tactics, or ceased to divulge them if they were not changed. It was then given out that the "Committee of Safety" had no ulterior object other than the purification of the city.

A few weeks ago we printed a narrative of certain events connected with and following the great Vigilante Committee of 1856. That was San Francisco's second experience with extra-legal government. It is not the fashion in San Francisco to admit that the Vigilance Committee of 1856 was other than supernaturally wise and good. But there are other sides to the Vigilante story, and one of them is told by General W. T. Sherman. Part of his narrative we reproduced three weeks ago.

Experience shows that when the reins of government are seized by mobs—or by any persons acting illegally or extra-legally—good rarely comes of it. It is of course possible that the men enrolled in the ranks of vigilance committees are always not only brave, but always honest, honorable, unselfish, and patriotic. It is of course possible that in the ranks of such illegal bodies there never are bad men. But it is not probable. In other communities on the Pacific Coast vigilance committees have been known—in Nevada, in Montana, in Idaho. The moment any such movement began there, the gamblers, crooks, thugs, and blacklegs made haste to enroll themselves in the ranks of the vigilance committee. As such organizations are secret, and as all the members are not known to each other during the process of enrolling, such criminal reinforcements were not easy to thwart. The result was in some of these communities there soon took place numerous executions by the vigilance committees, and frequently the honest men found themselves at the wrong end of the rope. In short, the thugs and crooks at once availed themselves of the opportunity so kindly furnished to them by the honest men to set aside the normal workings of the law; the crooks controlled at the sittings of Judge Lynch's court, and thus they rid themselves of honest men whom they feared.

We do not say that the Vigilance Committee of 1856 resembled in these respects the vigilance committees in Nevada, Montana, and Idaho. On the contrary, that committee was a very remarkable body, and was composed largely of honest and patriotic citizens. But no man can read the Vigilante narrative printed in the Argonaut without seeing the danger attendant upon the assumption of official functions by those not entrusted with such functions by the law.

To which it may be added that the San Francisco of 1906 differs very greatly, in more ways than one, from the San Francisco of 1856. Most of the Vigilantes of that day are dead, and the Vigilantes' sons, step-sons, foster-sons, and sons-in-law are not made of the same metal as their strenuous sires.

More Cubic Air for Hoboes.

San Francisco has an ordinance providing a minimum number of feet of cubic air for each occupant of a building. It would seem that this ordinance has been violated repeatedly of late. Owing to the destruction of the public buildings, the authorities have been forced to house criminals in comparatively restricted quarters. Inasmuch as the criminal element is unusually large in San Francisco, this has resulted in overcrowding. The authorities have not constructed or repaired any public buildings as yet—not even jails, of which they seem to have more urgent need than of anything else. Therefore the authorities are in danger of violating their own ordinances concerning cubic air. In order to prevent the present municipal government from violating any law, we would suggest that they turn out their hoboes, crooks, thugs, burglars, and other criminals not capital, set them to work in a chain-gang by day, and let them sleep in a stockade at night. The glorious winter climate of California is so mild that life in the open air is prescribed even for people far gone in consumption. It surely would not hurt robust hoboes. Furthermore, it would be easy to construct shelters inside the stockades which would keep off the rain which falls from Heaven on the unjust.

There are many miles of streets in San Francisco which are still encumbered with debris. It is an open question whose business it is to remove it. The property-owners hold that clearing their own lots is all that they should be asked to do, and that the city ought to clear the streets. But the city authorities claim that the debris fell from the buildings of the property-owners, and if the property-owners do not clear away the debris in front of their lots, the city will do so at their expense. It has adopted the somewhat wasteful plan of clearing the streets by throwing the debris onto the lots of the property owners. Thus, the material will have to be handled twice and paid for twice, for the city is assessing the charge for handling it to the property-owners, who subsequently will have to pay for a second handling when they clear their lots.

How simple it would be for the authorities to set their jail-birds to work in a chain-gang. Little impression has yet been made on the encumbered streets, but with a little enforced labor they could speedily be cleared. This plan would have the double merit of cleaning the streets of debris and of clearing the city of criminals. For we in San Francisco are now receiving more than our share. Criminals and crooks are now hastening hither from all over the country, partly for the advantages of a bland winter, and partly for the chances offered by a benevolent government. This benevolent government affords them every opportunity to steal and kill, and then punishes them mildly, if at all.

Across the Bay the Oakland authorities have concluded they have a surplus of criminals, and have started a chain-gang. As a result, all the criminals who are out of jail have hastened to San Francisco. A hobo was brought before a humorous police judge in Oakland and pleaded that he was in poor health, could not work, and hence had been obliged to take to stealing. The Judge remarked: "We will put you where you will be under the care of a good physician for six months.

Dr. Ewer, the City Physician, will prescribe for you." Dr. Ewer, the City Physician, immediately prescribed the rock pile for the hobo, hoping thus to build up his muscular system and overcome that tired feeling.

"Sir" and "Ma'am."

A question has arisen in Los Angeles concerning the proper form of address inculcated in the public schools. It seems that the children there are taught to say "Sir" and "Ma'am." Some of the parents consider this "provincial," and think that they should be taught to add the name of the person addressed. But the Los Angeles school teachers say that children can not remember the names of many people, and it would be impossible so to burden their memories.

Is the contention correct of those parents who think that "Sir" and "Ma'am" thus used is a provincial usage? There can be no doubt that this usage is found much more frequently in rural districts than in cities. It is certainly a very old usage. It is etiquette thus to address the King and Queen of England. It is not etiquette to address him as "Your Majesty," but simply "Sir." Among well-bred American men the habit of using "Sir" is not common except in addressing strangers, or possibly men of advanced age, or men for whom great veneration is entertained. Among equals the custom, in ordinary conversation, does not exist. We speak more particularly of city dwellers. There can be no question that the use of "Yes" and "No" without any supplementary title is somewhat curt, but there can be no question also that among the educated city dwellers of the United States the custom of using "Sir" and "Ma'am" has fallen into desuetude.

The Elections.

As the Argonaut goes to press (Wednesday morning) the returns of the elections are far from complete, but the result is in doubt only in details.

In New York Charles E. Hughes has been elected Governor by a majority of about 50,000. Mr. Hearst ran far behind his ticket but carried New York City and Brooklyn handily.

In Massachusetts, Governor Guild, Republican, was re-elected by an increased plurality over John B. Moran, the Democratic candidate.

Pennsylvania, in spite of division in the party, elected Edwin S. Stuart, Republican, for Governor, by a plurality approaching 100,000, over Lewis Emery, Jr., the fusion candidate.

Colorado has elected a complete Republican State ticket and a Republican legislature that will elect a successor to Senator Patterson, Democrat.

Washington, Utah, Nebraska, Wisconsin, Indiana and Connecticut are Republican as usual.

The Democrats have won in Idaho, Nevada, Minnesota, and Oklahoma, but there has been no marked uprising of the party anywhere.

Some apprehension had been felt concerning the political complexion of the next Congress, but it is asserted that the ante-election estimates of sanguine Democratic forecasters have been proved fallacious. There will be no remarkable accession of Democratic Congressmen.

In Illinois the Democrats have gained two congressmen, but Speaker Cannon is among those who triumphed over active opposition aided by forces from outside the districts.

California Returns.

James N. Gillett has been elected Governor of California by a good plurality. The Argonaut has never doubted for a moment since his nomination that he would be successful. He is able, honest, and energetic, and the people have honored themselves in their choice.

The Republican State ticket was elected without exception.

It is believed that the Congressional delegation from California will continue solidly Republican. The State Legislature is safely Republican, as usual.

In the city of San Francisco there were numerous surprises, and nearly all gratifying ones. Gillett was given a majority. Three judges were chosen who had the endorsement of the bar and the reform element of the people.

LETTERS TO THE EDITOR.

Redaction Oblige.

If people think that editing the Argonaut is a soft job, they would change their minds when looking over one of the letters we receive. Most of them we do not print because they expose our ignorance. Our readers can ask more complicated questions in a day than the wisest of men could answer in a month. However, they put us on our p's and q's, and make us careful of what we say. For if we make mistakes, our readers, though they seem to like us, also seem to like to trip us up and lay us by the heels.

A few weeks ago we printed a paragraph of twelve words, out of which the printer left two. We have been hearing from that paragraph ever since, and the latest note to hand is from the heart of Mexico. It is as follows:

Editor Argonaut:—On page 57 of the issue of the Argonaut September 8 is a passage stating "Mails now go in 10 days from Liverpool to Hongkong, crossing America." I regret that it did not allow of a more detailed itinerary of such mail routes. The shortest mail route that I can figure over that line would mean an average of something over fifty miles an hour in speed. So I'm stumped. How do they do it? The Argonaut is nearly always right about things, hence this inquiry.

Yours very truly,

A. H. Charles.

Oaxaca, Mexico.
Oct. 19, 1906.

After printing the above bit of misinformation we made honorable amends by printing all the facts concerning this trans-oceanic and transcontinental mail. This paragraph appeared in the Argonaut two weeks later. By this it was apparent that the misprinted paragraph in the Argonaut meant that the mails now go in ten days less from Liverpool to Hongkong.

We have now received another letter from Manitoba in which the writer holds us to an equally strict account. The Argonaut's reputation for accuracy is pleasant but not new. This subscriber says:

Griswold, Manitoba, Oct. 8, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—I notice in a recent issue of your valued paper that you refer to the Canadian firm of "Gordon Ironsides & Fares as large holders of Mexican lands." Knowing you are very particular, I venture to correct your spelling of the last name of that firm; it is not "Ferris," the correct spelling is Fares. For some years I have enjoyed your interesting paper. It never gets long in the wrapper when it arrives here.

Yours truly,

Alf. E. Hill.

Helene Dineon.

We have received the following letter, inspired by the article in a recent number signed "Pasquino," and entitled "A Midnight Supper":

"Pasquino." Dear Sir:—Your picturesque article in last week's Argonaut, "A Midnight Supper," so fascinated me that I want to tell you of a chance meeting I had with some of the people you mention. Perchance it may be of interest to you. A few days after the dreadful disaster of April 18th I was looking after an old lady and her daughter, friends of my family, anxious to see how they had fared. On entering their little apartment I noticed what looked like two bundles of women's apparel on opposite chairs. These proved, on closer approach, to be two human beings, but neither spoke and scarcely moved. My old friend presented—"This is Mme. von Steiglitz—This is Mme. Dineon." Madame Dineon was over eighty; she could not hear, and was too feeble to speak. The other bundle, "Madame von Steiglitz"—was—Helene Dineon! Poor Helene! Think of it! She was a helplessly paralytic from the waist down, an old, grey-haired woman. Only her saucy little nose and an occasional merry twinkle in her eyes remained to call to mind the once charming soubrette.

The two helpless women had been brought by some kind person in an express wagon to my dear friend's house, given such comforts as the little flat could offer. They are living, I believe, on a slight income left by papa Dineon. Helene's husband, a careless Austrian, a "man of excellent family"—comme toujours—forgot to provide for his actress wife. What an end for a pretty, piquant, clever little woman! I do not know what became of them after that dreadful April, and I only write you thinking this little interlude to your remembrance article might interest you.

Sincerely yours,

A. S. F.

The Argonaut by Dog-Sled.

We have before remarked on the interest shown in the Argonaut by readers who are in out-of-the-way corners of the world, such as the interior of China, of Siam, of Java, and in other places where the paper is not forwarded beyond the limits of the postal lines.

Here is a case in point in our own country—for Alaska, although non-contiguous, is a part of the United States. From this it will be seen that there is one Argonaut subscriber who is so anxious to receive his paper that he has it enclosed in an envelope and paid for at letter postage rates to entitle it to be hauled by dog-sled over the vast wastes of Alaska.

St. Michael, Alaska, October 14, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—Enclosed please find P. M. O. for $4.50 for which please send me the Argonaut for the six months commencing November 1st, 1906. Please send same in sealed envelope as first-class mail, thereby insuring safe delivery via dog team, during the winter. I got them all right that way during the winter of 1904-05.

Yours truly,

John Gebhardt.

The Argonaut on the Liners.

Chateau Frontenac,

Quebec, Canada, Oct. 29th, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—It has been quite a disappointment not to receive the Argonaut in Europe where I have been lately for some little time. I had requested my copy to be forwarded from home, but for some reason it was not sent. Now I am returning to my home (Newark, N. J.) and shall take much pleasure in opening the back numbers and "posting" myself on the news of the past three months.

Why can you not place some file copies of the Argonaut on the ocean steamers? I am sure it would be a popular move. Every one who reads the Argonaut wants the paper in the future.

Yours truly, Schuyler B. Jackson.

For One "At Sea."

In our mail the other morning there came a letter dated "At Sea." It enclosed a postoffice money order for $12.00, with three addresses to which the Argonaut was to be forwarded. Enclosed was an old bill of the year before, with the same addresses, showing that the writer had been in the habit of sending the Argonaut to the same persons in the past. The letter ran as follows:

On Board Steamship ———,

At Sea, Oct. 31st, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—Please continue sending the Argonaut for another year to the same addresses. Postoffice order for $12.00 enclosed.

The well beloved Argonaut is now the only connecting link between the late No. ——— Street (my former home and my treasures) and my present quarters, the Stewardess's room on the Steamship ———.

Even for the sake of saving money to get on my feet again, I can not do without my Argonaut; nor yet can I deprive my relatives of the pleasure they receive from the Argonauts I send them.

The grit and backbone the Argonaut has shown have greatly helped me, and no doubt many other readers who also came out of the quake and fire with nothing but what they stood in have been by it encouraged to make the best of things.

I beg to thank you for the knowledge (true and terse) and the pleasure the Argonaut has always given me.

May the Argonaut be more and more read, pondered over, and acted upon, is the prayer of

Yours always,

We know nothing about the circumstances of our subscriber, but from the tone of her letter it would seem as if she had been forced to do the work of a stewardess to gain her livelihood. She certainly could not have been in pecuniary straits before the disaster, for many rich people would hesitate before laying out twelve dollars in sending periodicals to relatives. In any event, it is a touching thing that a woman who leads so laborious a life—for if following the sea is a hard life for a man, what must it be for a woman?—should out of her hard-earned wages lay aside such a sum to send her favorite paper to distant relatives!

Advertising Our Conditions.

Deep River, Conn., Oct. 6, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—In the Argonaut of some weeks since was an article suggesting to the Promotion Association, Merchants' Association and other organizations of San Francisco, that they advertise the conditions of the city at the present time. In the Hartford Courant of the 4th inst. was an article following out the ideas suggested by the Argonaut. I have been here in Connecticut some four weeks, visiting friends in different sections of the State. I think that the ideas and suggestions in the Argonaut article will be of great benefit to San Francisco, judging from the many questions regarding insurance matters, expense of living, rents, wages, etc., asked by the people that I have met. It is difficult for the people of the East fully to understand or comprehend the magnitude of the task San Francisco has set for herself in rebuilding and reconstructing, and the urgent need of mechanics in all branches of labor. Therefore it seems to me that advertising in the manner suggested by the Argonaut can not prove other than extremely useful.

Yours truly,

From New Zealand.

Auckland, September 8, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—Please find postoffice order for the sum of £1 6s. 3d. in payment for my subscription to the "Argonaut" and "Munsey's Magazine."

I regret that the pressure of business during stock-taking period caused me to overlook forwarding this subscription. I am the more sorry because recent events in San Francisco have doubtless contributed not a little to your financial and other anxieties. I have been a regular subscriber for many years, and should be exceedingly sorry to miss my copies of your valuable paper.

Sincerely yours,

H. J. Edminston.

From Turkey.

Merziroum, Oct. 8, 1906.

Dear Sir:—I have had a good fortunate reading of your Weekly, named "The Argonaut," and desired to have some specimen copies for my friends.

Then Dear Sir:—

Please send me from that and after receiving them I will write to you being subscriber or not.

Yours truly,

A. Andonian.

Insurance Articles.

Seattle, Washington, October 24, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—Enclosed find check for one year's subscription to Argonaut. I have been buying the Argonaut for the past twelve years through newsdealers here, but lately they have been coming irregularly. Your insurance articles alone are worth ten times the price of subscription.

Yours truly,

Isaac Brown.

A Long-Time Reader.

San Francisco, Cal., Oct. 25, 1906.

Editor Argonaut:—Buying the Argonaut from the dealers has become uncertain, and therefore, you will find enclosed $4.00 for a year's subscription. I have read the Argonaut for about twenty-two years. First, it was mailed to me by a San Francisco friend to a New York town where I was living, then it was read by my people in New York and re-forwarded to me to Nebraska, then to Seattle and Portland, and finally, when I first came to San Francisco, a number of years ago, the Argonaut completed the circle and was re-mailed here, after being read first in San Francisco, and then in New York. At no time could I do without it, still less since the earthquake and fire, when the Argonaut put on tremendous vigor and has since kept up the pace.

Yours truly,

Ransom Pratt.

The Belle Fourche irrigation project, as it is known, will reclaim 90,000 acres of practically arid land lying north of the Black Hills, and $2,100,000 has been appropriated by Congress for the work. Contrary to the usual belief, the United States does not put up the money for these irrigation projects, thirteen of which are now under way, but the money comes from a fund which each State has to its credit in Washington, derived from the sale of public lands. The work, however, is under the direct supervision of the Government, but will become eventually the property of the water association, which will be composed of all the people holding land under the project. These irrigation projects, eventually, will cost nothing, either to the Government or to the State, because the yearly assessments paid for ten years by the people owning land under the project will meet the cost of the work and will be turned back to the credit of the State. The cost of putting through these irrigation schemes differs in different localities, but ranges from $20 and $30 an acre, with an average of about $25. It is estimated that the cost for the work being done here will be about $33 an acre; thus each settler will pay about $3.30 a year for ten years. At the end of five years he is given title to his land, though the payments go on for five years longer and constitute a lien upon his land. At the end of ten years the settlers under the scheme own the water and the State is reimbursed for the cost.

A clever business woman of Florence, S. D., has just been married. She was Miss Emma Sheppard, but a few days ago she became Mrs. W. P. Austin. The unique thing about her marriage was, and is, that she is the only woman in Florence, and that every single man in the town was her suitor. Florence was a boom town when Miss Sheppard, over in Iowa, heard that there was money waiting there for any woman who would go out there and start a boarding house. She had taken a course in domestic economy at Ames college and she decided to realize on it. Her dining room proved to be so attractive that the denizens of the boom town flocked thither. Then began an eager rivalry for her hand. W. P. Austin finally won the favor and the whole town was invited to the wedding.

The uproar raised in Italy because the contract for furnishing armor plate to the Italian navy was given to the Midvale Steel Company of Philadelphia, while the native iron works company at Terni was debarred, has determined the ministry of marine to abrogate the contract. This will also be done with a view to preventing litigation with the Krupps, who allege that the Midvale company copied their patents. Popular indignation has been appeased, as the work will now be given to a native firm, the supposition being that it will benefit home industries.

GERONIMO'S MEXICAN RAIDS.

The Apache Chief's Apology for His Crimes in the Light of Border History.

As a fighter who made good, in the old primitive heroic way, like an Ulysses or an Achilles—a classic Greek or old Roman in brown skin and eagle feathers—Geronimo the Apache will live in our history. He is a splendid possession, from the crown of his head to the tip of his toes.

Geronimo hated and fought both Mexicans and Americans with absolutely good reason.

Thus, the New York Mail. It is typical of a number of Eastern expressions that have been called forth by a recently-published autobiography of the old Apache chief. The following is also typical, not of twentieth century glorification of the Apache, but of the news columns of frontier papers during the years of Geronimo's early activity. It is from the Houston Telegraph of March 20, 1860:

The Indians killed ten persons, carried off some captive, and horribly abused others, especially two young ladies, whom, after abusing with all the brutality which Indians and white outlaws know so well how to practice, they stripped off their clothing and turned them loose to die of cold and hunger, or to fall again in the hands of the brutes who infest the country, or to be torn to pieces by savage beasts of prey.

Coincidentally with the sympathetic reception of Geronimo's memoirs, comes this Associated Press dispatch:

Washington, October 18.—Three Apache Indians, representing the 250 members of the Geronimo band held prisoners at Fort Sill, Oklahoma Territory, called on Secretary Taft and urged that they be allowed to take up lands in New Mexico and Arizona.

The dispatch does not say how the Government considered the petition of the Indians, and the relatives of hundreds of victims of Apache atrocities are also to be heard from. There is nothing in the annals of Indian warfare comparable to the history of the Apaches, under Geronimo's leadership, for wanton murder, unspeakable outrage, and savage horror generally. But terrible as were his bloody raids in the country to which he now asks to be allowed to return, they are minimized by his inhuman career in Mexico. "I was always glad to fight the Mexicans," he says, and adds:

I have killed many Mexicans; I do not know how many, for frequently I did not count them. Some of them were not worth counting. It has been a long time since then, but I have no love for the Mexicans. With me they were treacherous and malicious. I am old now and shall never go on the warpath again, but if I were young, and followed the warpath, it would lead to Old Mexico.

But the Mexicans of the border towns counted their dead, and the Governor of Sonora says that between 500 and 600 persons were assassinated by Geronimo's band in the Apache's last campaign.

Since the Texan war, until the surrender of the Apaches to General Miles, the Mexican frontier was constantly invaded by Indian tribes. The Comanches, Kiowas, Cheyennes, Arapahoes, and others penetrated into the country, marking their path with bloodshed, but it was the Apaches whose invasions were particularly ferocious and relentless. After the frontier had enjoyed a long period of peace, when the settlers were highly prosperous, and the pasture grounds were filled to overflowing with all kinds of cattle, it was one of the tribes composing the Apache nation who brought their allies, the Comanches, on a marauding expedition into Mexico—the first of a series of incursions that lasted without interruption for nearly half a century. The entire border line from Sonora to the Gulf of Mexico was the theatre of their crimes, and so persistently and ceaselessly did they harass the country that entire Mexican states were ruined. So widespread were the horrible butcheries by the Indians, and so extensive the robberies that a narrative of their incursions would fill volumes.

The experience of the sufferings of a single one of the districts in the State of Zacatecas is illustrative. In Marzapal there were 400 persons killed, wounded, and taken captive—a fact that must startle even those most familiar with the bloody history of the border. And Colonel Trevino, of Zacatecas, in one of his numerous engagements, recovered from the savages 8000 stolen horses. This was in 1857, a significant date, for Geronimo claims that the Apaches were at peace with the Mexicans at that time, and that the treacherous murder of his family in 1858 was the cause of his subsequent attacks. Of course, Zacatecas was not the scene of the Apaches' outrages, but the other states suffered as severely. The towns of Nuevo Leon lost more than 1000 souls, and their monetary losses were over $4,000,000. There were ninety-four Indian raids in one year in Coahuila, which was literally inundated by thousands of Comanches and Lipans, a tribe of the Apaches, now happily extinct. And the San Antonio Herald of March 24, 1859, says that the Comanches alone had in their possession in October, 1858, over 400 Mexican captives. The report of the mayor of a small town in Nuevo Leon to the Governor after an Indian foray, gives a pathetic and characteristic picture of the misery following an Indian foray:

The savages, to the number of about one hundred, have invaded this municipality, committing acts of the most horrid cruelty at the place called Penuelo, where they murdered all the inhabitants, consisting entirely of defenceless women and children, the men being all in the country tending their cattle. These lamentable occurrences have thrown this town into the greatest consternation. It would be difficult, excellent sir, to describe the fearful picture presented by the estate where the tragic event occurred. But we must pause in our grief to warn other communities, and to bury the dead. The innocent blood of more than two hundred victims is still reeking in the fields of Penuelo calling aloud for vengeance.

It is extremely improbable that the Mexicans entered into a peace agreement with the Apaches in 1858. Only a few years before that date a war of extermination was declared against them and the Comanches. The authorities were solemnly commanded by the general government to grant no peace or truce with the two tribes, and to wage a vigorous war to preserve the country from utter ruin and desolation. Taking into account the deserts, the hiding-places offered by the mountains, the agility and endurance of the Indians, and their peculiar cunning in their mode of warfare, rules were drawn up for the guidance of the military forces along the frontier. This decree was in force when the episode occurred that Geronimo pleads as an excuse for his ravages of late years.

The agricultural class of the Philippines, comprising probably over ninety per cent of the population, does not think deeply upon American control, says Hamilton Wright, in the World Today. They feel the results. We have done absolutely nothing to better the condition of the vast population engaged in agriculture or of the people as a whole. They are worse off than they were under Spanish rule. These people are simple, friendly, and very industrious for tropical workers. They are mainly interested in purely local affairs, in the village in which they live, their amusements, their family. They are of a common Malay stock and consequently, it may be added without disparagement to them, are totally ignorant as a class of the privileges or responsibilities of a republican form of government as we know it. They do not particularly care for independence, as the Anglo-Saxon mind conceives it, for it means nothing to them.

To the Democrats of New Jersey, who are seeking a candidate for United States Senator, the New York World suggests Grover Cleveland, saying: "Mr. Cleveland is by no means too old for the Senate. He is only 69. Senator Allison of Iowa is eight years older than Mr. Cleveland; so is Senator Cullom of Illinois, who will be re-elected in January for his fourth term. Senators Hale and Frye of Maine are older than Mr. Cleveland, one by a year and one by six years, while Senator Teller of Colorado is Mr. Cleveland's senior by seven years and Senator Proctor of Vermont by six years. These veterans are all active leaders in the Senate. Two former Presidents served in Congress after they left the White House, John Quincy Adams as a Representative and Andrew Johnson as a Senator, but no precedents are needed to justify the New Jersey Legislature in choosing Mr. Cleveland."

Hawthorn buds are known among English children as "bread and cheese," and are sometimes eaten by them. They have, however, poisonous qualities, due to the presence of calcium oxalate, and the other day a girl at Penrith died after eating some.

The State of Washington has joined the ranks of those who are striving, in the face of his defiant and invulnerable opposition, to make Mr. Roosevelt run again for the Presidency, remarks the Baltimore Sun.

HEARST ON HIS CONTEMPORARIES.

Villard, Bennett, Laffan and Pulitzer Assailed in the Closing Speeches of the Campaign.

All political campaigns in New York are notable for the vigor displayed by the newspapers of the metropolis. Not only in reporting the movements and speeches of the candidates, but in attempting to gather reliable advance information of the result of the elections, are the great dailies put to their greatest expense and most strenuous effort. The campaign that closed last Monday evening was one of the most remarkable that the New York press has ever seen, and the manner in which its exigencies have been met is unique in many particulars. Mr. Hearst's candidacy for the governorship was opposed by all the leading dailies, excepting only Mr. Hearst's own publications, but there was no little variety in the position. Among the great dailies the World alone printed Mr. Hearst's speeches with little effort, abbreviate or to soften his most sensational utterances. As an example, the following extracts are given from Mr. Hearst's speech attacking the prominent newspaper editors and owners, and in which Mr. Pulitzer, the owner of the World, is most bitterly assailed. The World printed the speech in full, calmly and without comment.

You are deserted and betrayed by the public officers. I should sustain you, and by the so-called free press that should support you.

You know the character of men that own the newspapers New York. You know that Villard, the editor of the Post, sued by his own sister, who alleged that he had tried to rob of her share in her father's estate.

You know that Bennett, the editor of the Herald, has been indicted by the United States Grand Jury for obscene and indecent advertisements in his papers and sent them through the mails and into the homes of American citizens.

You know that Laffan, of the Sun, is the mortgaged man of Morgan, and that the tame Ochs, of the Times, is indebted to the Traction Trust and the life insurance companies even for building that he prints his paper in.

You know that Pulitzer, of the World, has his money invested in coal stocks and in the Vanderbilt roads that I have attacked and follows the tips of Wall Street speculators more than he does the interests of the people.

Instead of helping the people in this emergency, this traitorous sheet, the World, gloats over this situation and lies about it.

Mr. Hearst described his gift of his yacht to the United States Government during the Spanish War, and said the World declared that the vessel was seized smuggling:

These personal matters are of no importance, however. The only thing for you to consider is the untrustworthiness of news sources and the treachery of these papers that betray American principles under which they have prospered.

When Mr. Pulitzer was building up his paper he had principles, or at least he professed principles. When he was appealing for the pennies of the people he proclaimed himself the champion of the people.

When he came from abroad, a penniless immigrant, and landed on these shores he approved, or pretended to approve, American liberty.

When he slept on the benches in the park and then rose to a waiter and coachman, he appreciated the advantages of American equality.

When he went into politics and became at once Police Commissioner and champagne agent, and blackmailed his goods in questionable resorts, he understood and exercised a good measure of American opportunity.

When he was court-martialed in the army and indicted for attempted murder in St. Louis, he experienced some part of American justice.

When he first came to New York, when he had no money to invest in Wall Street, when his only chance of profit or preferment lay in the support of the people from whom he came, he did spell the word people "peepul" or call their cause anarchic.

In his old age, when he has amassed his fortune and has invested in gas stocks, and railroad stocks, and other Wall Street securities, when the pennies of the poor seem small and the faith of financiers looms large, he repudiates the principle that made him and betrays the people that supported him.

False to his principles, false to his own people, he fawns up and truckles to a class that uses him while it despises him. His career is the career of a coward, traitor, and sycophant.

It is doubtful if the attitude of personal enmity toward Mr. Hearst, assumed by nearly all his contemporaries, and the studied misrepresentation of the striking features of his campaign, affected the result materially. There is little doubt that Hearst's papers have inflicted more wounds than the combined forces against him.

For the first time in two hundred years New Orleans will open a system of underground sewers. Hitherto the city sewage has been run off through surface drains some covered, more uncovered.

THE PATH OF AN INTERVIEWER.

Cosmopolitan Virtues and Gifts of Versatility Along Its Course.

The newspapers of Boston are not the same as those of New York; there is a greater difference between those of Chicago and New Orleans; and what is a "first-class story" in Philadelphia would be moved farther back in San Francisco to make room for another sort of sensation suited to the peculiar taste of its readers. But the subtle distinctions do not perplex the resourceful newspaper reporter. He comes from the Atlantic to the Pacific Coast and in a week his "stuff" is true to the paper that has engaged him. He goes to the East from what is called the "unconventional" West, and in a month his work is in no wise to be distinguished from that of men who have begun and continued in the service of New York dailies. For proof, an important newspaper may be considered. In five years it probably has had scores of reporters, may have had two or three different city editors, and perhaps as many managing editors, yet the tone of the paper from page to last is unchanged. In fact, that distinct, individual flavor often persists in spite of efforts to change it. It would be easy to name a score of papers in the country that are identical in dominating characteristics and tone with their issues of earlier years, in spite of the fact that their owners and the entire staff have changed more than once.

The true cosmopolitan is the newspaper reporter. It is easy enough to appear content in any quarter of the globe, and in Rome to live as the Romans do, but the reporter does more. He is Norwegian and Italian, Arabian and palace-wise, Republican and Democrat, and times each day, and the narrow provincialism of the metropolis is as much his as the freedom and the long perspective of the mining camp. It is versatility, more than temperament, that distinguishes him. A citizen of the world, with a nose for news, a supernatural ingenuity in obtaining it, a pretty knack of deduction, and the ability to be always in the mood for what might make an average reporter. The good reporter who becomes editors have additional faculties, not cultivated, but indigenous. The study of one reporter's career will furnish illustrations.

Edmond Lamont, in recent years the editor of the New York Evening Post, and last July made the editorial head of its able and dignified weekly issue, the Saturday Review, has passed over the full course. He is a Harvardsman and was a classmate of Clyde Fitch, the playwright. While in college he was for a time the tutor of John Jacob Astor. Newspaper work attracted him, and when he finished at Harvard he went to Albany and began as a reporter on one of the daily papers of New York's capital city. A year or so after he had an attack of Western fever and found himself one morning in Tacoma.

It was in 1890, when all the towns of the Sound country were prosperous, and Tacoma was struggling for recognition as the leader among them. Seattle had been humiliated down the year before, but it was growing up, and, seemingly, all the more rapidly because of the disaster. Lamont soon decided that Seattle had the best of the race for supremacy and transferred his allegiance. He joined the city editor's staff of the Post-Intelligencer in August, when the largest dry goods store of the town was still occupying a tent, waiting for a new building which would give it a bigger and more home than it had before the fire, and all the life of the town was temporary, but promising for the future.

The newspaper industry of Seattle at that time demanded more than a line in passing. There were perhaps thirty thousand people in the town, and of these one-third had come within a year, and without intention to remain, but there were five daily papers and the Post-Intelligencer—or P.-I., as it is more familiarly known—the oldest and best equipped, with a circulation of nearly 50,000, for it covered a large field in the northwest corner of the United States. Five reporters for the three morning papers scoured the town for news from noon till midnight, and smaller but no less active band of item-hunters for evening issues began at daylight and worked till the sun set in the afternoon.

Among these news gatherers Lamont easily found a place for himself and work in abundance. In some ways he was better fitted to obtain "exclusive" stories than his contemporaries. His address was easy and unassuming, and newcomer from Alaskan fur fields and obedient visitor from London or Berlin were alike to him. His interviews were "features," but when a house burned at midnight or a big police story told another man for late watch at headquarters, his readiness was as apparent as his facility in description when he came in from a detail. He was popular with his fellow-workers, though it was known that he was a college man, and with the exception of a single occasion when before his startled associates he appeared in the glory of what the water-front man called "a steel-pen coat and U-shaped vest," a costume regarded by all with more of awe than admiration, he at all times earned their fraternal consideration.

His evident familiarity with the conventions of society brought him at least one embarrassing assignment. Late one night came the news by wire that an ex-treasurer of Seattle had been drowned at Anacortes, having fallen from the gang-plank of a steamer up-Sound. Immediately the city editor of the P.-I., a master of all the intricacies of newspaper work, called in from the reporters' room three men to gather the details of the late official's career. One was told to get his political record, another to discover the history of a charge of misappropriation of funds that had been hanging over his head for years, and Lamont was instructed to carry the news to the family, as yet unaware of their bereavement, and to ask for biographical facts. The three-column story next morning was a "beat" for the P.-I., and Lamont's part in it was not the least important, even if it did not have the greatest share of space.

Perhaps it was in Albany that Lamont took his first observations of political fine work, but his experience in Seattle added to his understanding. In the winter of 1890-91 came the campaign of Senator Squire for reelection. His political manager was Sheriff McGraw, afterward Governor of the State, and the fight was an interesting one. Squire was a Seattle man—his greatest property interests were at Snoqualmie, a few miles north of Seattle—and his opponent, Calkins, was endorsed by Seattle's rival, Tacoma. The strength of the two candidates in the Legislature was nearly equal. Neither was confident, but Squire's manager was straining every political line to return the incumbent to Washington for another term. Seattle and Tacoma partisans aligned themselves under Squire or Calkins banners for the honor of their towns. Lamont suddenly disappeared in the last week of the campaign, and for several days his desk was unoccupied. He reappeared as suddenly, and when the result of his absence was published, his adventure was quietly described. Governor Ferry, of Washington, was spending a vacation at Santa Barbara, California, either as an aid to health or an avoidance of political difficulties at home, and to him Lamont had gone, and with the practiced art of the adroit interviewer, had gained an unequivocal, if reluctant, endorsement of Senator Squire's claims for reelection. Senator Squire was re-elected, and to City Editor Parry of the P.-I., and to Reporter Lamont, no little credit for that consummation is due.

For about two years Lamont remained in Seattle, gaining steadily in reputation and in influence. When he returned to the East it was to accept the offered chair of Professor of English in Brown University. Then again the call of the press—hardly to be resisted, once the inky virus is in the blood. After several years he was offered the editorship of the New York Evening Post, a position long filled by William Cullen Bryant, and after him by Garrison. Now, Lamont is editor of the Nation, and faithful to the inclination and ideals that have governed his career from the first. He knows the whole story of the making of a newspaper, and by practical experience in all of its fascinating, yet exacting details. He has been in California more than once since his Seattle sojourn, and has lectured before the students of the State University. A volume on English composition, the fruit of his leisure hours, has lately come from the publishers.

It is apparent that this is not exactly a year for reforms, says the Boston Traveler. La Follette was beaten decisively in Wisconsin, Mayor Weaver met the same fate in Philadelphia and Churchill really won nothing but self-advertising in the New Hampshire fight.

The police of Vienna carry small portable telephone appliances, which they can affix to specially constructed boxes along their beats, and so communicate with the central police station.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Secretary Metcalf is in San Francisco for the purpose of investigating the complaints of Japanese residents that their children are excluded from the public schools.

W. J. Bryan insisted in his last campaign address that Secretary Taft's speech at Omaha was a defense of the trusts and an apology for them more than a denunciation of them, saying that the only warmth the Secretary manifested was when he insisted that they should be regulated rather than destroyed.

Speaker Cannon indulged in some characteristic animadversions on the Hearst candidacy while in New York. "Was Hearst ever in Congress?" he is quoted as repeating in answer to a question: "I'll be d—d if I ever saw much of him." The Speaker was asked what he thought of the Hearst platform and repeated what he once said of a Bryan national platform: "Hearst's platform," he said, "reminds me of a woman's mother Hubbard. It covers everything and hides nothing."

United States Senator Isidor Raynor, of Maryland, made a speech at Baltimore last week in which he said that the bill prohibiting corporations from contributing to Federal elections was not favored by the President or the Republican party, and concluded with this declaration: "The bill would have been a great blessing to the country, and I am anxious to see, at the next session of Congress, whether, as Speaker Cannon calls it, that body will be in a sufficient judicial frame of mind to pass this enactment."

One of the pertinent paragraphs in Richard Watson Gilder's letter attacking Hearst, the letter that called out Brisbane's editorial saying Gilder was a mouse, is as follows: "The victims of yellow journalism are many; the distress to individuals, the injured lives and the debasing effect upon those who run its disreputable errands—all this is well known. Mrs. Edith Wharton cut to the heart of the matter when she said that to write for the yellowest of journals in order to influence the masses for good was like visiting the poor and afflicted in clothes infected with smallpox."

Edward H. Clark, attorney of the Hearst estate and until recently president of the Morning Journal Publishing Association, made answer in New York last week to the questions asked by the State Republican Committee, concerning the charge that W. R. Hearst was the employer of Chinese in California. Mr. Clark said that "the Hearst estate is wholly and absolutely the property of Mrs. Phoebe A. Hearst. The entire amount of Senator George Hearst's property was left to his widow. W. R. Hearst has not and never has had the slightest interest in the Hearst estate. He has never had the slightest part, directly or indirectly, in the management of the Hearst estate."

The advancement of Mr. Cortelyou to the head of the Treasury Department is not pleasing to the New York World. It says: "It was Cortelyou upon whose assurances Mr. Roosevelt relied when he denied with heat the true statement of Judge Parker in 1904 that corporations had bought with campaign contributions the valuable gratitude of the Republican National Committee. It was Cortelyou who accepted the money stolen from insurance companies and given to him to establish, in Platt's cynical phrase, a 'moral obligation' upon the dominant party. Cortelyou should not be in the Cabinet. He should not be in public life at all. To make him Secretary of the Treasury will be a needless affront to the American people."

Now that William H. Taft, Secretary of War, has declined an appointment as Associate Justice of the Supreme Court of the United States, it may be set down for a fact beyond contradiction that he is on the list of Presidential possibilities, and there to stay, declares the Washington correspondent of the Portland Oregonian. In some quarters it was believed that Mr. Taft would relinquish all hope of the Presidency in order to take the vacancy on the bench left by the retirement of Justice Brown. But those who knew him were well aware that he would not seriously entertain such a proposition. If Mr. Taft had been offered the place of Chief Justice of the Supreme Court he might have accepted, but the present Chief Justice shows no signs of retiring.

Discussing the changes in the President's Cabinet, the Philadelphia Ledger deprecates the change in the head of the Postal Department, which certainly requires for its proper supervision the intimate knowledge to be gained only by long acquaintance. And, continuing, remarks: "Whatever qualifications Mr. Cortelyou may possess for his present office, there is no evidence that he has the experience or the equipment for the Treasury portfolio to which he is to be transferred. In the case of the Navy also, the retirement of Mr. Bonaparte, however well fitted he may be for the Attorney Generalship, will interrupt the excellent service he is giving where he is. And the transfer of Mr. Metcalf to the Navy Department from that of Commerce and Labor affords no guarantee that the country will be the gainer."

THE DEVIL'S REVENGE.

A Tragedy in Which Satan Played the Leading Role.

It was toward the end of November; the Imperial Garden of Vienna was deserted; a sharp breeze was whirling the saffron-colored leaves, shrunk up by the early cold; the rose-bushes, tormented and broken by the wind, let their branches drag in the mud. Still, the grand alley, thanks to its covering of sand, was dry and passable. Although devastated by the approach of winter, the Imperial Garden was not without a certain melancholy charm. The long alley prolonged far away its reddening arcades; beyond, the view stretched over the Prater and Danube; it was such a promenade as a poet would have desired.

A young man was striding up and down this alley with visible signs of impatience; his costume, somewhat theatrical in its elegance, consisted of a frock-coat of black velvet, with gold facings, and bordered with fur, gray woolen pantaloons, top-boots, with tassels, coming half way up his legs. He might have been twenty-seven or twenty-eight years of age; his pale and regular features were full of finesse, and irony lurked in the creases around his eyes and the corners of his mouth. At the university, which he appeared to have quitted recently, for he still wore the student's cap with oak leaves, he must have plagued the Philistines and shone in the front ranks of the burschen and the foxes.

The narrow limits within which he circumscribed his walk showed that he was waiting for some one—probably a lady, for the Imperial Garden of Vienna in the month of November is hardly propitious to business rendezvous. Soon a young girl appeared at the end of the avenue. A turban of black silk covered her rich blonde hair, whose ringlets had been slightly uncurled by the dampness of the evening; her complexion, ordinarily of waxen whiteness, had taken a rosy tint from the bite of the cold. Veiled and wrapped, she was in a mantle trimmed with marten skin. A little terrier accompanied her—a convenient chaperon, on whose indulgence and discretion you could count.

"Imagine, Heinrich," said the pretty Viennese, taking the young man's arm, "I have been dressed and ready to go out for more than an hour, and my aunt kept on with her sermons on the dangers of waltzing, on recipes for Christmas cakes and carp with blue sauce. I went out on the pretext of buying some gray boots, of which I have no need whatever. It is for you, Heinrich, that I tell all these little lies, which I am constantly regretting and constantly beginning over again. What an idea it was of yours to take to the stage! What was the good of studying theology so long at Heidelberg? My parents liked you, and we might have been married to-day but for that. Instead of meeting on the sly under the bare trees of the Imperial Garden, we should be seated side by side before a fine porcelain stove in a nice, warm room, talking of the future of our children. Would not that be a happy lot, Heinrich?"

"Yes, Katy, very happy," replied the young man, as he pressed under the satin and fur the dimpled arm of the Viennese, "but I can not help it. The theatre attracts me invincibly. I dream of it by day; I think of it by night; I feel the desire to live in the creation of the poets; I seem to have twenty existences. Every role that I play makes me a new life; all those passions that I express I feel. I am Hamlet, Othello, Charles Moor. When one is all that, he can with difficulty resign himself to the humble condition of a village pastor."

"That is very noble. But you know that my parents will never have an actor for a son-in-law."

"No, certainly, not an obscure actor; a poor, ambulant artist; a puppet of managers and the public. But a great actor, covered with glory and applause, who earns more money than a minister, they will not refuse, however scrupulous they may be. When I shall come to ask your hand in a handsome yellow coach, the varnish of which will be able to serve as a looking-glass for the astonished neighbors, and a tall lackey covered with gold lace will let down the steps for me, do you think they will refuse me?"

"I do not think they will. But who says, Heinrich, that you will ever come to that? You have talent, but talent is not sufficient; you must have much good luck besides. By the time that you shall have become the grand actor of whom you speak the best time of your youth will have passed, and then will you be ready to marry Katy, grown old, when you have at your disposal the loves of all those princesses of the theatre, who are so joyous and so gaily decked?"

"That future," replied Heinrich, "is nearer than you think. I have an advantageous engagement at the theatre of the Corinthian Gate, and the manager is so satisfied with the manner in which I played my last role that he has made me a present of two thousand thalers."

"Yes," replied the young girl, with a serious air, "that role of a demon in the new piece. I confess to you, Heinrich, that I do not like to see a Christian assume the mask of the enemy of the human race, and pronounce words of blasphemy. The other day I went to see you at the Corinthian Theatre, and at every moment I was afraid that a veritable hell-fire would issue from one of the traps where you were swallowed up in flames of spirits of wine. I returned home all confused, and I dreamed horrible dreams."

"My good Katy, that is all imagination; to-morrow, too, will take place the last performance, and I shall no longer put on the black and red costume which so much displeases you."

"So much the better; for my mind is a prey to a vague feeling of alarm, and I fear that the role which has been so profitable to your glory will not be profitable to your salvation. I am afraid, too, that you will contract bad habits in the company of those horrible comedians. I am sure that you no longer say your prayers; and I dare wager that you have lost the little cross that I gave you."

Heinrich justified himself by showing the little cross, which was still shining on his breast.

While they were talking thus, the two lovers had arrived at the Thabor Strasse, in the Leopoldstadt, in front of the shoemaker who was famous for the perfection of his gray boots. After chatting some time at the door, Katy entered, followed by her terrier, but not without having abandoned her pretty, slender fingers to the pressure of Heinrich's hand.

Heinrich tried once more to get a glimpse of his mistress between the dainty boots and shoes that were symmetrically arranged on the brass rods in the window, but the fog had silvered the glass with its moist breath, and he could only distinguish a confused silhouette; then, taking a heroic resolution, he turned on his heel and went, with deliberate step, to the inn of the Two-Headed Eagle.

That night there was a numerous company at the Two-Headed Eagle; the guests were of the most mixed description. The Two-Headed Eagle was one of those blessed cellars celebrated by Hoffman, with steps so worn, so greasy, so slippery, that you can not put your foot upon the first one without at once finding yourself at the bottom, with your elbows on a table, a pipe in your mouth, between a pot of beer and a measure of new wine.

Everybody was eating and drinking; the drink consisted of strong beer and a mixture of new red wine with old white wine; the food, of slices of cold veal, ham, or pastry.

Heinrich went to the end of the cellar, and sat at a table where were already seated three or four persons of joyous mien and merry humor.

"Ah, Heinrich!" cried the eldest of the band; "mind yourself, my friends; foenum habet in cornu. You know you had a truly diabolical look the other night; you almost frightened me. Who would think that Heinrich, who drinks beer as we do, could put on such venomous, wicked, and sardonic airs, and that with a single gesture he could make a whole theatre shudder?"

"Eh! Why that is the reason Heinrich is a great artist, a sublime comedian. There is no glory in playing a role that is in your character; the triumph, for a coquette, is to excel in playing ingenuities."

Heinrich sat down modestly, called for a large glass of mixed wine, and the conversation continued on the same subject. On all sides it was admiration and compliments.

"Ah! if the great Wolfgang Goethe had seen you!" said one.

"Show us your feet," said another. "I am sure you have a cloven hoof."

One man only, seated at a neighboring table, seemed to take no part in the general enthusiasm; his head thrown backward he was thrumming distractedly with his fingers on the crown of his hat a military march, and from time to time he uttered a sort of humph, singularly dubious.

The aspect of this man was of the strangest, although he was dressed like an honest burgher of Vienna, enjoying a modest fortune; his gray eyes were shaded with green tints, and shot out phosphoric lights like the eyes of a cat. When his pale, flat lips parted, they showed two rows of teeth, very white, very sharp, and very wide apart, of the most cannibal and ferocious aspect; his long nails, shining and curved, took a vague appearance of claws; but that physiognomy appeared only by rapid flashes; to the eye that watched him fixedly his face rapidly resumed the bourgeois and debonaire appearance of a retired Viennese merchant, and you felt astonished that you could have suspected of villainy and devilry a face so vulgar and trivial.

Altmayer, the youngest member of the company, the warmest admirer of Heinrich, could not endure this coldness, and addressing the strange man as if taking him to bear witness to an assertion that he advanced, he said:

"Is it not so, sir, no actor has ever played the role of Mephistopheles better than my comrade here?"

"Humph!" said the stranger, flashing his green eyes and cracking his sharp teeth. "Mr. Heinrich is a young man of talent, whom I esteem very highly; but he wanting in many things necessary to play the role of devil."

And suddenly drawing himself up: "Have you ever seen the devil, Mr. Heinrich?"

He put this question in such a strange and mocking tone that all the company felt a shudder run down their backs.

"That, however, would be necessary for the truthfulness of your play. The other evening I was at the theatre of the Corinthian Gate and I was not satisfied with your laugh; it was, at the utmost, a sly laugh. My dear Mr. Heinrich, this is the way you ought to laugh."

And thereupon, as if to give him the example, he burst into a laugh so sharp, so strident, so sardonic, that the orchestra and the dancers stopped at that instant, and the glass in the windows trembled. The stranger continued this pitiless and convulsive laugh several minutes and Heinrich and his companions, spite of their terror, could not help imitating it.

When Heinrich had recovered himself, the vault of the tavern were repeating, like a feeble echo, the notes of that broken and terrible laugh, and the stranger was no longer there.

* * * * *

Some days after this strange incident, which he almost forgotten, or which he remembered only as a joke of an ironical burgher, Heinrich was playing part of the demon in the new piece. On the first of seats in the orchestra was seated the stranger of the tavern, and at every word pronounced he shook his head, winked his eyes, smacked his tongue against his palate, and showed signs of the liveliest impatience.

"Bad, bad!" he murmured to himself.

At the end of the first act the stranger rose, as he had taken a sudden resolution, strode over the big drums, the cymbals, and trombone, and disappeared through the little door that leads from the orchestra to the stage. Heinrich, waiting till the curtain rose, was walking up and down in the wings, and when he came to the end of his short promenade, what was his terror to see him turned, standing in the middle of the narrow corridor, a mysterious personage clothed exactly as he was, and looking at him with eyes whose greenish transparency had a strange profundity in the darkness; the wide, sharp, wide-set teeth gave something ferocious to his sardonic smile.

Heinrich could not fail to recognize the stranger whom he had seen at the Two-Headed Eagle, or rather the devil in person, for it was he.

"Ah, ah, my young friend! you wish to play the devil? You were very middling in the first act, and you would decidedly give a very poor opinion of the citizens of Vienna. You will allow me to repeat this evening; and, as you might interfere without I will send you to the cellar, below the stage."

Heinrich recognized the Prince of Darkness and himself lost. Putting his hand mechanically to the cross that Katy had given him, he tried to call for help and to murmur his formula of exorcism; but he choked him; he could only utter a feeble rattle. The devil seized Heinrich with his hooked hands by the shoulders, and pushed him by main force through the floor; then he entered upon the scene when his came, like a perfect actor.

His incisive, biting, venomous, and truly diabolical acting at first surprised the spectators. What especially produced a great effect was that sharp titter like the grating of a saw, that laugh of the damned blaspheming the joys of Paradise. Never had an actor attained the power of sarcasm, such a depth of villainy; the audience laughed, but they trembled. All the audience was panting with emotion; phosphoric sparks glinted on the fingers of the terrible actor; trains of sparkling sparks ran from his feet; the light of the lustres grew paler; footlights shot out reddish and greenish flashes; a sulphurous smell reigned in the theatre; the spectators were, as it were, delirious, and thunders of frantic applause greeted each phrase of the marvelous Mephistopheles, who often substituted verses of his own invention for the verses of the poet, and the substitution was always happy and accepted with transports.

Katy, who was in the theatre, was in a state of extraordinary alarm; she did not recognize her dear Heinrich; she presaged some misfortune with that spirit of divination which love gives.

The performance ended amidst indescribable enthusiasm. When the curtain fell the public called for Mephistopheles with loud cries. He was sought in vain; but at last a scene-shifter came and told the manager that Heinrich had been found in the cellar, where he had probably fallen through a trap.

The hapless actor was taken up. His clothing was burned in places, and on his shoulders were deep scratches. They spoke to him, but he did not answer.

OLD FAVORITES.

[Editorial mention was made in the Argonaut for October 13 of some favorite poems, a dozen or more in number, and following the comment on their qualities many requests have come for a reprinting of the verse in full. Of those mentioned, Stedman's "John Brown of Osawatimic," was republished in the Argonaut for September 8; Andrew Lang's "Invocation to Homer," in the issue for November 3. Following are nearly all those noted in the editorial referred to.]

The Sonnet.

What is a sonnet? 'Tis the pearly shell
That murmurs of the far-off murmuring sea;
A precious jewel carved most curiously;
It is a little picture painted well.
What is a sonnet? 'Tis the tear that fell
From a great poet's hidden ecstasy;
A two-edged sword, a star, a song—ah me!
Sometimes a heavy-tolling funeral bell.
This was the flame that shook with Dante's breath,
The solemn organ whereon Milton played,
And the clear glass where Shakespeare's shadow falls;
A sea this is—beware who ventureth!
For like a ford the narrow floor is laid
Mid-ocean deep to the sheer mountain walls.
—Richard Watson Gilder.

Ariel's Song.

Full fathom five thy father lies;
Of his bones are coral made;
Those are pearls that were his eyes;
Nothing of him that doth fade,
But doth suffer a sea-change
Into something rich and strange.
Sea-nymphs hourly ring his knell;
Hark! now I heard them—ding-dong, bell.
—William Shakespeare, "The Tempest," Act I.

An Epitaph on the Admirable Dramatic Poet, W. Shakespeare.

What need my Shakespeare for his honour'd bones,
The labor of an age in piled stones;
Or that his hallow'd reliques should be hid
Under a star-pyointed pyramid?
Dear son of memory, great heir of fame,
What need'st thou such dull witness of thy name?
Thou, in our wonder and astonishment,
Hast built thyself a lasting monument;
For whilst, to the shame of slow-endavouring
art,
Thy easy numbers flow; and that each part hath, from the leaves of thy unvalued book,
Those Delphic lines with deep impression took;
Then thou, our fancy of herself bereaving,
Dost make us marble with too much conceiving;
And, so sepulchred, in such pomp dost lie,
That kings for such a tomb would wish to die.
—John Milton.

On the Late Massacre in Piedmont.

Avenge, O Lord, thy slaughter'd saints whose bones
Lie scattered on the Alpine mountains cold;
Even them who kept thy truth so pure of old
When all our fathers worshipt stocks and stones.
Forget not: In thy book record their groans
Who were thy sheep, and in their ancient fold
Blain by the bloody Piedmontese, that roll'd Mother with infant down the rocks. Their moans
The vales redoubled to the hills, and they to Heaven. Their martyr'd blood and ashes sow
O'er all the Italian fields, where still doth sway
The triple tyrant, that from these may grow
A hundred-fold, who, having learnt Thy way,
Early may fly the Babylonian woe.
—John Milton.

Epitaph on the Countess of Pembroke.

Underneath this sable hearse
Lies the subject of all verse,
Sidney's sister, Pembroke's mother;
Death! ere thou hast slain another,
Learn'd and fair and good as she,
Time shall throw a dart at thee.
—Ben Jonson.

Bugle Song.

The splendor falls on castle-walls
And snowy summits old in story;
The long light shakes across the lakes,
And the wild cataract leaps in glory.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
Blow, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.
Oh hark! oh hear! how thin and clear,
And thinner, clearer, farther going!
Oh sweet and far, from cliff and scar,
The horns of Elfland faintly blowing!
low, let us hear the purple glens replying;
low, bugle; answer, echoes, dying, dying, dying.

O love, they die in yon rich sky,
They faint on hill or field or river;
Our echoes roll from soul to soul,
And grow for ever and for ever.
Blow, bugle, blow, set the wild echoes flying,
And answer, echoes, answer, dying, dying, dying.
—Alfred Tennyson.

The Sisters.

We were two daughters of one race;
She was the fairest in the face;
The wind is blowing in turret and tree.
They were together, and she fell;
Therefore revenge became me well;
O the Earl was fair to see!
She died; she went to burning flame;
She mix'd her ancient blood with shame.
The wind is howling in turret and tree.
Whole weeks and months, and early and late,
To win his love I lay in wait;
O the Earl was fair to see!

I made a feast; I bade him come;
I won his love; I brought him home.
The wind is roaring in turret and tree.
And after supper, on a bed,
Upon my lap he laid his head;
O the Earl was fair to see!

I kiss'd his eyelids into rest;
His ruddy cheek upon my breast.
The wind is raging in turret and tree.
I hated him with the hate of hell,
But I loved his beauty passing well.
O the Earl was fair to see!

I rose up in the silent night;
I made my dagger sharp and bright.
The wind is roving in turret and tree.
As half-asleep his breath he drew,
Three times I stab'd him thro' and thro'.
O the Earl was fair to see!

I curl'd and comb'd his comely head,
He look'd so grand when he was dead.
The wind is blowing in turret and tree.
I wrapt his body in the sheet,
And laid him at his mother's feet.
O the Earl was fair to see!
—Alfred Tennyson.

The Three Troopers.

DURING THE PROTECTORATE.

Into the Devil Tavern
Three booted troopers strode,
From spur to feather spotted and splash'd
With the mud of a winter road.
In each of their cups they dropp'd a crust,
And stared at the guests with a frown;
Then drew their swords, and roar'd for a toast,
"God send this Crum-well-down!"

A blue smoke rose from their pistol-locks,
Their sword-blades were still wet;
There were long red smears on their jerkins of buff,
As the table they overset.
Then into their cups they stirr'd the crusts,
And showed their teeth with a frown;
They flash'd their swords as they gave the toast,
"God send this Crum-well-down!"

The gambler dropp'd his dog's-ear'd cards,
The waiting-women screamed,
As the light of the fire-like stains of blood
On the wild men's sabres gleam'd.
Then into their cups they splash'd the crusts,
And cursed the fool of a town,
And leap'd on the table and roar'd a toast,
"God send this Crum-well-down!"

Till on a sudden fire-bells rang,
The troopers sprang to horse;
The eldest muttered, between his teeth,
Hot curses—deep and coarse.
In their stirrup-cups they flung the crusts,
And cried as they spur'd through town,
With their keen swords drawn and their pistols cock'd,
"God send this Crum-well-down!"

Away they dashed through Temple Bar,
Their red cloaks flowing free,
Their scabbards clash'd, each back-piece shone—
None liked to touch the three.
The silver cups that held the crusts
They flung to the startled town,
Shouting again, with a blaze of swords,
"God send this Crum-well-down!"
—George Walter Thornbury.

The Pompadour.

Versailles! Up the chestnut alley,
All in flower, so white and pure,
Strut the red and yellow lacqueys,
Of this Madame Pompadour.

"Clear the way!" cry out the lacqueys,
Elbowing the lame and poor
From the chapel's stately porches—
"Way for Madame Pompadour!"

Old bent soldiers, crippled veterans,
Sigh and hobble, sad, footsore,
Jostled by the chariot-horses
Of this woman—Pompadour.

Through the levee (poet, marquis, Wistful for the opening door),
With a rippling sweep of satin,
Sail'd the queenly Pompadour.

Sighs by dozens, as she proudly
Glides, so confident and sure,
With her fan that breaks through halberds—
In went Madame Pompadour.

Starving abbe, wounded marshal,
Speculator, lean and poor,
Cringe and shrink before the creatures
Of this harlot Pompadour.

"Rose in sunshine! Summer lily!"
Cries a poet at the door,
Squeezed and trampled by the lackeys
Of the witching Pompadour.

"Bathed in milk and fed on roses!"
Sighs a pimp behind the door,
Jammed and bullied by the courtiers
Of this strumpet Pompadour.

"Rose of Sharon!" chants an abbe,
Fat and with the voice of four,
Black silk stockings soil'd by varlets
Of this Rahab Pompadour.

"Neck so swan-like—Dea Certè!
Fit for monarchs to adore!"
"Clear the way!"—was still the echo,
"For this Venus—Pompadour."

Open!—with the jar of thunder
Fly the Portals—clocks strike four;
With a burst of drums and trumpets
Comes the king and Pompadour.
—George Walter Thornbury

Fare Thee Well!

Fare thee well! and if forever,
Still forever, fare thee well;
Even though unforgiving, never
'Gainst thee shall my heart rebel.

Would that breast were bared before thee
Where thy head so oft hath lain,
While that placid sleep came o'er thee
Which thou ne'er canst know again!

Would that breast, by thee glanced over,
Every inmost thought could show!
Then thou wouldst at last discover
'Twas not well to spurn it so.

Though the world for this commend thee—
Though it smile upon the blow,
Even its praises must offend thee,
Founded on another's woe.

Though my many faults defaced me,
Could no other arms be found,
Than the one which once embraced me,
To inflict a cureless wound?

Yet, oh yet thyself deceive not;
Love may sink by slow decay,
But by sudden wrench believe not
Hearts can thus be torn away.

Still thine own life retaineth—
Still must mine, though bleeding, beat;
And the undying thought which paineth
Is—that we no more may meet.

These are words of deeper sorrow
Than the wail above the dead;
Both shall live, but every morrow
Wake us from a widowed bed.

And when thou wouldst solace gather,
When our child's first accents flow,
Wilt thou teach her to say "Father!"
Though his care she must forego?

When her little hands shall press thee,
When her lip to thine is pressed,
Think of him whose prayer shall bless thee,
Think of him thy love had blessed!

Should her lineaments resemble
Those thou nevermore may'st see,
Then thy heart will softly tremble
With a pulse yet true to me.

All my faults perchance thou knowest,
All my madness none can know;
All my hopes, where'er thou goest,
Wither, yet with thee they go.

Every feeling hath been shaken;
Pride, which not a world could bow,
Bows to thee—by thee forsaken,
Even my soul forsakes me now;

But 'tis done; all words are idle—
Words from me are vainer still;
But the thoughts we can not bridle
Force their way without the will.

Fare thee well!—thus disunited,
Torn from every nearer tie,
Seared in heart, and lone, and blighted,
More than this I scarce can die.
—Lord Byron.

Abraham Lincoln.

You lay a wreath on murder'd Lincoln's bier,
You, who with mocking pencil went to trace,
Broad for the self-complaisant British sneer,
His length of shambling limb, his furrow'd face.

His gaunt, gnarl'd hands, his unkempt, bristling hair,
His garb uncouth, his bearing ill at ease,
His lack of all we prize as debonair,
Of power or will to shine, of art to please;

You, whose smart pen back'd up the pencil's laugh,
Judging each step as though the way were plain;
Reckless, so it could point its paragraph,
Of chief's perplexity or people's pain—

Beside this corpse, that bears for winding-sheet
The Stars and Stripes he lived to rear anew,
Between the mourners at his head and feet,
Say, scurrile jester, is there room for you?

Yes: he had lived to shame me from my sneer,
To lame my pencil and confute my pen;
To make me own this hind of princes peer,
This rail-splitter, a true-born king of men.

My shallow judgment I had learn'd to rue,
Noting how to occasion's height he rose;
How his quaint wit made home-truth seem more true;
How, iron-like, his temper grew by blows;

How humble, yet how hopeful he could be;
How in good fortune and in ill the same;
Not bitter in success, nor boastful he,
Thirsty for gold, nor feverish for fame.

He went about his work, such work as few
Ever had laid on head or heart and hand,
As one who knows, where there's a task to do,
Man's honest will must Heaven's good grace command;

Who trusts the strength will with the burden grow,
That God makes instruments to work his will,
If but that will we can arrive to know,
Nor tamper with the weights of good and ill.

So he went forth to battle, on the side
That he felt clear was Liberty's and Right's,
As in his pleasant boyhood he had plied
His warfare with rude Nature's thwarting mights—

The unclear'd forest, the unbroken soil,
The iron bark that turns the lumberer's axe.
The rapid that o'erbears the boatman's toil,
The prairie hiding the mazed wanderer's tracks.

The ambush'd Indian and the prowling bear—Such were the deeds that help'd his youth to train;
Rough culture, but such trees large fruit may bear,
If but their stocks be of right girth and grain.

So he grew up, a destin'd work to do,
And lived to do it; four long-suffering years'
Ill fate, ill feeling, ill report lived through,
And then he heard the hisses change to cheers,

The taunts to tribute, the abuse to praise,
And took both with the same unwavering mood,
Till, as he came on light, from darkling days,
And seemed to touch the goal from where he stood,

A felon hand, between the goal and him,
Reach'd from behind his back, a trigger prest,
And those perplexed and patient eyes were dim.
Those gaunt, long-laboring limbs were laid to rest.

The words of mercy were upon his lips,
Forgiveness in his heart and on his pen,
When this vile murderer brought swift eclipse
To thoughts of peace on earth, good-will to men.

The Old World and the New, from sea to sea,
Utter one voice of sympathy and shame.
Sore heart, so stopp'd when it at last beat high!
Sad life, cut short just as its triumph came!

A deed accurs'd! Strokes have been struck before
By the assassin's hand, whereof men doubt
If more of horror or disgrace they bore;
But thy foul crime, like Cain's, stands darkly out.

Vile hand, that brandest murder on a strife,
Whate'er the grounds, stoutly and nobly striven.
And with the martyr's crown crownest a life
With much to praise, little to be forgiven.

HENRY IRVING AND AMERICA.

The Great Tragedian's Affection for This Country.

For thirty years Bram Stoker was an intimate friend of the late Sir Henry Irving. During most of that period Mr. Stoker was, as Irving's business manager, his daily associate. It is the record of those eventful years that Mr. Stoker has chronicled in "Personal Reminiscences of Henry Irving." The author assures us he is not a panegyrist, but no proper account of Irving, the artist, and Irving, the man, could be less than panegyric, and Mr. Stoker's boundless affection and reverence for the dead tragedian are manifest on every page. Irving had a genius for friendship; there is not a more charming personality in the history of the stage, and Mr. Stoker could not have done better than "to convey the sense of Irving's worthiness by showing him among his friends." The list of persons who fell under the spell of his winsome courtesy, his gentle sympathy, his manly sincerity, would form an index to those of note of the time. Irving delighted to give midnight suppers in the famous Beefsteak Room of his Lyceum Theatre. Of the guests at these functions, Mr. Stoker says:

A list of the names of those who have supped with Irving there would alone fill chapters of this book. They were of all kinds and degrees. The whole social scale has been represented, from the prince to the humblest of commoners. Statesmen, travelers, explorers, ambassadors, foreign princes and potentates, poets, novelists, historians, writers of every style, shade, and quality. Representatives of all the learned professions; of all the official worlds; of all the great industries. Sportsmen, landlords, agriculturists. Men and women of leisure and fashion. Scientists, thinkers, inventors, philanthropists, divines. Egotists, ranging from harmless esteemers of their own worthiness to the very ranks of Nihilism—philosophers, artists of all kinds. In very truth, the list was endless and kaleidoscopic.

Irving never knew how many personal friends he had, for all who ever met him claimed acquaintanceship for evermore—and always to his great delight. Let me give an instance: In the late "eighties" when he took a house with an enormous garden in Brook Green, Hammersmith, he had the house rebuilt and beautifully furnished; but he never lived in it. However, in the summer, he thought it would be a good opportunity of giving a garden party at which he might see all his friends together. He explained to me what he would like to do:

"I want to see all my friends at once; and I wish to have it so arranged that there shall be no one left out. I hope my friends will bring their young people who would like to come. Perhaps you may remember our friends better than I do; would you mind making out a list for me—so that we can send the invitations. Gunter can do the commissariat. Of course I should like to ask a few of our Lyceum audience who come much to the theatre. Some of them I know, but there are others from whom I have received endless courtesies and I want them to see that I look on them as friends."

I set to work on a list, and two days afterward in the office he said to me:

"What about that list? We ought to be getting on with the invitations."

"No use," I said. "You can't give that party—not as you wish it!"

"Why not?" he asked amazed; he never liked to hear that anything he wished could not be done. I held up the sheets I had been working at.

"Here is the answer," I said. "There are too many."

"Oh, nonsense, my dear fellow. You forget it is a huge garden." I shook my head.

"The other is huge. I am not half through yet and they total up already over five thousand!"

And so that party never came off.

Henry Irving had the honor of calling many distinguished Americans by the name of friend, among them Presidents Arthur, Cleveland, McKinley and Roosevelt. The actor's affection for the country was large and sincere. He made a number of tours of the United States, but none more memorable than the first one in the autumn of 1883. Mr. Stoker writes of his first appearance in New York:

When on the evening of Monday, October 29, the curtain rose on the first scene of "The Bells," there was the hush of expectation, prolonged till the moment when the door of the inn parlor was thrown open and Irving seemed swept in by the rushing snowstorm. The tempest of cheers seemed just as though the prolongation of that last moment in London; and for six or seven minutes—an incredibly long time for such a matter on the stage—the cheering went on.

The welcome which Irving received on that night of October 29, 1883, lasted for more than twenty years—until the night of March 25, 1904, when at the Harlem Opera House he said "Good-bye" to his American friends—forever! Go where he would, from Maine to Louisiana, from the Eastern to the Western Sea, there was always the same story of loving greeting; of appreciative and encouraging understanding; of heartfelt au revoir, in which gratitude had no little part. As Americans of the United States have no princes of their own, they make princes of whom they love. And after eight long winters spent with Henry Irving amongst them, I can say that no more golden hospitality or affectionate belief, no greater understanding of purpose or enthusiasm regarding personality or work has ever been the lot of any artist—any visitor—in any nation. Irving was only putting into fervent words the feeling of his own true heart, when in his parting he said:

"I go with only one feeling on my lips and in my heart—'God bless America.'"

During his visit to this country in 1888, Irving expressed a wish to play to the cadets at West Point, and permission was granted by the War Secretary. The author thus describes this unusual performance of "The Merchant of Venice":

Of course it was not possible to use scenery in the space available for the performance; so it was arranged that the play should be given as in Shakespeare's time. To this end notices were fastened to the curtain at the proscenium: "Venice: A Public Place;" "Belmont: Portia's House;" "Shylock's House by a Bridge;" etc. As it happens the Venetian dress of the sixteenth century was almost the same as the British; so that the costumes now used in the piece were alike to those worn by the audience as well as on the stage at the Globe Theatre in Shakespeare's time. Thus the cadets at West Point saw the play almost identically as Shakespeare had himself seen it.

I think that we all in that hall felt proud when we saw over the proscenium of the little stage the flags of Britain and America draped together and united by a branch of palm. It thrilled us to our heart's core merely to see.

It was a wonderful audience. I suppose there never was another on all fours with it. I forget how many hundreds of cadets there are—I think four or five—and they were all there. As they sat in the benches, they looked at the first glance like a solid mass of steel. Their uniforms of blue and gray with brass buttons; their bright young faces, clean shaven; their flashing eyes—all lent force to the idea.

The attention and the understanding of the audience could not be surpassed. Many of these young men had never seen a play; and they were one and all chosen from every State in the Union; each one having been already trained or being on the way to it to command an army in the field. There was not a line in the play, not a point which did not pass for its full value. This alone seemed to inspire the actors, down to the least important. At the end of each act came the ringing cheers which are so inspiring to all.

When the curtain finally fell there was a pause. And then with one impulse every one of those hundreds of young men with a thunderous cheer threw up his cap; for an instant the air was darkened with them. There was a significance in this which the ordinary layman may not understand. By the American Articles of War—which govern the Military Academy—for a cadet to throw up his cap, except at the word of command given by his superior officer, is an act of insubordination, punishable with expulsion. These splendid young fellows—every one of whom justified himself later on the deadly heights of Santiago or amid the jungles of the Philippines—had to find some suitable means of expressing their feelings, and they did it in a way that they and their comrades understood! Strange to say, not one of the superior officers happened to notice the fearful breach of discipline. They themselves were too much engaged in something else—possibly throwing up their own caps; for they were all old West Point men.

Right sure I am that no one who had the privilege of being present on that night can ever forget it—men, women, or children; for behind the corps of cadets sat the officers with their wives and families.

When Irving came to make the little speech inevitable on such an occasion he said at the close:

"I can not restrain a little patriotic pride now, and I will confess it. I believe the joy-bells are ringing in London to-night, because for the first time the British have captured West Point!"

He spoke later of that wonderful audience in terms of enthusiasm, and Ellen Terry was simply in a transport of delight. For my own part, though I have been in the theatre each of the thousand times Irving and Ellen Terry played the "Merchant of Venice," I never knew it to go so well.

American literary men were always welcome guests at the Lyceum Theatre when Irving was in London. From Mark Twain to George Ade, from Walt Whitman to the latest writer of promise, scores of authors were sought out and entertained by the great-hearted tragedian. James Whitcomb Riley was an especial favorite of Irving's, as Mr. Stoker relates in the following paragraphs:

Irving, like all who have ever known him, loved the "Hoosier" poet. We saw a great deal of him when he was in London; and whenever we were in Indianapolis, to meet him was one of the expected pleasures. Riley is one of the most dramatic reciters that live, and when he gives one of his own poems it is an intellectual delight. I remember two specially delightful occasions in which he was a participant. Once in Indianapolis when he came and supped on the car with us whilst we were waiting after the play for the luggage to be loaded. He was in great form, and Irving sat all the while with an expectant smile whilst Riley told us of some of his experiences amongst the hill folk of Indiana where conditions of life were almost primitive. One tale gave Irving intense pleasure—that in which he told of how he had asked a mountaineer who was going down to the nearest town, to bring him back some tobacco. This the man had done gladly; but when Riley went to pay him the cost of it he drew his gun on him. When the other asked the cause of his offense, which he did not intend or even understand, the mountaineer answered:

"Didn't I do what ye asked me? Then why do you go for to insult me? I ain't a tobacco dealer. I bought it for ye, an' I give it to ye free and glad. I ain't sellin' it!"

The other occasion was a dinner at the Savoy Hotel, July 29, 1891, to which Irving had asked some friends to meet him. "Jamsey"—for so his friends call him—recited several of his poems most exquisitely. His rendering of the powerful little poem, "Good-bye, Jim," made every one of the other eight men at the table weep.

Edwin Booth had no greater admirer than his English brother actor. Irving played Laertes to Booth's Hamlet in 1861, as the author informs us in the following:

The occasion of Irving's producing "Othello" during his own management was due to his love and remembrance of Edwin Booth. In 1860, at the Theatre Royal, in Manchester, Irving began a long engagement. In the bill his name is announced: "His first appearance." In November of the following year Booth appeared as a star, playing "Othello," Irving being the Cassio; also "Hamlet," Irving being the Laertes; and "A New Way to Pay Old Debts," he of course taking Sir Giles Overreach, and Irving Wellborn. For his benefit Booth gave on Friday night "Romeo and Juliet," in which Irving played Benvolio to his Romeo. Often, when we talked of Booth some twenty years afterwards, he told me of the extraordinary alertness of the American actor; of his fierce concentration and impetuous passion; of the blazing of his remarkable eyes. It will be seen from the comparison of their respective parts in the plays set out that the difference between them in the way of status as players was marked. Twenty years afterwards, when the younger man had won his place in the world, and when his theatre was becoming celebrated as a national asset, Booth again visited England. Whoever had arranged his business did not choose the best theatre for him. For in those days the Princess's in Oxford Street did not have a high dramatic cachet. He got a good reception of course; but the engagement was not a satisfactory one, and Booth was much chagrined. There were even some who did not hesitate to say that Booth had not been fairly received in London. Irving jumped to the difficulty, went at once to Booth and said to him:

"Why don't you come and play with me at the Lyceum? I'll put on anything that you wish; or if there is any play in which we can play together, let us do that."

Booth was greatly delighted, and took the overture in the same good spirit in which it was meant. He at once told Irving that he would like to appear in "Othello," Irving said:

"All right! You decide on the time; and I'll get the play ready, if you will tell me how you would like it arranged."

Booth said he would like to leave all that to his host, as he had not himself taken part in the production of plays for years and did not even attend rehearsals. So Irving took all the task on himself. When he asked Booth whether he would like to play Othello or Iago—for he played both—he said that he would like to begin with Othello and that it would, he thought, be well if they changed week about; and so it was arranged. The performance began on May 2, 1881. The success of "Othello" was instantaneous and immense. During the seven weeks the arrangement lasted the houses were packed.

One night at supper in the Beefsteak Room, Irving told me an amusing occurrence which took place at Manchester when Booth played there. He said it was "about 1863," so it may have been that of which I have written, of 1861. "Richard III." was put up, Charles Calvert, the manager, playing Richmond, and Booth, Gloster. Calvert determined to make a brave show of his array against the usurper, and being manager was able to dress his own following to some measure of his wishes. Accordingly he drained the armory of the theatre and had the armor furnished up to look smart. Richard's army came on in the usual style. They were not much to look at, though they were fairly comfortable for their work of fighting. But Richmond's army enthralled the senses of the spectators, till those who knew the play began to wonder how such an army could be beaten by the starvelings opposed to them. They were not used to fight, or even to move in armor, however; and the moment they began to make an effort they one and all fell down and wriggled all over the stage in every humiliating effort to get up; and the curtain had to be lowered amidst the wild laughter of the audience.

San Franciscans who witnessed Irving's wonderful performances, will remember the great beauty and historical accuracy of the costumes and stage settings. Irving counted no expense of money or energy too great in the preparation of a play. Sir Arthur Sullivan, Sir Charles Villiers Stanford or Sir Julius Benedict were chosen to write the incidental music; Sir Edward Burne-Jones, or other noted artists, were glad to design costumes and scenes; eminent authorities on the history of the period, advised as to the accuracy of the smallest details. Apropos, the author tells this amusing story of Alexander Murray, keeper of the Greek section of the British Museum:

When "The Cup" had been running for a considerable time, Dr. Alexander Murray, whom at first we had in vain tried to persuade, came to see it. We were all anxious to know how the Greek-Eastern effect impressed him, and I made it a point to see him at the end of the play. When I asked him how he liked it, he said:

"Oh, I liked it well enough at first; but when the Temple scene came it was different. At the beginning two girls came on bearing a great amphora; but you will hardly believe me when I tell you it had red figures on a black ground, instead of black figures on a red ground. I need not say that after that I could enjoy nothing!"

Both forms of using the colors were practiced in the history of Etruscan art, and our people, since the time of the play was somewhat indeterminate, used the older one.

Some curious effects in stage perspective were noticed when Irving first brought out "Henry VIII." As the period was that of the Field of the Cloth of Gold there was naturally a good deal of cloth of gold used. Seymour Lucas, R. A., who undertook to superintend the production, had a number of samples of the cloth hung along the front of the stage, and the artists who were employed in the preparation of the play sat in the stalls to note the effect. The result was interesting:

Something like the following took place as the painter's eye ranged along the fabrics:

"That first one—well, fair. Let it remain! The next, take it away. No use at all! Third and fourth—put them on one side—we may want them for variety. Fifth—Oh! that is perfect! Just what we want!"

When the examination was finished we all went on the stage to look at the specimens accepted and discarded. There we found the second so peremptorily rejected was real cloth of gold at ten guineas a foot; while the fifth whose excellence for the purpose we had so enthusiastically accepted, was Bolton sheeting stencilled in our own property-room, and costing as it stood about eighteen pence a yard.

Again, very fine jewelry—stage jewelry—had been prepared to go with the various dresses. In especial in the procession at the beginning of the fourth act the collars of the Knights of the Garter were of great magnificence. One of the actors, however, was anxious to have everything as real as possible, and not being content with the splendor of the diamond collars provided, borrowed a real one from one of the dukes, whose Collar of the Garter was of a magnificence rare even amongst such jewels. He expected it to stand out amongst the other jewelled collars seen in the procession. But strange to say, amongst them all it was the only one that did not look well. It did not even look real. Stage jewels are large and are backed with foil, which throws back the fierce light of the "floats" and the "standards" and the "ground rows" and all those aids to illusion which have been perfected by workmen competent to their purpose.

The biography, which is in two volumes, is crowded with anecdotes and personal touches concerning prominent men of every nation. The work is illustrated by many portraits of the actor in famous roles.

The State University has just learned of the gift of $100,000 by the widow of the late Judge Boalt to the University authorities for the construction of a new law building on the campus at Berkeley. Mrs. Boalt has placed property worth over $100,000 in the hands of three trustees with the stipulation that $100,000 shall be expended toward the erection of the Boalt Law Building on the campus, as a memorial to her husband. The building is to contain class-rooms and studies for the members of the faculty, and a library which will be sufficient to contain from 50,000 to 100,000 volumes. There is already a nucleus for a good law library, and the law library endowment, created by Mrs. Jane K. Sather, of Oakland, which now amounts to $16,500, will add much to the value of the law library to be installed in the new building.

The greatest victory won for the metric system of an English-speaking country within a generation was recorded in recent cable dispatches—the adoption of the metric standard in the great manufacturing works of Kynoch, Limited, at Birmingham, England. This step will revive the hopes of the friends of reform in weights and measures and intensify the struggle between the meter and the inch. The significance of the event lies in the fact that this firm is one of the first, outside of a strictly limited field, to abandon the old standards, and to attempt to overcome the apparently insurmountable obstacles to the change.

INDIVIDUALITIES.

ir William Henry Perkin, the English chemist, was recently honored by the Chemists' Club of New York with a medal commemorative of his valuable discoveries of the commercial products of coal-tar.

aron de Paszthory's picture, "The Tempter," painted by Father Bernard Vaughan's sermons on the "Sins of the Smart Set," is attracting crowds of people to the gallery in High-street, Kensington, London. Father Vaughan himself went specially to view it.

arvara Smolianoff, who drives a cab in Moscow, is the only woman licensed driver in Russia. Her father, a cabman, lost his life in trying to save that of a police sergeant, and the authorities thereupon transferred his license to his daughter, in whose cab many ladies like to ride.

Mrs. William Ziegler, widow of the patron of Arctic explorers, will begin the publication of a magazine for the blind, and will furnish the material free of charge to all blind people. Walter J. Holmes, who will put the magazine under the name of "The Blind," is now busy obtaining the names and addresses of the 70,000 sightless people of the country.

Mrs. V. F. Church, cashier of the Bank of St. Louis, Mo., and only woman bank cashier in the United States, recently stated before the American Bankers' Association that women are more conscientious than men, that women officers would be a great asset to any bank, and if they were more generally employed there would be much fewer failures and embezzlements.

Thomas Lipton has by no means given up his idea of lifting the America's Cup. He will issue a challenge through the Ulster or the Red Yacht Club, on his return home. But Sir Thomas wants to challenge for a race between two yachts that will be constructed under the new measurement rules, and entirely different from the yachts that have been racing in previous years.

Prince Francis of Teck, brother of the Prince of Wales, has been adopted by Mr. von Andre, an immensely wealthy cosmopolitan, according to English reports. Mrs. von Andre is a widow of Mrs. Chauncey Depew. The von Andres have a beautiful London residence, No. 11, Piccadilly, which has been offered, with its contents, as a gift to the prince. In Paris they have another place, where the prince is made at home. Prince Francis will spend the winter with the von Andres on the Riviera, and it is said that his fairy-like good fortune is very gratifying to his sister, as his lack of resources was a drain on her purse.

William A. Pfeffer, once prominent as a Populist member of Congress, is now one of the quietest citizens of Washington. He has lived in the national capital almost continuously since his term in the Senate expired. Mr. Pfeffer is engaged upon the work of indexing the reports of Congress for the Senate and draws a satisfactory stipend from the Senate contingent fund for this service.

General Picquart, the defender of Dreyfus and now the French minister of war, has defined his attitude towards his old prosecutors in the army. When an officer who was involved in the conspiracy that banished Picquart to the border of the Sahara, entered the minister's office and began to stammer out a statement on the subject Picquart stopped him, saying: "I only know one thing and that is that you have always been an excellent officer. You may be sure that I shall not forget that."

Dr. Wiley of the bureau of chemistry of the Department of Agriculture, whose "poison squad" has attracted considerable attention throughout the world, now proposes to try the effects of alcoholic beverages of various kinds upon the human system. But he has run into opposition at the very suggestion of the idea, the head of one branch of the W. C. T. U. offering serious objection to his making such an experiment upon any one except brewers, distillers, and dealers in such liquors.

Herr Bebel, the Socialistic doctrinaire of the German Reichstag, declared a year ago in a speech at Jena for the general strike in popular warfare. At the recent "Party Day" or annual congress of Socialists at Mannheim he expressed himself in a manner which contradicted his former utterance. He said: "The Prussian monarchy and the Junkers and magnates would put down such an attempt to paralyze industry. Nor can strikes be brought about artificially; they are only possible when the masses become animated by a general excitement." He declared, moreover, that the general strike had failed in Russia just for the reason that general public opinion was not favorable to it.

Dramatic Notes

"In the Bishop's Carriage," Channing Pollock's dramatization of Miriam Michelson's novel, was given its first presentation in California at Los Angeles last Monday night. The company will play the cities of the interior following its week's engagement in Los Angeles, and reach Oakland November 16. The next week the company, which supports Jennie Busley in the title-role, will appear at the Colonial Theatre in this city.

Louis Evan Shipman has made a story of his play, "D'Arcy of the Guards," and it is running as a serial in a daily paper of Philadelphia, the city where the scenes of the play are laid. Plays are often made of stories, but the reverse system is not common.

The New York courts have recently decided that a theatre ticket is a contract entered upon between the purchaser and the management. Now, when a woman buys a ticket to the Astor Theatre she contracts to remove her hat. Wagenhals & Kemper, the managers, have printed this clause on all their tickets: "This ticket is sold with the understanding and agreement that if a lady uses the same she will remove her hat upon request of an employee of the management."

For the first time in the play's history in America, Sudermann's "The Sunken Bell," was played to a full house at the Lyric Theatre in Philadelphia, October 25, by E. H. Sothorn and Julia Marlowe, Mr. Sothorn appearing as Heinrich, the bell founder, and Miss Marlowe in the role of the elfin creature, Rautendein. Since the play was produced there seven years ago the public taste has changed, and though Hauptmann's fairy tale did not meet with popular approval then, the interest this time is notable.

May Irwin, once reported to be the fiancée of David Bennett Hill, was much interested in the New York campaign, and to a reporter declared her sympathy for Hearst. In speaking of Jerome the actress caught herself. "Mercy!" she exclaimed, "if I say anything against Jerome he may have me arrested for singing coon songs!"

Friday afternoon of last week a benefit performance in aid of the veteran comedian, L. R. Stockwell, who is seriously ill and threatened with loss of sight, was given at the Liberty Theatre in Oakland. A large number of sympathizing professionals took part and the amount realized will be an appreciable and appreciated gift to Mr. Stockwell.

Technically the laws of New York State prohibit Sunday theatrical performances in full costume, but such a play was produced Sunday night by William A. Brady. There was no police interference with Mr. Brady's plans, as no tickets were sold and all of the audience were his guests. George Broadhurst's "The Man of the Hour," was the play, and it was given in the Manhattan Theatre. It was a performance with the curtain, make-up, and the full scenic equipment that would be used on any other night in the week. The purpose was to get the views of the critics before a general public performance.

R. L. Blanchard, a newspaper correspondent, writes from Vienna: "Actors' and singers' salaries have doubled in Europe in the last few years. It is because new theatres are constantly being built, while no new talent is coming forward. No less than thirty new theatres have been opened in Germany and Austria since 1900. But there are no new actors to come on these stages. Director Heinrich Conried says the unhealthy standard of modern plays is responsible for this. Such writers as Ibsen, Sudermann, Hirschfeld, and, on the English stage, Pinero, have brought it about. Young people who visit the theatre are no longer enthusiastic about it when they return home. They have not the slightest desire to see themselves appearing upon the stage. Formerly, when they went to see Shakespeare, Goethe, Schiller, and such great authors played, they went home wild with delight. They recited, declaimed, gesticulated, acted, and vowed the stage was the only possible career. But the new plays contain no characters which appeal to or interest them greatly."

Richard Mansfield produced Ibsen's "Peer Gynt" in Chicago Monday night, October 29, in a brilliantly-mounted fashion, with Edward Grieg's music, written for the poem-play. Of the opening night, Amy Leslie, dramatic critic of the Chicago News, wrote an appreciative description from which these notes are taken: "Mansfield lays bare the shuddering mysticism in the depths of the story, but he makes bright and simple a charming play which lies over the dragon's teeth of threat and ominous reflections, walling it about with sermons and moral tempests; a play of a wild boy who loves lightly, drinks foolishly, dreams, fights, seeks fortune, loses, all and lies, lies, lies all over the world and back again, deserving the ladle of the but-ton-maker in the end. The message in Henrik Ibsen's turbulent poem is shot far above the heads of eager play watchers into the fertile pastures of thought, psychological inference, and the dreamland of politics, human events, towering fatalism, and religious tumult. . . . He sings a song exquisitely, he dances in elfish fantasies, he weeps, laughs, tells fairy tales, battles with gnomes, phantoms, and storms at sea, fights out delirium from drink in the wilds of a mountain and holds forth imperially upon his own idea of himself and lesser beings, all of which means exhausting the entire treasury of splendid dramatic genius and art. In some respects it is the most colossal and imposing work Mr. Mansfield has ever accomplished, and whether or not his always worshipful and awed public receive it with acclaim he has with customary blind enthusiasm on the side of the highest, the most unique and perpetuating art, flung out another indestructible banner in the stalwart march of American stage history, unfurling a device of pride and honor."

Virginia Cameron, a clever young woman of the "Veronique" Company, assumed an important role recently at the Colonial Theatre in Cleveland. Gladys Ure, the original impersonator of the part, was taken suddenly ill, and with a few hours' notice Miss Cameron was called upon to fill the place. Her work was favorably received, but the praise went to Miss Ure, whose name appeared on the program. Miss Cameron is a San Francisco girl, who studied for several years under Anna Miller Wood, of Boston. She is pretty and has a pleasing and well-trained voice. Last year she achieved some notice by giving a concert in the Greek open-air theatre at Berkeley.

Musical Notes.

Miss Mary Carrick, of San Francisco, gave a piano recital in Berlin, German, her debut in that city, on October 30, and was very successful, being recalled several times. Her programme included five numbers from Liszt and Chopin, the B minor Sonata of the former composer being given for the first time in Berlin. Miss Carrick was graduated from the Notre Dame Convent of San Francisco, and was afterward a pupil of Hugo Mansfeldt. Her farewell recital in this city is remembered by music lovers and was a fair promise of her success abroad.

Margarethe Bruntsch, a young California alto, has been engaged at the Berlin Comic Opera, where she will shortly make her debut. The young lady appeared successfully in concert last winter. She has a sympathetic voice of remarkable range.

The Hawaiian Band, it is alleged through bad business management, was stranded in the Middle West, and a subscription fund is being raised in Honolulu to bring the members home. Good audiences have greeted the band at nearly all its engagements.

The American production of "The Belle of Mayfair," with Christie MacDonald in the part created in London by Edna May, is touring New York State and will be seen at Daly's Theatre in New York on November 19.

A letter has been received in Boston from Miss Christine La Barraque, the California blind girl, whose voice charmed music lovers in that city last winter, in which she says that she had an enjoyable voyage, and that she has already commenced her vocal lessons under Vannacenni, the famous Italian instructor.

Paul Steindorff, Ferris Hartman, and many of the old Tivoli Theatre Company, are giving "The Tar and the Tartar" at Idora Park, Oakland, and will follow that piece with "Don Cesar de Bazan."

May Yohc, with a voice so husky it was said to be of little use, appeared at the Berkeley Theatre in New York a few days ago in the first presentation of "Mlle. Champagne," a vapid musical melange. The work of the company in the piece was pronounced even worse than the play.

Music, out of Italy, has always been an incentive to personal gain, and the very nature of its conduct became productive. The copyrights of Verdi brought 100,000,000 francs to the Ricordi publishing house. Out of the "Cavalleria Rusticana" 6,000,000 francs have been garnered; out of Leoncavallo's "Pagliacci" the Sonzogno firm has received 4,000,000 francs, and without a statement to its composer, who must accept the decision on profits without a murmur. Probably this very fact, the profit on publishing, animated composers; the fact that the piano and vocal score running up to 450,000 copies without reserve of the "Pagliacci" was sufficient to create a new supply of works. The 450,000 copies of the piano and vocal score belong to Leoncavallo, but the pecuniary profit went to Ricordi, and under such conditions, entirely apart of Ricordi, genius not only does not flourish; it dies. In Italy the composer, supposing him to be the librettist, as is the case with Leoncavallo, receives thirty per cent of the net income of the performances and nothing whatever of the publishing income. A publisher like Ricordi may sell 1,000,000 copies of an aria and profit $100,000 from the publishing, and yet the composer gets nothing; and he has no chance to go to another publisher, because if he stays with Ricordi, Sonzogno will not entertain him, and if he goes to Sonzogno, Ricordi will not listen to him. Thus the monopoly in Italy is complete.

Bohemian Club Annals.

The Board of Directors of the Bohemian Club announce that Captain Robert H. Fletcher, the Historiographer of the Club, saved from the fire the manuscript of the third volume of the Annals of the Club. Members are informed that their subscriptions will be received at once, the price of the volume being $3.50. The Board further announce that as all copies of Volume 1 (1872-1877) and Volume 2 (1877-1884) in the possession of the Club for sale, were destroyed by the fire, and as doubtless most of the copies owned by individual members were also so destroyed, it has been thought desirable to make reprints of those two volumes. Before the fire Volume 1 sold for $20, and Volume 2 for $10. The series of three volumes can now be purchased for $10, or any single volume for $3.50. The edition will be limited and the plates destroyed. The period comprised in the last volume now about to be published runs down from 1884 to 1897, and naturally, being more recent, will be found more interesting to most members. For there are not many of the present generation whose membership antedates 1884, which is nearly a quarter of a century ago.

The Orpheum.

Gus Edwards' "School Boys and Girls" will make their first appearance in this city at the Orpheum Sunday afternoon. This band, ten in number, call their skit "Primary, No. 23," which is described as a riot of music, comedy, and dancing. The three sisters Herzog-Camaras, direct from Europe, will give an acrobatic act. Lillian Apel will offer a decided novelty to San Francisco music lovers in her original "Piano-logue." Lee White, a singer of good songs, promises a distinct surprise. The Empire City Quartette has been retained by request and promise an entire change of act; Vasco will continue his musical eccentricities. Mlle. Alexandra and Mons. Bertie, the trapezists; the Wilson brothers, German conversationalists, and Orpheum motion pictures will complete a capital program. On the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located, are to be found all kinds of attractions. There is a matinee at the Orpheum every day except Monday.

LITERARY NOTES.

Miss Bonner's New Novel.

A marital tragedy in the first families of The City That Was, not the very first families, chronologically, but those whose fortunes and social elevation date from the bonanza days, is the theme of Geraldine Bonner's new story, "Rich Men's Children," a novel of remarkable power. And who shall say that the social affairs of this interesting class—"the royalty of Far Western millions, knowing its own ramifications, having its own unprinted Almanach de Gotha"—is not a subject big with possibilities for the novelist? For two decades the lookers-on in Vanity Fair in two continents have witnessed with ever-increasing astonishment, the steady rise to dizzy social heights, of young men and women whose fathers were day laborers and miners, and whose mothers were camp washer-women. But Miss Bonner does not take us out of California in this dramatic story, and San Franciscans will find themselves substituting well-known names for the novelist's nomenclature.

Bill Cannon and his lovely daughter, Rose, leave their Nob Hill residence for a winter visit to the Sierra mining towns, the scene of Cannon's early labors. They are snow-bound in the hotel of Antelope, where they have as fellow-guests, among others, a strolling actor. The monotony of their enforced stay is broken by the news that a traveler who had started to walk to Antelope from Rocky Bar was lost in the storm. A search party is organized, and rescues the belated pedestrian, who proves to be Dominick Ryan, scion of another family whose millions were made on the Comstock. Dominick had married the woman who had been his mistress, and who made life so wretched for him that he left home to wander aimlessly through the mining camps. Rose nurses Dominick back to health, and nurse and patient speedily fall desperately in love. Cannon learns of their affection, and takes his daughter home. Dominick also returns to San Francisco, and agrees to live again with his wife, on her tearfully protesting that past unpleasantness would not be repeated. It is young Mrs. Ryan's ambition to be received at the home of Dominick's mother, who has steadfastly refused to meet her son's wife. The elder Mrs. Ryan is willing to go to any length to separate the couple, and, at Cannon's suggestion, a fortune is offered the young woman if she will leave San Francisco for a year, and obtain a divorce. The size of the bribe is increased from $50,000 to $300,000, but she savagely scorns the offers. The woman's cupidity is excited, but she has discovered the love of her husband and Rose, and jealousy deadens even her desire for money. In the meantime, Rose, who has avoided Ryan since she learns that he is married, learns of the attempt to force his wife to obtain a divorce, and indignantly champions her cause. Even the determined old millionaire is willing to acknowledge defeat at this unexpected turn of affairs, but the appearance of an actor, their chance acquaintance in the Antelope Hotel, solves the problem. He accidentally meets Mrs. Ryan in a Mexican restaurant, follows her home, and calls the following evening. He tells his story to Dominick; that he had been deserted by a faithless wife in Chicago several years before; and that he had seen her enter the Ryan residence. Dominick's wife enters at the end of the conversation, and proves to be the recreant woman. Before Cannon is told of this dramatic episode she calls on him, agrees to leave the State, demands $50,000 for expenses and finally agrees to accept $35,000. But Bill Cannon is not much disturbed by the incident.

"Why didn't the damned fool stick out for the whole fifty thousand? I'd have given it to her as soon as not."

The rich men's sons in Miss Bonner's story are a worthless lot, except Dominick Ryan, a decent sort of chap, who is easily forgiven his unfortunate liaison. The rich men's daughters are charming young San Franciscans, frank, and mildly unconventional, with "that matter-of-fact sturdiness, that absence of softness and mystery so noticeable in California women."

There have been several notable novels by California authors published this autumn, but if we mistake not, "Rich Men's Children" will win more readers, and arouse more discussion than any San Francisco story that has appeared in recent years.

"Lincoln and Gettysburg."

Henry Sweetser Burrage has written a history of the famous scene of General Meade's victory over the Confederate forces under General Lee on July 3, 1863. Major Burrage's book, "Gettysburg and Lincoln," opens with a description of the decisive three days' battle. Shortly after the battle was fought, David Wills, of Pennsylvania, proposed that Cemetery Hill, the key to the Union line of defenses, be purchased as a national cemetery for the dead heroes. The ground was consecrated on November 19, 1863, and the ceremonies were made memorable by Lincoln's famous address, which was written in half an hour at Mr. Willis's residence, at Gettysburg. Lincoln said, after the delivery of the address, which ranks among the historic speeches of the world: "That speech won't scour. It is a flat failure. The people are disappointed." By act of Congress, 1895, the battlefield of Gettysburg was set aside as a National Military Park. The book is illustrated by maps and photographs.

Crawford's Latest Story of Rome.

When we are told that Marion Crawford has written a new story of modern Roman society, we know what to expect from the tale, and we generally get it. There is a strong family resemblance to all his characters, and we constantly meet old names and old localities in Mr. Crawford's latest book, "A Lady of Rome." For all that, the story ranks with the author's best novels.

We are introduced to Maria, Countess of Montalto, on the first page. Seven years before, the count had left her to take up his residence in Spain with his aged mother. Maria was married almost straight from the schoolroom to the count, although her true love was a handsome young soldier, Baldassare del Castiglione. After the marriage Castiglione continues to push his suit, and gossip said there had been some indiscretions, and something more than that. Montalto had learned the truth, and, to avoid public scandal, spread the report that he must accompany his invalid mother to Spain. Maria and the captain meet during the count's absence, but both repent their sin; never again will she dishonor her husband, and Castiglione, save for that one sin of passion, is without offense. On the death of his mother, the count returns, forgives his wife freely and takes up his residence with Maria and her boy, whose eyes are blue, like Castiglione's. Stirring incidents happen, and the story reaches its climax with the death of the count. The book closes with Maria and her little son at tea.

"I wish the Captain were here, mamma," he says, suddenly. "It would be such fun to ride together. I don't see why you shouldn't ask him for a few days."

"Not now, little man," says Maria, pouring out the boy's tea. "But perhaps he may come another year and stay a long time."

Land of Missing Links.

Stories of strange adventure, in which ingenuity of inventiveness on the author's part, properly exerted, is rewarded by the flattering attention of adults as well as minors, has encouraged Philip Verrill Mighels to depart from the realms of pure romance and write "The Crystal Sceptre." In this novel story, told in the first person, the narrator, upon falling from a wrecked balloon, finds himself in a community of "Missing Links," as he terms them; creatures just short of being human, who treat him kindly, and venerate him for his superior attainments.

Mr. Mighels forswears geography in his peculiar tale, which flows along fluently and absorbingly, all the better for being unhampered by the restrictions demanded by observing the probabilities. His hero has many strange adventures, while turning the talents of civilization to account in the jungle, not the least of which is his rescue of an imprisoned white girl from her perilous position as goddess to another and hostile band of "Missing Links." Plenty of imagination, any amount of adventures, a frequent introduction of the element of suspense that gives the reader delightful thrills during the recital of the numerous perils that encompass the hero, make up a total that will hold jaded men as well as fresh-faced boys in the grip of an absorbing interest and lend "The Crystal Sceptre" the vogue it deserves.

This November Sunset.

Sunset for November is a seasonable and interesting number. Warren Cheney's article on "Commercial Berkeley" describes the astonishing advances made in manufacturing during the past few years in the college town. Oscar N. Taylor and James Lanagan discuss the Rugby football game. Other readable and brightly illustrated papers are "Oregon's Outlook," by G. A. White; "Philippine Prospects," by Hamilton Wright; "Astoria's Odd Festival," by A. W. Mann; and "The California Country House," by Herbert D. Croly. Adeline Knapp has a humorous short story, "Peers in Judgment," and the departments are, as usual, attractive and up to date.

LITERARY NOTES.

Kipling's Tales of the Olden England.

If another than Rudyard Kipling had written "Puck of Pook's Hill," we would read the ten fresh and pretty stories in the book as half fairy tales, half historical romances, and would be grateful for the entertainment they gave us. But Mr. Kipling is imperialist, poet, patriot, mystic, even, to grown-ups, so we must sacrifice some of the delights of reading the stories as pure and purposeless fancy, and search for symbolism and underlying ideas. If, then, there is a purpose in the stories, it is to remind Englishmen, lest they forget, of the ancient glories of their country, that they daily tread ground made memorable by valiant deeds, that their isle "is not any common earth, or water, or wood, or air." But to the stories.

A little boy and his sister are playing hits of "Midsummer Night's Dream." A fairy ring in the Sussex hills is their theatre, and the play is going beautifully, when Puck himself, the last of the Good People, appears. The two children and Puck become great chums and he tells them the story of Weland's sword. On later days he introduces them to the shade of Sir Richard Dalyngridge, a knightly follower of William the Conqueror, who tells them the stirring tales of the Conquest; Parnesius, a centurion of the Thirtieth Legion, who tells them of the Romans in Britain and their wars; Kadmuel, a Jew of Bury, who lent money to King John, unfolds a lively tale, and the brave deeds of other loyal heroes are celebrated.

Very vivid and real are these first-hand pictures of the England that is dead and gone. Seldom has the splendid military history of the past been portrayed more graphically and with finer imagination. And not brute force and physical prowess are celebrated, but justice and mercy.

Published by Doubleday, Page & Co., New York; $1.50.

Poems of Edward Rowland Sill.

California may, perhaps without dispute, claim Edward Rowland Sill as one of her sons; here he spent his best years, and here he wrote his best poems. Sill does, it is true, hark back to his early New England home, even in some of his writings on avowedly Californian themes, but his sweetest verses were composed at that period of his life when from his home in the shadow of the Berkeley hills he could see the waters of the Golden Gate dancing in the sunlight. Sill occupied the chair of English literature at the University of California from 1874 until 1882, when failing health put an end to his teaching. A book of his poems was privately printed at Berkeley in 1883, and four years ago the first attempt was made to gather all his verses into a single volume. The compiler of the latter edition, William Belmont Parker, has edited a new and complete collection of Sill's work, wherein all the poems are arranged as nearly as possible in their chronological order. Sill was accustomed to say, without affectation, that he was "a teacher who occasionally wrote verses," and between that modest description and the compiler's dictum that there are "three strains in his music, Emersonian, Arnoldian, if you please, Tennysonian, perhaps," is Sill's true position as a poet. "The Fool's Prayer," "Opportunity," "Five Lives" and "His Lost Days" place him in the front rank of our minor poets.

Sill's Poetical Works is well printed and bound, but the illustrations were better omitted. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; $1.50.

A Volume of Finished Essays.

Herbert Paul is an English classicist with a sense of humor, even if he does take issue with the Oxford dons on the old academic question of the compulsory study of Greek, and then attempt to convince us that an intimate acquaintance with the classics is necessary to the cultured. Not all the essays in Mr. Paul's book of distinguished prose, "Stray Leaves," will appeal to American readers, unless for the charm of the author's style. It may be that our bishops have not the scholarship or literary attainments of their English brethren, but an essay by an American on contemporaneous "Bishops and Historians" would bring the query. What bishops? The paper on "Charles Lamb" is scarcely less artistic and delightful than one of the gentle Elia's essays.

Published by The John Lane Company, New York; $1.50.

Burlesque Burglars.

The Splendid Twenty of "The Robberies Company, Ltd." Nelson Lloyd's new story, are a body of highly cultured artists, scientists, and literary men who spend their days and nights planning spectacular burglaries. They work on an extraordinary "theory of worthless rubbish"; that silverware, jewelry, expensive furniture, anything that may be dispensed with, is an incubus, and that if they steal this useless impedimenta they will assist men to revert to nature. But as they would be open to the charge of sordidness if they kept their loot, these gentlemen crackmen return everything they pilfer. This would appear to deprive the object lesson of its value. We have to be satisfied with the bead burglar's weak explanation that their robberies "upset society." But with all its demands on our credulity, the story is one to be heartily enjoyed. The imprisonment of the wealthy New York bachelor in his own home while the company takes possession for weeks, is humorously worked out. There is a love story, with episodes agreeably sentimental, and several symposiums on fantastic philosophical themes.

Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $1.50.

A Biography of Walt Whitman.

It is more than fifty years since "Leaves of Grass" was first published, but it has not yet been settled whether, as Tennyson says, its author was "no poet," or if, in the words of Bliss Perry, Whitman's latest biographer, his work possesses "a nobility and beauty such as only the world's very greatest poets have surpassed." No American poet has been praised more extravagantly or condemned more bitterly than the good, gray poet. Symonds testifies that "the 'Leaves of Grass' influenced me more than any other book has done, except the Bible; more than Plato, more than Goethe." Stevenson spoke of it as "a book which tumbled the world upside down for me." And Swinburne says that "Mr. Whitman's Eve is a drunken apple-woman, indecently sprawling in the slush and garbage of the gutter amid the rotten refuse of her overturned fruit-stall." The obstacles to the popular acceptance of the work, on which Whitman's claim to fame must ultimately rest, are the strangeness of its form and its so-called immoral tone: "Of physiology from top to toe I sing."

Mr. Perry disposes of the charge of obscenity by saying that, "At worst, Whitman was immodest rather than indecent."

All are agreed that Walt Whitman was one of the most unique personalities in American literature, and Mr. Perry tells several new episodes of his career. The book is the first attempt to present a full biographical and critical study of Whitman.

Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; $1.50 net.

An International Courtship.

In "A King's Divinity," Dolores Bacon tells the story of the love of an heir to a European throne for a well-bred American girl. Of course, Rouvenia isn't much of a country. We agree with the prince that his toy throne is not worth occupying, and admire his good taste when he scorns the crown and marries the lovely American.

When the Follensbee family visited Rouvenia, Miss Alecia had no intention of setting the tiny court by the ears. She accepted the attention of the Duke of Galleria, who seemed to be a manly chap, and reciprocated his affection. But a ferocious state official informs Alecia that Galleria must marry a certain Princess Olga, if he wishes to be king, but the government would not object to a morganatic marriage. Alecia breaks off the engagement indignantly, but when Galleria assures her that he was not a party to the proposal of the diplomat, and has decided to quit the king business, anyway, they set the date for the marriage. The path of their love is unusually rough. There are two other claimants to the throne who add to the interest of the tale, one an imbecile, who is addicted to hashish; the other a degenerate who spends most of his time in the Parisian Elysee Montmartre.

There are some stirring and romantic episodes, but the author is seldom serious, and there is a good deal of humor in the story.

Published by Henry Holt & Co., New York; $1.50.

Books for Juveniles.

The list of holiday books for children is a long one this season. The following charmingly written books for little people are prettily bound and illustrated: "Kristy's Rainy Day Picnic," by Olive Thorne Miller, is a story for winter evenings (Houghton, Mifflin & Co.; $1.25); "Nancy Rutledge," by Katharine Pyle, is a Christmas-time story (Little, Brown & Co.; $1.25); "Boy Blue," by Etta and Mary Blaisdell, is Mother Goose in a new role (Little, Brown & Co.); "The Flight of Puss Pandora," by Caroline Fuller, is a humorous story of an apartment cat (Little, Brown & Co.; $1.50); "Joey and the Fair," by James Otis, is a story of New England farm life (Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.; 75 cents); "Meg and Others," by Harriet T. Comstock, is a Christmas tale (Thomas Y. Crowell & Co.; 75 cents).

New Publications.

"You can keep no men long, nor Scotchmen at all, off moral or theological discussion," says Stevenson. It is, however, difficult to interest pupils in a study as abstract as ethical principles. In "Everyday Ethics," Ella Lyman Cabot arouses the student's interest at the outset, by the discussion of live topics, and holds it firmly to the end. Published by Henry Holt & Co., New York; $1.25.

Calvin Dill Wilson has rewritten the "Canterbury Tales" in simple prose for young readers. The book is very attractively bound and printed. Published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago; $1.00 net.

A reprint of "Ancient Law," by Sir Henry Sumner Maine, which has passed through many editions since it was originally published forty-five years ago, has appeared. The present edition of this invaluable work on ancient law, its connection with the early history of society and its relation to modern ideas, has an introduction and notes by Sir Frederick Pollock. Published by Henry Holt & Co., New York; $1.75 net.

In "Buff: A Tale for the Thoughtful," by A. Physiopath, the author aims to furnish a correct basis for perfect physical endowment by showing that nature should furnish the standard for medical practice. Little, Brown & Co., Boston; $1.00.

A NEW ROMANCE OF CALIFORNIA BY A NEW CALIFORNIA AUTHOR

CASA GRANDE

By Charles Duff Stuart. 12mo. $1.50

A prose pastoral of the California range in the early fifties. A young Southerner has some trying experiences while making good his title to an unconfirmed Mexican grant in the picturesque Sonoma Valley. The heroine, one of the squatter folk, develops from a mannish cowgirl into a lovable woman. The spice of outdoor life in the sunshiny state mingles with the stress and suspense of the time.

"Truly a pastoral, warm with love of nature and clean and wholesome throughout . . . some fine bits of description . . . the love story is quite idyllic."—Boston Transcript.

"Unique, very well done."—Cleveland Plain Dealer.

Another striking novel by a new California author is Charles T. Jackson's Losers Luck, a tale of filibusters who fought for a woman.

LITERARY NOTES.

London's Story of a Wolf-Dog.

Jack London has written another story of the type of "The Call of the Wild" in his new tale of the North, "White Fangs." From his puppyhood, in a pack of Arctic wolves, White Fangs, a wolf with a quarter strain of dog, was the enemy of his kind. For the first five years of his life he was bitter and implacable. As leader of the sled team of Grey Beaver, the Indian, his rips were long remembered for the havoc he wrought amongst the dogs of the Yukon villages. But when he was purchased by a brutal white man, and was goaded and tormented and kept in rage, that he might be exhibited as "The Fighting Wolf," White Fangs became the enemy of all things. A new life begins for him when he is rescued from the jaws of a bulldog by a few white master, who attempts to tame White Fangs by kindness. The task seems hopeless, but in the end he learns to be trustful and law-abiding. And when he takes the long journey to the Santa Clara Valley in California, he comes to be known as the Blessed Wolf, for he saves his master's family from the murderous vengeance of an escaped criminal.

Jack London is at his best when he depicts the primitive in nature. The development of the loved and ferocious White Fangs into an affectionate servant and protector is a thoroughly interesting study, although the narrative is not so impressive as the adventures of the dog in "The Call of the Wild."

The book is illustrated by seven striking pictures in colors by Charles L. Bull.

Moliere and His Times.

When Boileau was asked by Louis XIV what great writer had most honored his reign, he replied, "Moliere, sire." "I think not," Louis said; "but you know better than I." Posterity is confirmed Boileau's judgment. Although the plays of the great French comic dramatist are more familiar out of France than those of Moliere or Racine, there have been but two full and adequate English biographies of Moliere. H. C. Chatfield-Taylor has now written a scholarly and interesting history of the dramatist and his times in "Moliere: A Biography." Mr. Chatfield-Taylor spent fourteen months in research and investigation in Paris, and received material assistance from the French government officials.

Beyond knowing generally that he enjoyed the best training of his times, we know little of Moliere's early life; his first years as a provincial actor are obscure; but from 1658 to 1673 his career is a part of the public history of France. During the latter period one may follow Moliere from day to day. A conspicuous figure in an age of memoirs and letter-writing, the biographer has many contemporaneous sources of information, albeit most of the personal details concerning Moliere are due to enemies. And if Moliere's personality does not come to us halo-crowned, it must be remembered that in the seventeenth century the actor was under a social ban, and the dramatist a player, playwright, and manager from the time he was twenty-one until the evening of death. The author of the present life has lectured everything of value relating to his subject, and as one may not appreciatively read Moliere's comedies without a knowledge of his life, he gives vivid descriptions of the picturesque social, literary and political history of the reign of Louis XIV.

The illustrations are by Jacques Onfroy from original documents and plates in the archives of the Comedie Francaise and the Bibliotheque Nationale.

Colossal Blackmail.

A curious story is "Max Fergus"; one that is decidedly out of the ordinary. It reminds one somewhat of the spirit in which Balzac wrote his "Comedies Humaine," so merciless and unscrupulous is the dissection of the motives of its characters.

The author, Owen Johnson, who will be remembered as the writer of "The Arrows of the Night," has not a vestige of sentimentality. Men and women in his novel are sordid money-worshippers, loving nothing but luxury and power, and nobody but themselves. They are of the class who live by their wits, writhing through life in a tortuous pathway of scheming and deceit. The most highly placed man in the book has, for his great ambition, a colossal scheme for blackmailing all New York. The heroine is a cheap actress who fails in her profession; a selfish, luxurious creature who catches a miser in her matrimonial net, and damns him to eternal misery. In her turn she is a victim, marked for blackmail by a shyster lawyer.

Yet with this soiled and tawdry group for characters the author has built up a work of some power and dignity; one in which the terrible retribution that is compassed by an avenger with an icy heart and a relentless will recalls the march of grim fate in the Greek tragedies.

Across the Highest Sierras.

In his new book of mountain sketches Stewart Edward White takes us once more into the highest California Sierras. "The Pass" is a narrative of a trip across the magnificent snowy crowned peaks and canyon tops whose wonderful panorama the Yosemite-bound traveler sees on the summit, before he dips toward the Valley. This is the wildest and most rugged part of the Sierras, and there is doubtless undiscovered grandeur in its vast wilderness. One result of the trip described in "The Pass" was the discovery of Elizabeth Pass, a short cut between the south fork of the Kings River and the headwaters of the Kaweah. The detail and vividness of the author's pen pictures give one the impression that the book was written in camp.

"The Pass" is illustrated by a frontispiece in color by Fernand Lungren, and ten striking photographs.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

The first complete history of the four centuries of canal agitation and attempts at creation is soon to come from the publishing house of Henry Holt & Co. It is by Dr. Willis Fletcher Johnson, and is entitled "Panama and the Panama Canal."

Lord Rosebery's life of Lord Randolph Churchill has just been brought out in America. In England the work attracted instant and wide attention. It is the story of the career of one titled and famous statesman told by another titled statesman equally famous, and is said to be rich in inside views of English politics.

Joel Chandler Harris will be editor and active manager of a new periodical to be published in Atlanta, Georgia, beginning early in the year, and to be called Uncle Remus's Magazine. The monthly will be illustrated and national, not merely Southern, in scope.

If the plans which have been begun are carried out, the English-speaking world may soon have an opportunity to read in English the works of Juan Antonio Mateos, the celebrated Mexican poet, novelist and orator. His principal romances are "Cerro de la Campanas" (Hill of the Bells), a narrative of events which took place during the French invasion, and "Los Insurgentes" (The Insurgents), another work which deals with the time of the Mexican independence.

One of the charming passages in George Brandes' Reminiscences, just published by Duffield & Company, is his account of an acquaintance in Rome with the American sculptress, Virginia Ream. He draws with much zest a picture of her that is typical of the modern American girl, buoyant, self-confident, free and unconventional. The young girl whom the great critic admired so much had received at fifteen a commission to execute a life-size statue of Abraham Lincoln, and later a heroic statue of Farragut, which stands in Farragut Square, Washington, the only statues ever ordered by the United States Government of a woman. She is now a resident of Washington, having married an officer of the engineer corps, Richard L. Hoxie.

Charles Dickens's daughter, Mrs. Kate Perugini, has written a book about her father and his work. It is called "The Comedy of Charles Dickens."

Ten authors are represented in "Right Reading," the new volume brought out by A. C. McClurg & Co., devoted to good counsel on the choice and use of books, but what is said covers nearly all that can be said on the subjects.

Beatrice Harraden, the English story writer, is leading a crusade against the street noises in London. She has headed determined committees which have besieged the Hampstead borough council in an effort to have the streets paved with wood to lessen the sound of traffic.

It is a somewhat curious coincidence that Mrs. Frances Hodgson Burnett's new story, now running in the Century Magazine, is called "The Shuttle," and Sir Gilbert Parker's novel, appearing serially in Harper's Magazine, is entitled "The Weavers."

During one of Rudyard Kipling's voyages a quartermaster of the ship died. Next day the notice board bore the brief intimation: "Sermon by a layman at 9 p. m." The curious crowd which gathered discovered Kipling standing on an improvised platform, from which he preached a fifteen-minute sermon. The best testimonial to his eloquence lay in the result. From a congregation numbering less than 200 the sum of over $350 was raised.

Common sense in place of metaphysics is said to be the feature of a treatise on "The Principles of English Verse," by Professor Charlton M. Lewis, recently published by Henry Holt & Co. It should commend itself to those who find the simplicity, depth, and beauty, of some of the poets made little of by modern critics.

The unusual spectacle of a father sharply rebuking his son, and that father no less a person than W. T. Stead, is noted in an English exchange. The Fortnightly Review for October contains an article by Alfred Stead on "Pan-Islamism: Some Dangers and a Remedy." Alfred Stead's father, in the Review of Reviews, characterizes the article as "clever but mischievous," and says he read it with concern and surprise. "It is difficult," he writes, "to find a word to express its extreme lack of political common sense."

Kipling's "Kim" has been translated into Chinese by a prominent London scholar, Dr. Crogon.

Mrs. Anne Warner, who has written two books about Susan Clegg, having been persuaded to talk of her work, gives good advice to young authors and confesses that since the beginning of 1902 she has written 249 stories and two books. Previously she had had a joke in Life; had sent a poem to a manuscript bureau, which sold it for $2 and stole a story sent at the same time. The moral of her discourse is that a writer must succeed by merit, and not by favor.

Miss Braddon, after a silence of several years, will shortly publish a new novel, "The White House."

Mrs. Riddell, who died in England a short time ago, had a successful career as a novelist for many years. Her literary reputation was made by "George Geith, of Fen Court," which appeared in 1864, and this book went through many editions. Until 1902 she usually brought out a novel every year. For some years she was editor of the "St. James's Magazine," having succeeded S. C. Hall in that post in 1868. The periodical ceased to appear many years ago.

"Go Tell It to the Marines."

The saying, "Tell it to the marines," is traced to Pepys, the author of the famous "Diary," and it is said by him to have originated with Charles II of England. The reference has been noted by the Army and Navy Journal. "It so befell," as the story goes, "that his light-hearted Majesty, with an exceedingly bored expression on his swarthy face, was strolling in the shade with his ingenious Mr. Pepys, secretary to the admiralty. 'I had speech yesternight at Deptford,' said Mr. Pepys, 'with the captain of the Defiance, who hath but lately returned from the Indies, and who told me the two most wonderful things that ever I think I did hear in my life.' Among the stories told were of fish flying in the air. 'Fish flying in the air,' exclaimed his Majesty. 'Ha! ha! a quaint conceit, which 'twere too good to spoil!' keeping! What ho! sir—he turned and beckoned the colonel, Sir William Killigrew, of the newly raised maritime regiment on foot, who was following in close conversation with the Duke of York—'We would discourse with you on a matter touching your element. What say you, colonel, to a man who swears he hath seen fishes fly in the air?' 'I should say, sire,' returned the sea soldier simply, 'that the man hath sailed in southern seas. For when your Majesty's business carried me thither of late I did frequently observe more flying fish in one hour than the hairs of my head in number.' 'Mr. Pepys,' said he, 'from the very nature of their calling no class of our subjects can have so wide a knowledge of seas and land as the officers and men of our loyal maritime regiment. Henceforth ere ever we cast doubts upon a tale that lacketh likelihood, we will first tell it to the marines.'"

Sophy of Kravonia

By Anthony Hope

In his new novel Anthony Hope returns to romance and in the absorbing vein of The Prisoner of Zenda writes of another mapless little kingdom—Kravonia. Here an English girl is the centre of an exciting story. Court intrigues, conspiracies, daring adventure, and escapes follow one another in quick succession.

"Love and the clash of arms are in this story. The atmosphere is full of the magic of high romance. For its excitement, charm, picturesque and splendid effects, Sophy of Kravonia can never be forgotten."—London Sketch.

Beyond the Rocks

By Elinor Glyn

A captivating new novel by the author of The Visits of Elizabeth. It portrays another sprightly, engaging heroine whose unusual situation commands the reader's interest from the start. The dialogue is bright and amusing; the story depicts a situation that piques the imagination at every turn.

upon the qualifications of Sergeant William J. Murphy, Twenty-eighth Company, Coast Artillery, U. S. A., for the position of sergeant-major, Artillery Corps, junior grade.

Some New York clubs have done very well in Fifth avenue real estate. This is realized by the Lotos Club's sale for $750,000 of the property between Forty-fifth and Forty-sixth streets for which it paid $230,000 only thirteen years ago. In 1905 the New York Club sold a Thirty-fourth-street corner on the avenue for $1,100,000, which was about $207 a square foot. For its old property at Twenty-first street the Union Club received enough money in 1902 to make easy its establishment in a new $550,000 house at Fifty-first street. The Reform Club, with building and campaign debts running over $300,000, put itself $50,000 to the good after the free-silver battle of 1896 by the sale of its place at Fifth avenue and Twenty-seventh street.

VANITY FAIR.

If ever a lost art was represented by a people it is the art of courtesy among those who serve the public in New York city, remarks Editor Bok, of the Ladies' Home Journal, in describing his recent experiences in Manhattan. Motormen, conductors, cabmen, salesmen and even the policemen seem to vie with each other as to who will excel in the art of bad manners. Every question asked is too much, so that a courteous and helpful answer is the exception, and the bewildered stranger is indeed "put to it" to get his bearings in the great "Empire City".

Stand on a New York street corner, for instance, and hail a trolley; car after car will whirl by you with the motormen as absolutely regardless of you as if you did not exist. Four of these cars rushed by me the other day and I jumped on the fifth, took my stand near the motorman and called his attention to four women at the next corner whom he passed.

"Didn't those women want to get on?" I asked.

"They did," was the illuminating answer.

"Don't you stop this car when people want to get on?" I continued.

"I do when I think it's right—see?" he answered, and then turning to me he politely added, "And I can do it without your help, too."

Two blocks farther up the motorman noticed a man standing on the crossing, with two women, hailing the car with one hand while in the palm of the other he showed a quarter! The car stopped instantly; the man got on the front platform, and as he passed the motorman he slipped the quarter into the latter's coat-pocket. The passenger took a seat in the car. I went in and sat next to him.

"Pretty expensive, that sort of thing, isn't it?" I ventured.

"It is," said the man; "but I've found it's about the only way to get these fiends to notice you, and I'm in a hurry."

And so, I thought, it has come to this in New York: twenty-five cents to stop a car and five cents to ride in it!

An old-time lady tried to get on the car, was a little timid, and it took her a moment or two to collect her skirts and take a firm hold on the platform-rail, says Mr. Bok.

"Come on, old lady, step lively," said the conductor. "Can't keep this car waiting all day." And to facilitate her he grabbed the dear old woman by the arm and literally pulled her on, and pushed her into the car! I saw the blood rush to her face, and as she sat opposite to me I could see the flustered state of mind and the hot indignation of that dear old soul.

And that was New York's tribute to old age. "Does this car go to the Pennsylvania Ferry?" asked a woman of the conductor on a Twenty-third Street car.

Not a word of answer, although the conductor had plainly beard.

I insisted that he answer his passenger.

"Well, can't she see for herself?" he scowled. "The sign is on the car, isn't it? Can't she read?"

"Yes," I said, "she can read a sign which you forgot to change from your last run. It reads 'Grand Central Depot.'"

"Well," he dodgily growled, "if you worked as hard as we have today I guess you'd forget a thing or two."

But no apology to the woman; nothing but a brutal indifference to a stranger's polite question and a look as black as a thunder-cloud for me all the way to the ferry!

I went to a theatre box-office and asked for two seats for the evening's performance and their location, continues the Philadelphian.

"Four dollars," came the reply as two tickets were slid under the glass window.

"Let me see the diagram, please," I asked.

"I want to see where the seats are."

"Good seats," came the answer. "Take them or leave them?"

"I'll answer that question, my friend," I replied, "when I see the diagram, and I'll keep this line behind me waiting until I do see it."

And then there was slammed down in front of me the diagram, and the two seats were back of a post, of course!

"That was the right thing to do," said a man in the theatre during the evening. "Those fellows ought to be taught to be polite."

"But why don't you New Yorkers do it?" I asked.

"Oh," he replied, "we're hardened to it. I guess. We don't expect politeness here any more. It's a dead art."

And it is, no doubt of that!

Already lower than any other city in the United States, the standard of good manners is rapidly fading out altogether in New York City. Go to the Brooklyn Bridge any evening between five and six o'clock. Board an elevated car or a subway train at those hours, and see if anything is left but rudeness and rowdyism; not a vestige of even human consideration for woman or child, and the guards and policemen from whom some security is expected are appealed to in vain by frail women and frightened children!

Only the other day I was witness to an inhuman crush which crowded three well-mannered and quiet girls against the off guard-gate on the platform of an elevated railroad car until they shrieked, while the men who created the crush were forgetful of everything save their personal proximity to the girls which the crowding afforded. I watched the guard of the car—he merely winked and smiled at some men standing near him who put the finishing touch to the scene by making coarse jests at the expense of the girls!

Mrs. Rawle Reader, the American millionairess, has just propounded a novel theory for the proper conduct of business. She says that business needs sympathy between employers and employed. To insure this, when she ran a typewriting office in New York, she kissed her sixty girl employees morning and evening. A newspaper, commenting on Mrs. Reader's suggestion, says: "The idea is good, and worth the consideration of business men and women."

Whether male employees would quite take to this policy of embracing is a question, remarks the Manchester Chronicle. It would be unpleasant when a clerk was half an hour late in the morning if he had to go and hug the boss before he started to work. It would be more awkward if he wanted to slip away a little earlier at night and yet knew that the boss would feel slighted if he missed his good-night kiss. Besides, heads of businesses would be apt to over-value their caresses. "No, I can't possibly give you any advance, but I appreciate your services, and you may come and kiss me whenever you go to dinner."

However, in cases where the employees are all ladies, there is more to be said for the policy. In fact, it may be said that sympathetic kissing of lady employees has already been tried by more than one business man.

The American Society of Equity, which its organizers and members frankly admit is a gigantic farmers' trust, has established headquarters in Chicago. The organizers now have 3400 counties in thirty-eight states thoroughly combined, and when the 400 remaining counties are taken in, the trust will be "ready for business." It is proposed to have all orders placed through the society, and prices will be arbitrarily fixed. It is expected to work in harmony with labor unions, each boycotting anything not bearing the label of the other. Half a million farmers are already enrolled in the society, and the promoters say that only speculators will be hurt by the combine. Kentucky is thoroughly organized, with the result that tobacco growers are receiving twice as much for their product as before. Fruit growers, especially, are expected to benefit by the combine, as the society proposes to handle the entire product and demand uniform prices.

To the Policy Holders of the Traders Fire Insurance Company of Chicago.

It is very important. In order to secure immediate and effective action for the benefit of the policy holders in the Traders Insurance Company of Chicago, that those holding claims should combine in their action. With that view, the TRADERS POLICY HOLDERS COMPANY was formed at a general meeting of the policy holders. Its object is not for profit, but for mutual protection at the very lowest cost. Inasmuch as the affairs of the Traders Insurance Company are in the hands of a Receiver, an opportunity is offered to secure prompt and favorable results by united action. If individual claimants act separately, nothing can be accomplished without great delay and enormous expense. For that reason, your co-operation is earnestly requested.

If you desire to be represented in this association, please call at our office, No. 827 Eddy street (Phone Emergency 636) or communicate with the secretary, Mr. John S. Partridge.

STORYETTES.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

An English gentleman had occasion to go to an eminent physician, and said to him: "You will be tired of opening the door to me." "Not at all, sir," was the gracious reply; "you are but a hunit in the bocean." Another James was accustomed to say during his sister's occasional absences: "You had better be hoppedite. There's a very respectable man opposite as we often sends to when Sir William is habsent. His name is Jenner."

A colored preacher took some candidates for immersion down to a river in Louisiana. Seeing the alligators in the stream, one of them objected.

"Why, brother," urged the pastor, "can't you just the Lord? He took care of Jonah, didn't he?"

"Y-a-a-s," admitted the darky, "but a whale's frent. A whale's got a mem-ry, but ef one dem 'gators wus ter swaller dis nigger, he'd jes' ter sleep dar in de sun an' fergit all 'bout it."

Judge John M. Harlan and James B. McCreary canvassed Kentucky together as the Republican and Democratic candidates for Governor thirty years ago.

They traveled about the State on a joint de-ling trip, and in many small mountain places to sleep in the same bed. They were warm personal friends, and so did not object to this intimacy.

One night Mr. Harlan got into bed first. Senator McCreary was not far behind, and just as he entered the bed Judge Harlan raised his body form—he is a large man—and said in his storian voice: "McCreary, there is one thing again, the next Governor of Kentucky is in this bed."

As he spoke the bed slats broke and Judge Harlan rolled to the floor. Senator McCreary caught and held himself in bed, and as Judge Harlan reached the floor, said:

"John, you are right, the next Governor of Kentucky is still in this bed."

During the siege of Kimberley the editor of the locally daily paper there was often hard put to it for enough news. One day in a clubroom he found Cecil Rhodes reading a fairly new paper from Cape Town. He borrowed it and rushed to his own office, where it soon appeared as a special edition, selling like hot cakes. That same evening he met Mr. Rhodes, who inquired: "Where's my Cape Town paper?" "Oh, I cut it up for the printers," was the reply. "Please let me do that again," said Rhodes mildly. "That paper came through by native runners and cost me $1000."

A well-known American writer automobilized through Scotland, and at a hotel in the highlands was treated with the greatest incivility.

"I complain in particular," he said to the manager, "about my waiter in the dining room. The attention and insolence of this man are insupportable."

The manager sought out the waiter, a raw-boned, red-haired highlander.

"Bugal," he said, "the American visitor accuses you of inattention and insolence. What do you say?"

The highlander snorted and hotly replied: "It's no' to be expeckit that a self-respectin' man could wait on him w' civility. Wasna it at said we took to the kilt because our feet were too large to get through trousers?"

Ambassador Leishman at Constantinople, for some weeks after his elevation to ambassadorial rank failed to secure an audience with the Sultan. The other day Assistant Secretary Adece was humorous, and said the situation at Constantinople was like that of a man with a rent in his trousers. The man went into a tailor shop and displayed a sign, "Trousers mended while you wait." He retired to the inner room and gave his trousers to the tailor to fix up.

After waiting about two hours he called to the tailor: "Haven't you fixed those trousers yet?"

"Not yet," replied the tailor.

"Why, what's the matter?" he asked, somewhat impatiently. "Your sign says, 'Trousers mended while you wait.'"

"That's all right," answered back the tailor, "but the slightest trace of a smile, 'you're waiting yet, ain't you?'"

Ambassador Leishman, said Mr. Adece, is still waiting.

A suit recently tried in a Virginia town a lawyer of limited experience was addressed by the jury on a point of law, when, good-naturally, he turned to opposing counsel, a man of much more experience than himself, and asked:

"That's right, I believe, Colonel Hopkins?"

Whereupon, Hopkins, with a smile of conscious superiority, replied:

"Sir, I have an office in Richmond wherein I shall be delighted to enlighten you on any point of law for a consideration."

The youthful attorney, not in the least abashed, took from his pocket a half-dollar piece, which he offered Colonel Hopkins with this remark:

"No time like the present. Take this, sir, tell us what you know, and give me the change."

In a certain town are two brothers, who are engaged in the retail coal business. A noted evangelist visited the town, and converted the elder brother of the firm.

For weeks after his conversion the brother who had lately "got religion" endeavored to persuade the other to join the church. One day, when the elder brother was making another effort he asked:

"Why can't you, Richard, join the church as I did?"

"It's all right for you to be a member of the church," replied Richard, "but if I join who's going to weigh the coal?"

F. K. Gregory, assistant general passenger agent of the Santa Fe, who has his office in the Ferry building, has set a new fashion in railroad circles (says the San Francisco Chronicle).

The winds from the bay are getting chilly, and Gregory has put a small oil stove in his office, at which the officials poke fun, although they occasionally sit around it and get warm.

The stove is placed over in one corner, where a stool formerly stood, and in the darkness it is hard to tell them apart.

"Where's that stove I've been hearing so much about?" said Fred Prince, as he walked into the office.

Gregory was silent, so Prince took a seat, and arose with a howl.

"Did you find it?" asked Gregory, with the ghost of a smile.

In the cook's absence the young mistress of the house undertook, with the help of a green waitress, to get the Sunday luncheon. The flurried maid, who had been struggling in the kitchen with a coffee machine that refused to work, confessed that she had forgotten to wash the lettuce.

"Well, never mind, Eliza. Go on with the coffee, and I'll do it," said the considerate mistress. "Where do you keep the soap?"

An actor in a London lodging house, who had discovered his landlady's propensity for "swiping," numbered and listed his things. One night he roused the household by shouting down from his attic a demand for "No. 8."

"No. 8?" shouted the landlady back. "What No. 8?"

"I want cube No. 8 of my lump sugar," he replied.

Thenceforth the provisions in his cupboard were unmolested.

Specially adapted to Asthmatics; always relieves, generally cures. Brooks' Homoeopathic Cough Syrup; 25c, at druggists.

Once at a dinner Hawke praised the conversational talent of a man across the table. He said to Mr. Field:

"Do you know him?"

"I have met him," Field answered.

"Well, he is a clever chap," Hawke said. "He can talk brilliantly for an hour at a stretch."

"Then, when I met him," said Mr. Field, "it must have been the beginning of the second hour."

At a certain ducal mansion in the early Victorian days economy was the ruling passion of the hosts, and it was impossible for the guests to obtain any coal for their bed-rooms. Remembering his discomfort on this account during a previous visit, one guest brought an extra portmanteau filled with coal. Unfortunately this burst open as it was being carried upstairs, and the contents were scattered. He was never asked again.

President Roosevelt is a lucky man. This Cuban business gives him a fine opportunity to let go the tail of the simplified-spelling bear.—Providence Bulletin.

"What's the matter with these United States?" asks William Allen White in Collier's. Too many dad-burned magazine knockers for one thing, Bill.—Buffalo Evening News.

Mr. Nervous—I love the smell of motor cars! Hostess—Really? What an extraordinary taste! Why do you like it? Mr. Nervous—Because when you smell it you know the danger's past.—Topeka Journal.

"Well, Tommy," said the visitor, "I suppose you like going to school?"

"Oh, yes," answered Tommy, "I like goin' all right, and I like comin' home, but it's stayin' there between times that makes me tired."—Chicago News.

"They say you allow your husband to carry a latchkey now." "So I do. But the key doesn't fit the door. I just let him carry it to humor him. He likes to show it to his friends, you know, and make them think he's independent."—Los Angeles Times.

Footpad (with revolver)—Hold up yer hands! Victim—You can go through me if you want to, but I'll be dad-dinged if I'm going to hold up my hand any more! I'm tired of doing it. You're the third since I left the lodge.—Chicago Tribune.

An applicant for the post of mistress in a country school was asked: "What is your position in regard to the whipping of children?" She replied: "My usual position is on a chair with the child held firmly across my knees, face downward!"—Rural World.

"If ye please, mum," said the ancient hero, in an appealing voice, as he stood at the back door of the cottage on washday, "I've lost my leg —" "Well, I ain't got it," snapped the woman fiercely. And the door closed with a bang.—Ladies Home Journal.

A Bostonian died, and when he arrived at St. Peter's gate he was asked the usual questions: "What is your name, and where are you from?" The answer was, "Mr. So-and-So, from Boston." "You may come in," said St. Peter, "but I know you won't like it."—Hoboken News.

"Well," said the optimist, "I suppose you are through kicking about the warm weather."

"Oh, yes," responded the pessimist cheerfully. "I'm kicking about the cold weather now. That's the good point about the weather. You can nearly always kick."—Louisville Courier-Journal.

"My dear," said the caller, with a winning smile, to the little girl who occupied the study while her father, an eminent literary man, was at his dinner, "I suppose you assist your papa by entertaining the bores?" "Yes, sir," replied the little girl gravely; "please be seated."—Washington Journal.

"For some time past I've been buying a dozen eggs every week at this store, and I invariably find two bad ones in every dozen. Something's got to be done about it," said an irate housekeeper. "Well," said the new clerk naively, and with a quiet smile, "mebbe if you only bought half-a-dozen you'd only get one bad one."—Grocer's Literary Gazette.

"Did ye get damages fer being in that railway accident, Bill?"

"Sure; fifty dollars for me and fifty fer the missus."

"The missus? I didn't hear she was hurt." "She wasn't; but I had the presence o' mind to fetch her one on the head with me foot."—Harper's Weekly.

Martha's mistress often boasts of her readiness of resource. "The best nursemaid in town," she calls her. One day she came home from a drive, to be confronted with the startling news that the baby had swallowed a button.

"And what did you do, Martha?" she asked in some anxiety, although trusting that it had been the right thing.

"Why," said Martha, "I made him swallow a button-hole right away!"—Youth's Companion.

Wilbur J. Carr, of the State Department, had occasion to call at the house of a neighbor late at night. He rang the doorbell. After a long wait a head was poked out of a second-floor window.

"Who's there?" asked a voice.

"Mr. Carr," was the reply.

"Well," said the voice as the window banged shut, "what do I care if you missed a car? Why don't you walk and not wake up people to tell them about it?"—New York World.

Mrs. Reginald DeKoven said of a certain piece of cruelty: "It reminds me of the action of a Chicago girl. 'Why have you thrown over

Mr. Smith?' a friend said to this girl reproachfully. 'Oh,' she replied, 'I could never marry a man with a crooked leg.' 'What made his leg crooked?' 'I ran over it with my motor car.'"—Woman's Home Companion.

A Man Against a State.

There has just come from the press a volume containing the memoirs of the late John H. Reagan, once Postmaster-General of the Southern Confederacy. Judge Reagan was a bitter hater of "the Abolitionists," and an ardent secessionist. Yet when imprisoned at the close of the war he wrote, from Fort Warren, his place of confinement, an earnest address to the Southern people and the people of his State. In this he urged them to submit to the abolition of slavery, to the enfranchisement of the negro, and to the other measures of reconstruction, which he saw were inevitable.

Judge Reagan had been widely loved and honored. His this unpalatable advice was ill received. So ill was it received that it is not exaggeration to say that from the day of its utterance until he was in his grave Judge Reagan was never fully forgiven by the people of his State and the people of the South. Yet it was good advice. It was true. It was wise. And events have shown that his prophecies were infallible.

What is the duty of a public man in the United States? Should he do that which is right? Or that which is popular? Should he follow the dictates of his own conscience? Or should he obey blindly the cries of the fickle people? Shall he run counter to the will of the people, as did Secretary William H. Seward in 1862 when he released Mason and Slidell, the Confederate commissioners wrongfully taken by us on the high seas, and thereby prevented war with Great Britain? Or shall he run counter to his own wishes and his own wisdom, and yield to popular clamor, as did William McKinley in 1898, when he reluctantly consented to a war with Spain?

In a recent periodical Senator Culberson of Texas has an interesting chapter from the inside of Secession. It details some of the events in Texas at the outbreak of the Civil War. It is the first time we have seen these happenings set down in detail, and we think they are probably little known outside of that State.

It must not be forgotten that Texas occupied a very different position in the Federal Union from any other commonwealth. The old colonies had banded together in fear of Great Britain. Louisiana had been purchased. California had been conquered. Texas had herself won her independence from Mexico with the sword. She had existed as an independent republic from 1836 to 1845. She had come into the Union of States full armed in all the panoply of an independent State which had won her own independence. She was not one of the original thirteen colonies which had been held together by a compact against Great Britain. She was not one of the later States which were carved out from the colonies as was Maine from Massachusetts, or as the Middle Western States were cut from the "Western Reserve Territory" of Connecticut and other New England States. Nor was Texas one of the western tier of trans-montane Southern States, which had once formed part of the southern coast colonies. In short, Texas was an independent republic which had become a part of the United States at her own request and desire.

Traces of her independence are still found in her organic law. In the other States of the Union the public lands belong to the Federal Government. In Texas they belong to the State. In other commonwealths two sections of every township are devoted to the public schools. Texas may devote all of the proceeds of the public lands in a township to public schools or other public buildings if she so elects. Furthermore, Texas has reserved to herself the control of her own boundaries. She can refuse to be cut up into smaller States by the Federal Government unless she so desires. Neither can she be annexed to another State without the consent of her own people. In that respect she differs from the people of Arizona and New Mexico. If those Territories had won their freedom from Mexico with the sword as did Texas, and had they come into the Union as Texas did, they would not occupy today their present abject condition. For although this Union of ours is ostensibly made up of self-governing communities, it seems as if the fate of Arizona and New Mexico may depend entirely on the will of the President and Congress. Let us hope it is not so.

When the mutterings of Civil War were heard in 1860 Sam Houston was Governor. He was a Virginian; a veteran of the Creek Indian War; had been a Representative in Congress from Tennessee; a Governor of Tennessee; General and Commander-in-Chief of the Texan Army which won independence from Mexico; twice President of the Republic of Texas; United States Senator; finally Governor of the State of Texas. His inaugural message to the Legislature on January 14, 1860, expressed warm attachment to the Union. But the election of Lincoln led the secessionists to make violent demands on him to assemble the Legislature in extra session. This he finally did on January 21, 1861. In the meantime a convention was called coming directly from the people. This convention Governor Houston repeatedly denounced as unauthorized. Yet both Legislature and convention assembled in the same city at the same time.

Strong efforts were made, both North and South, to win over Governor Houston and the State of Texas. But Governor Houston remained steadfast for the Union. He called together a number of gentlemen who, like himself, were opposed to secession, and informed them that he had a special message from Mr. Lincoln; it was that at a proper time the President would land a large body of Federal troops on the Texas coast, if Governor Houston would undertake to hold the State in the Union. He called for the opinion of the youngest man present, according to the usage of councils of war. This gentleman urged the acceptance of President Lincoln's proposition. Mr. Culberson, the next youngest, differed; he said that no force of troops could prevent the secession of Texas; that as secession and war were inevitable, Texas, by reason of its great distance from the seat of war, would escape many of its horrors; but that if Federal troops were landed the State would at once become the theatre of active hostilities, and the land be devastated by fire and sword. The council finally accepted this view. General Houston said to them: "Gentlemen, I have asked your advice and I will take it, but if I were twenty years younger I would accept Mr. Lincoln's proposition and endeavor to keep Texas in the Union."

The people's convention finally adopted an ordinance of secession on February 21st, 1861. It was ratified by the people of Texas on February 23d by a vote of about forty thousand against fourteen thousand. General Houston issued a proclamation on March 4th stating the result of the vote, and on March 5th an ordinance was passed uniting Texas to the Southern Confederacy. The secession convention passed an ordinance ordering all State officials to swear to support the Southern Confederacy. As Governor Houston declined to do so, he was formally deposed March 16th, 1861. When Edward Clark, the Lieutenant Governor, and an intimate personal and political friend, entered the executive office and demanded its archives, Houston wheeled slowly in his chair, faced him, and asked with deliberate scorn: "What is your name, sir?"

During this secession controversy General Houston, who was a popular orator of a high order, spoke repeatedly in different parts of the State. At times he was hissed, and once a group of young women showed such disapprobation of his remarks that he said: "These young ladies here do not appreciate the import of the present crisis, but I tell them that before their sweethearts return from the impending war the valleys of the South will run with blood." He was a master of stump speaking and bitter invective. Once while addressing a large audience he was interrupted and asked what he thought of a certain politician; without hesitation he replied: "He has every characteristic of a dog except fidelity."

It is a striking commentary on the gratitude of republicans that there is no monument over Houston's grave. In this land of free thought and free speech, it is a warning to men who support that which they believe to be right yet which they know to be unpopular. It is a warning to such men of what their fate may be. The sole recognition and reward that General Sam Houston received after his death from the people of Texas was an ordinance providing that the remainder of his salary as Governor should be paid to his widow.

It is a pathetic picture, that of this fine old veteran struggling against his State, for while he was attached to the Union he passionately loved his State. During the dark days of the Civil War he lived in retirement, and died on July 23, 1863.

What is the moral of these bits of history? In great crises, what shall an American statesman do? Shall he do that which he believes to be right, even if unpopular, and wreck his career? Or shall he stifle his conscience, do that which he believes to be wrong yet knows to be popular, and die loved and honored?

Abnormal Criminals.

During the carnival of crime which has prevailed in San Francisco for a number of weeks, a certain series of brutal crimes terrified the community and puzzled the police. These were usually perpetrated in the day-time and were the work of two men, who would enter a bank, shop, or other place of business, with a third on guard outside. One of the first of these crimes was the robbery of a Japanese bank and the murder of its manager, M. Munekata. In this affair two men entered the bank ostensibly to cash a check; while the manager was examining it one of them beat in his skull with a gas-pipe, killing him, while the other attacked another Japanese in the bank with a similar bludgeon, leaving him senseless. They then took what cash was in sight and fled. In the case of William Friede, the two men entered his shop under the pretense of buying goods; this unfortunate man was also beaten with a gas-pipe and left dying while his assailants robbed the store and fled. The murder of John Pfitzner was conducted in exactly the same way. William Gillian's hardware store was attacked by the same thugs, but they failed to murder the store-keeper. J. H. Dockweiler, a civil engineer, was held up on the street and robbed, and his description of his assailants tallied with that given by the few who thought they had seen the gas-pipe thugs of the store robberies. Ex-Coroner Leland, who was also held up and robbed, gave a description of his assailants which strongly resembled that of the gas-pipe criminals. For the robbery of Leland a man named James Sutton is now serving a forty-year sentence in San Quentin prison.

For weeks the police moved heaven and earth to find some clue to the perpetrators of these cold-blooded and cowardly crimes. They made a number of arrests, but in every case failed to find conclusive proof. That the thugs were finally caught is not due to the skill of the police, but entirely to the dogged courage of their latest victim. Last week three men entered the jewelry store of Wm. Behrend on Steiner Street in San Francisco and asked to see some watch chains. The dealer was on the look-out for thieves, and had a revolver and a club lying on the shelf behind the counter. But when he was tendered a twenty-dollar gold piece he naturally turned to his safe against the wall to get the change. The moment he did so the three men rushed behind the counter and began beating him over the head, one with a gas-pipe wrapped in a newspaper, another with a piece of railroad iron. Although Behrend was bleeding freely and half-dazed, he clung to two men with his hands, got the finger of another in his teeth, and fought with all three through the little store, until all four fell out on the sidewalk, crashing through the window. The noise of the breaking glass at once attracted the attention of two plain-clothes policemen who were off duty in a saloon across the street; these at once rushed to the scene. Two of the thugs had fled, but the one with whom Behrend had grappled was unable to disengage himself. He was arrested, and the unfortunate jeweler was taken to the hospital.

When the criminal was taken to the police station he was found to be a mere youth. It was not long before he broke down under the process of police "sweating." He gave his name as Louis Dabner. He confessed that he and a man named Siemson or Simpson were the perpetrators of the series of crimes above enumerated. From Dabner's confession the police learned that Simpson is a half-caste Kanaka, the son of a German father and a Hawaiian mother; that he is a man of good education and some accomplishments; that he had served in the United States Army in the Philippines, was habituated to the use of weapons, and is a desperate criminal. Dabner, who made the confession, is only eighteen years old, and six months ago was a pupil in the High-School at Petaluma, a little city in rural California. He became acquainted with Simpson while they were working at a stable, and he claims that the half-caste led him into a criminal career.

It is remarkable that this series of desperate crimes is not the work of old and hardened villains—it turns out to have been committed by two young men who are native products. The police have darkly intimated that dangerous "strong-arm men" had arrived here from the East in gangs; the labor unions asserted that the carnival of crime was the work of strike-breakers imported by the United Railroads. Yet both are wrong; it now develops that the criminals are both products of the Pacific; one comes from a primitive little island in the ocean, recently annexed, and the other is a school boy from a pastoral little California town.

The half-caste Kanaka seems to be a bloody-minded monster. In Hawaii there is no lack of indigenous criminals who are sent "to the reef," as they say down there. But the ordinary Kanaka criminal seems to be more of a moral idiot than a monster. He seems to have little sense of what is right and wrong, but he does not seem to have a taste for hideous and cruel crimes unless he is inflamed with native or foreign intoxicants. Still, he is possessed of great physical strength, is of a rudimentary mind, is a moral idiot, and is a dangerously potential criminal. Such a being when crossed with the criminal blood of a higher race naturally becomes more dangerous. Such is the half-caste Simpson. He would seem to possess German brutality, thoroughness, and determination, which blood has been blended with the Kanaka strength, madness, and absence of all moral ideas. In short, he is a dangerous animal, all the more dangerous because he has received some of the training of civilization. He seems to be absolutely destitute of any feeling of morality or any sense of shame. He boasts of his crimes; when confronted with his victims he tells them that they were "lucky they threw up their hands."

The story told by these two young criminals is indeed extraordinary. They spent their money like drunken sailors ashore. They have been living as lodgers in the house of a respectable shoe dealer, who treated them in the most friendly manner. In return they had learned the combination of his safe in order to have it to fall back on in case of need. They had made the acquaintance of another family with two young daughters, one of whom the Kanaka half-caste secretly married. They were in the habit of taking these girls to a "manicure parlor" which was apparently used by them as headquarters for their bloody deeds. On the day of the attack on the jeweler Behrend, the Kanaka took his girl wife to this manicure parlor. He left her there at one o'clock, and returned at half-past one with a bleeding finger mutilated by the jeweler's teeth; this he explained on the ground that he had been "held up and robbed." He even had the amazing effrontery to go with this story to police headquarters, wishing to pick up information about his pals. The gang was carefully watching a rich widow who owned the property where the manicure parlor is situated, and who was in the habit of frequenting it. As she always went about loaded with jewels, they had determined, on a favorable opportunity, to rob the woman, but circumstances had as yet prevented them from doing so.

There has been a great deal of windy talk in San Francisco about vigilance committees, lynching, and hanging to lamp posts. We would suggest that here is an excellent opportunity for this city to give to criminals a long rope and a short shift. Usually a criminal trial in San Francisco extends over many months and sometimes years. Not long ago there were some sixteen unhung murderers in the county jail. Some of them had been there for several years. A little of the energy which, misdirected, would lynch criminals and bring shame on the city, might, judiciously applied to the judges and juries, succeed in hanging these young criminals in a few weeks instead of in a few years.

Elections in the East.

Throughout the country generally the Republicans have carried the day except in New York State. The Charles E. Hughes, Republican nominee for Governor is at the head of the poll, but the Democratic State ticket has been elected by about 60,000 majorities. Hearst, the head of the ticket, received about 60,000 plurality in Greater New York, but Hughes came out the Bronx with a plurality of about 120,000, which Hearst failed to overcome.

The causes ascribed for the defeat of the head of the fusion ticket are diverse. Many Republicans ascribe it to the direct personal interposition of President Roosevelt. But were this true it seems to us that all, or nearly all, of the Republican State ticket would have been elected along with Hughes. Others ascribe Hearst's defeat to the farmers in rural New York. Outside the cities the rural voters, both Democratic and Republican, are said to have voted for Hughes in large numbers through their dislike for Hearst. But this reason seems to us open to the same objection as that ascribing Hearst's defeat to the personal influence of President Roosevelt. If the farmers voted so largely for Hughes through their fear and dislike of Hearst, why did they swallow Hearst's followers? Why did they vote for Hearst ticket? The ticket was largely the work of Hearst. To our thinking the explanation of Hearst's defeat is Tammany treachery. Murphy agreed to support Hearst, but he either could not or would not deliver the goods. McClellan, McCarron, and their followers fought Hearst bitterly. Therefore, the election of the Republican candidate as Governor of New York is not so much a Republican victory as it is a Hearst defeat.

Throughout the country at large the Republican gubernatorial majorities have been very good for an year. The newly elected House of Representatives for the Sixtieth Congress will contain 222 Republicans and 164 Democrats, a Republican majority of 57. The Fifty-ninth Congress contains 249 Republicans and 137 Democrats, a Republican majority of 112. The Democrats have gained twenty-seven members.

The Argonaut takes great pleasure in recording that Gompers and his gang have been signally routed at the polls. Their defeat was foreshadowed by the return of Congressman Littlefield in Maine. Speaker Cannon was marked out by Gompers for slaughter, yet he had been elected by 2,000 more majority than two years ago. And so with most of the other candidates whose door-lintels were sprinkled with blood by Gompers.

San Francisco's Water Question.

The question of a water supply for San Francisco has been a firebrand in municipal politics for a quarter of a century. It does not seem to have been improved by the events of last April. At that time the earthquake put the Spring Valley Water Company partially out of commission by the rupture of its principal mains. The water company has since struggled vigorously to rehabilitate its system, and has measurably succeeded. But there is a deep-rooted belief on the part of the citizenry that the enormous loss by fire was due to the breaking of the Spring Valley mains. This belief has led the public to consider the replacement of the old system a new one more favorably than ever before.

Some months ago there were offered to the city five practicable sources of mountain water supply. The best sources which seemed most prominent were the Tuolumne system, controlled by James D. Phelan and his associates, and the Bay Cities Water Company's project controlled by W. S. Tevis and his associates. In the "era of good feeling" which followed the great disaster the Board of Supervisors called upon three eminent engineers to consider and report on the merits and availability of these respective claims. The gentlemen called were Major Charles H. McKinstry, Corps of Engineers, U. S. A.; Professor S. D. Marx, of the faculty of Stanford University, and Mr. A. M. Hunt, prominent engineer of Berkeley, Alameda County. These names met with immediate favor. All three were men of high standing in their profession, and all three were practically free from any local surroundings which might affect the impartiality of their judgment. Major McKinstry, by reason of his position in the army, is necessarily a citizen of the whole country rather than of any one locality, although his family has been for years a prominent one in San Francisco, and his father once occupied a seat on the Supreme Bench of California. Professor Marx is a member of the faculty of an institution which, while situated in California, is national in its scope, and he has no more marked interest in San Francisco than any other citizen dwelling in another place could have. So, too, with Mr. Hunt. These three gentlemen accepted the charge somewhat reluctantly. There went with it no pecuniary compensation, and their experience of men must have told them that it would be a thankless task. Doubtless their sympathy for the stricken city may have impelled them to take up the burden.

Then an extremely odd circumstance occurred—the San Francisco Supervisors at once appropriated $250 for the expenses of this Board of Engineers. While no one expected that their expenses would be very large, such a petty sum would not pay for a stenographer's services or for postage stamps. The appropriation looked inauspicious.

The weeks rolled on, and there were a number of executive meetings of the Supervisors, but nothing was given to the public about the water question. Suddenly the Board of Engineers resigned, unanimously, and without giving any explanation as a board. But it leaked out that the Board of Supervisors approached the Board of Engineers shortly after their appointment and informed them that but one source of supply would be considered. This (according to the Chronicle) was the project of the Bay Cities Water Company. From this it naturally followed that the Board of Engineers would be obliged to confine their functions to considering and reporting on the availability of this proposition alone. The friends of the Board of Engineers say that inasmuch as this amounted to forcing them to endorse a single proposition which might not be the best of the five, and as they were not afforded an opportunity of examining into the merits of all of the five, they determined to resign at once, without expressing any unfavorable opinions concerning the Bay Cities water project, but also without endorsing it or any other. They believed that it was their duty to the people of San Francisco to examine into all and to recommend the best.

These events were followed in not many days by an article in the San Francisco Bulletin, signed by James D. Phelan, in which he practically asserted that the Bay Cities water scheme was a "job"; that it involved the payment by the city of San Francisco of over ten million dollars; that much of this money was to be corruptly used, and that the scheme which he and his associates represented was to be placed at the disposal of the people of San Francisco practically without cost. This communication was answered by Mr. W. S. Tevis, president of the Bay Cities Water Company, who denounced Mr. Phelan and the editor of the Bulletin as "liars and slanderers."

Immediately thereafter, in the midst of the campaign, there was advertised an "Indignation Mass Meeting in Hamilton Hall," at which the citizens were called together to denounce the action of the Board of Engineers. This call was signed "John E. Bennett," who is an attorney of the Bay Cities Company. Only one paper reported the meeting, the Chronicle; the other papers did not notice it. Mr. Bennett (according to the Chronicle's report) addressed a very small gathering, and denounced, in unmeasured terms, those persons who were attacking the Bay Cities Company's water scheme. He insinuated (as reported by the Chronicle) "that Engineers Marx, Hunt, and McKinstry had resigned from the water commission in obedience to Spring Valley influence." The Board of Engineers have not as yet replied, as a board, to this accusation. Professor Marx, however (as reported in the Examiner), thus stated:

The Supervisors designed to limit the Board of Engineers to two or three weeks and to confine the scope to one water scheme. I met the water committee in the office of Mayor Schmitz; with them came Mr. Ruef, and it was with Ruef that I carried on my entire conversation. I do not remember that any member of the water committee made any remark of note during the entire time. The committee apparently took it for granted that Ruef was carrying on the negotiations. Mr. Ruef said that the number of propositions should be reduced to one, and that this should be reported on within two or three weeks. I left the committee within a few moments after that, and on the Wednesday following, after a meeting with Major McKinstry and Mr. Hunt, we did the only thing we could as honest men, and handed in our resignations.

John E. Bennett, in his speech at the mass meeting referred to, and in numerous advertisements since in the daily papers, concerning the people who speak slighting-ly of his clients, says:

They invent their falsehoods to distract public attention from the water situation, to submerge the city administration with filth, and to utterly destroy public faith and confidence in it, so that they may feel safe that one-third of the voters will vote against the water bonds which these same Supervisors and the Mayor who are being so defamed must submit to the electorate. Yet the Spring Valley Water Company's market for its insufficient quantity of inferior water is gone, and the value of its stocks and bonds is sadly depreciated. Is it not then probable that that company and those whose interests lie with it would do all they possibly could to make these engineers feel that they were liable to discredit themselves by in any way facilitating the city authorities in their search for a source of supply for the municipal water system?

That is about the present situation, as it is to be gleaned from the daily papers. Of course, we need not say that these extremely inflammatory statements are not given on the authority of the Argonaut. They are merely set forth as given in the daily press. The latest rumor is one set forth in the Call to the effect that the Spring Valley plant would soon be acquired by the city at a high figure; that Abraham Ruef, Mayor Schmitz, and Acting-Mayor Gallagher had been purchasing Spring Valley stock; that powerful outside interests had been interested in "cornering" Spring Valley stock; that Walker Brothers, the Salt Lake bankers, and Ladenburg & Thalmann, the New York bankers, had also been financing this deal. The Call even goes so far as to say that "these outside influences which have been gathering in Spring Valley stock are not unfriendly to the Bay Cities project." The implication is that the Bay Cities Company, if it made a deal with the city, would probably have to purchase the distributing system and the city reservoirs of the Spring Valley Company, which would be almost indispensable to any new water company.

Ever Faithful Alaska.

We have received the first number of a handsomely printed periodical entitled "The Boston Alaskan." As its name implies, it is devoted to the interests of Alaska, and the titles of some of the articles are as follows: "The Alaska of the Tourists," "The Agricultural Possibilities of Alaska," "The Story of Mining in Alaska," "The Church's Activity in Alaska," "Alaska's Fisheries," and similar subjects. It is published by the Boston Alaska Society, whose constitution says: "This Society, being founded on a recognition of the fact that the time has arrived for a steady advance in the development of Alaska, should have for its objects the dissemination of truth about a section of the country hitherto misrepresented and misunderstood."

We extend our good wishes to the new journal and the society which publishes it. We sincerely hope that they may accomplish their ends. Uncle Sam talks so much about his desire to build up his new and old territories that the Boston Alaskan Society is doubtless enthusiastic over the outlook.

But there rises up the memory of another journal, published some thirty or thirty-five years ago, which was also "devoted to the development of Alaska," which also intended to "disseminate the truth about a section of the country hitherto misunderstood," and which was called, if we remember rightly, "The Alaska Appeal." Furthermore, it was not edited in Boston, but in Alaska. Its head was not the Honorable John G. Brady, President of the Alaska Society, but it was presided over by one Ivan Petroff, who was a Russian by birth, and if we mistake not, became an American citizen by the cession of Alaska to the United States. Naturally, he was earnestly devoted to the upbuilding of what was perhaps his native land. But in the flight of a third of a century the Alaska Appeal is dead, perhaps Ivan Petroff is dead, and Alaska is still sleeping, waiting for Uncle Sam attired as Prince Charming to prink gaily over the tundra and wake her up.

Our compliments to Editor Brady and the Boston Alaskan. We hope he will succeed better than Editor Petroff and the Alaska Appeal.

War Department Report on the April Disaster.

The War Department has issued the report of General A. W. Greeley on the relief operations of the military around San Francisco at the time of the April disaster. With it is incorporated the report of General Funston, who was in command from April 16 to April 22, when he was superseded by General Greeley, who promptly returned from his leave, leaving the wedding of his daughter unattended. The report is the only precise and detailed narrative of the events immediately following the earthquake and fire that has yet been printed. General Greeley chronicles that during the three days of disaster there were "only nine deaths by violence. Of these, two were killed by National Guardsmen, one was shot by members of a so-called 'Citizens' Vigilance Committee,' one by a police officer for looting, and one by the combined action of a special police officer and a marine. The remaining four deaths of unknown parties occurred at places not occupied by the regular army."

There has been much question as to the hour when the flames appeared in certain quarters of the city; the hour when certain blocks were attacked by the flames; the hour when certain buildings were dynamited, by whom, and under whose orders; the result of the dynamiting, and whether it checked the flames or not. Very many of these questions are answered in this report. The military officers seem in nearly every case to have exacted written orders from the civil authorities before destroying buildings. When the authority was conflicting or in doubt, they required verbal orders from the Mayor, or the Board of Works, or the Fire Department officials in the presence of witnesses. Lists of buildings demolished appear in this report with the orders for destruction appended as Exhibits A, B, C, D, etc. For example, the permission to dynamite the Phelan Building, the Odd Fellows Building, Prager's Building, the Academy of Sciences Building, the Masonic Temple, and other structures, is addressed "Captain Coleman, Officer in Charge Dynamiting Squad," is dated April 26, 1906, and is signed "J. A. Deneen, J. Mahoney, George F. Duffey, Members of the Building Committee." The dynamiting of many other buildings and blocks of buildings is thus authorized by the municipal authorities. The demolition of the Concordia Club, which shattered some dwellings opposite, is also touched upon, and it is stated in the report that it was done "by the authority of the Sub-Committee on Buildings, presided over by George F. Duffey." The value of keeping records in the methodical manner required in the Army and Navy is strikingly shown in this report. There is scarcely anything the troops did during those dreadful days in which the date and the hour is not set down—from the arrival of the two companies of engineers who marched from Fort Mason to department headquarters, arriving at 7:45 A. M., April 18, to "General Order No. 42," withdrawing the United States troops, and dated July 2.

This report will doubtless be supplemented by the reports of civilian bodies, such as the United States Coast Survey, the State Geological Survey, and others. We advise those interested to secure these reports in time, as they may not be reprinted, and will almost certainly become rare. They are extremely valuable historical documents.

Japanese in American Schools.

As the Administration has been good enough to interest itself in California's way of conducting her public schools, it is no more than neighborly that California should interest herself in the way in which the Administration conducts the Nation's schools at West Point and Annapolis. The Administration does not believe that we ought to exclude Japanese children from the schools conducted by the white citizens of California for their white children. California does not agree with the Administration in its policy of benevolent assimilation as applied to American and Japanese children. Nor does California agree with the Administration in its further ideas of benevolent assimilation as exemplified in taking Japanese youths into the military and naval schools of the United States. A Japanese cadet has just been permitted to resign at Annapolis. The reason is not stated officially. It is given out extra officially that the young man was not able to keep up to the standard. This we very much doubt. Whatever other allegations may have been brought against the Japanese, we have never heard them accused of being dull. The Japanese cadet was probably not dropped because he was not smart enough. We think he was probably dropped because he was too smart. If he was behind-hand in his studies, it was probably because he was over-worked in writing letters back to his dear old home. We would suggest to President Roosevelt, to Secretary of the Navy Bonaparte, and to Secretary of State Root that after they have finished straightening out matters in the public schools of California, they turn their attention to the military schools of the United States. After they have studied the Japanese students there and looked into the number of Japanese "servants" on American warships, they may find that instead of trying to force Japanese pupils into the public schools of California, they had better lay aside their own policy of training Japanese students in our ships and military schools in the art of war.

The California Campaign.

James Norris Gillett has been elected Governor of California by a plurality of about 14,000. Those who consider this a small plurality may be reminded that it is some 12,000 larger than Pardee got four years ago. Furthermore, Dr. Pardee had the loyal support of Mr. Gillett and the entire Republican party, while Mr. Gillett did not have the loyal support of Dr. Pardee. To this we may add that the daily press of San Francisco were very indifferent toward Mr. Gillett's candidacy—not to say treacherous. If the conductors of those journals should claim that they had done nothing to help elect Gillett's opponents, we have only to reply that nine-tenths of the hostile campaign material we have seen printed in the Democratic press was copied from the San Francisco Chronicle and the San Francisco Call. In fact, so indifferent—not to say disloyal—was the conduct of these so-called Republican papers that it would have excited apprehension in the minds of many Republicans were it not known that their influence works backward. Therefore, we are glad to be able to chronicle this curious fact, that when Dr. Pardee four years ago was supported by the San Francisco Republican dailies, he lost San Francisco by nearly ten thousand votes; that this year, when Gillett was practically abandoned by the San Francisco dailies, he defeated his opponents by a plurality of twelve hundred votes in a labor-union stronghold.

Here we may be pardoned for remarking that we are especially gratified at the shape this election took for these reasons: The Argonaut did not agree with its Republican contemporaries as to the issue in this campaign. We did not believe that the people were paying any attention to "the railroad" roorback raised by the opposition. The people did not believe that Gillett had been nominated by "the railroad," or that he was controlled by any boss, or that he had promised the State patronage to Ruef and Schmitz. We did not believe that the people paid the slightest heed to these assertions. We sincerely believed and said that Gillett's nomination was brought about by the ardent and assiduous crusade begun by his friend George Knight long before Gillett returned from Congress to California. If Walter Parker, Judge McKinlay, and the railroad forces from Southern California fell in behind the Gillett band and finally climbed into the Gillett bandwagon, it was because they thought that he would lead the Republican hosts to victory. It is our belief that Mr. Gillett is not tied up in any way to any boss or bosses, or to any corporation or organization.

Thus, therefore, the Argonaut believed that the issue was not "the railroad," but that it was the defense of our present system of a government by the people against a threatened system of Government by Organized Labor. A labor union conspiracy was plotting to replace our republican system of government by a system of class government. The Argonaut at once denounced this plot to seize the government of a great State. We denounced the foreign labor leaders like Compers, who attempted from a distance of three thousand miles to dictate to the citizens of California who should govern them. And we denounced the local labor leaders, like McCarthy, Parry, and Tveitmoe who were using the masses of less intelligent workmen to further their own ends and to feather their own nests.

Our denunciations excited alarm among some of our Republican contemporaries. A certain number urged upon us the wisdom of silence on this topic. Others attacked us for our "hostility to labor," and loudly proclaimed their own devotion to the sacred cause of unionism and Comperism, while they hysterically scratched, squalled, and spat at the Democrats who were solemnly adjusting the perforated pumpkin-lantern of their railroad roorback.

But the Argonaut insisted on forcing the issue. We showed that Bell was indorsed by the State Convention of the Union Labor party; that he thereby became the Organized Labor nominee; that he thus stood on the platform of Organized Labor; that his indorsement was jobbed through by its leaders; that in the event of election, he would necessarily call to power such men as McCarthy, Parry, Tveitmoe, and other local labor leaders. This was so plain and incontrovertible that our further query as to how the State of California would like to be ruled by such men, met with no reply from the Democrats, and only with abuse from the labor union leaders.

We pointed to the terrible condition to which a government by Organized Labor had reduced San Francisco in five years; we showed that there was no safety for life, limb, or property in the State's chief city under a Government by Organized Labor; we recalled how California twelve years ago was ruled by Organized Labor for three weeks, and how a great State then lay paralyzed and helpless under the foot of brigandage; we pointed out that such a fate was waiting California if she chose again to place herself under the control of Organized Labor. To these statements there came no reply. Our faint-hearted Republican contemporaries ceased to sermonize the Argonaut, but were still too timid to talk of anything except to repel the insinuations of railroad influence.

One of these, in remonstrating with this journal's tone, said: "The Argonaut will array Organized Labor against the Republican party. It is not the policy of any of Mr. Gillett's friends to place him in a false position by making appeals which can be construed as hostile to the interests and aims of the working class." This and similar diatribes almost led us to fear that the Argonaut was doing harm rather than good to Gillett's candidacy. So far did the reproaches of Republican journals go that we felt ourselves forced to make a disavowal of being an inspired organ. The San Francisco Star, the Sacramento Bee, and other journals spoke of the Argonaut as a "Gillett organ," as "the mouth-piece of the candidate," etc. As our utterances were entirely uninspired, and as we had no acquaintance with and no communication with Mr. Gillett, we assured the press, Republican and Democratic, that what we said represented our own convictions only.

Fortunately for our peace of mind, there came solace at the end. During the closing days of the campaign Mr. Gillett, in a public speech, when informed that he had been hissed in a labor union meeting in San Francisco, said:

Thank God that audience hissed my name and did not cheer it. If there could have been any question in the minds of honest men as to where I stood, that hissing must have dissipated it. If Bell were to be elected Governor he would undoubtedly turn over to the leaders of this labor union meeting the control of the State government, just as the control of the government of San Francisco has been turned over to them. Bell would have to reward McCarthy, Tveitmoe, and Parry, and he would have to turn over the State to them as such a reward. God forbid that the time shall ever come when the State shall fall into such hands.

This made it plain that the Argonaut had not embarrassed the Republican candidate in its voicing of the issues of the campaign, even if it had so greatly shocked its Republican contemporaries. And the outcome of the election has shown that the issue was not "the railroad," but whether the people of the State of California desired to be governed by the nominee of one of the old-established political parties, or by the nominees of a bastard pseudo-political organization, based on class hatred.

The people have decided.

San Francisco and the Navy.

The following communication has reached the Argonaut. Although it is unsigned, it is postmarked "Bremerton," and therefore presumably is from an officer of the Navy:

Although the battleship Wisconsin was built at San Francisco and has had a most successful career—carrying off the honors in great gun practice from all ships of the Navy for 1906—she sailed into San Francisco Bay proudly waving the battleship trophy pennant from her mast, and hardly a line of recognition was given her by the press of California. Why is San Francisco so utterly indifferent to the Navy and the fine ships that add to the splendor of her mountain-crowned bay? It is very different in the Eastern States; the feeling for the Navy is cordial; every ship excites interest, every one knows more or less about them; their doings and movements are chronicled as important as they really are, to the nation, to the people, and as guardians of the peaceful homes, honest pursuits, and valued possessions of all Americans.

We hope our Navy friends will absolve San Francisco of this venial sin. Rarely has it happened that she has shown herself indifferent to the Navy. The writer of the note above must not forget that some of the best ships of the Navy were built in San Francisco at the Union Iron Works, and sailed their measured miles either in San Francisco Bay or in Santa Barbara Channel. He must not forget that the Oregon, the San Francisco, the Monterey, the Olympia, the Charleston, the Marietta, the Wheeling, the Farragut, the Wisconsin, the Ohio, the Wyoming, the Paul Jones, the Preble, the Perry, the Tacoma, the California, the South Dakota, and the Milwaukee, were built in San Francisco, and, above all, he must not forget that that magnificent warship, the "Oregon," was not only built here, but sailed from this Coast on her memorable voyage of some thirteen thousand miles to take part in the naval operations around Santiago de Cuba. If he had ever been here when these fine ships were launched; when they made a record, as many of them did, or when they sailed into what we may call their home port with the long coach-whip pennant flying from their masts, he would know from the roar of greeting which rose up from San Francisco that she has never neglected the Navy.

But nowadays, any day, every day, is San Francisco's busy day. The poor city is so engrossed in finding herself, in reconstructing her old lines, in getting in out of the wet in tents, shacks, and shanties, in trying to go to business without being held up by thugs, choked by garroters, or killed by street cars, and generally is so bent on taking the clutch of official grafters from her throat, that her citizens are obliged to neglect some of the courtesies of life, indispensable and agreeable as they are in less strenuous times.

In Russia, translations of English and American works, as well as of French, German, and Italian books, are very soon published and widely circulated in spite of the censorship. A book like Kautsky's "History of Socialism," of which only a section has been translated into English, two editions of the complete work were issued in Russia, one each in Warsaw and Odessa, each edition consisting of twenty-five thousand copies. These editions were circulated in spite of the police. A later edition, used in Warsaw, was seized by the police and cooked. The Government has devised a plan of reducing all confiscated books to pulp, extracting the ink by chemical process, and sending the pulp to the mint to be made over into paper for bank-notes.

The production of gold in the mines of South Africa for the month of June was the greatest ever recorded. In the first six months of the current year the production was nearly $6,000,000 greater than in the corresponding time last year.

Assemblyman P. A. Stanton, re-elected from Los Angeles, is spoken of already as a candidate for Speaker of the House.

ELECTION RESULTS AND RECKONINGS.

Aftermath of the New York Campaign.

The following telegram was sent by the defeated Democratic candidate for Governor of California to the successful Republican candidate for Governor of New York:

Charles E. Hughes, New York, N. Y.: Accept my sincere congratulations. I rejoice in your magnificent victory. Theodore A. Bell."

While the election in New York State defeated W. R. Hearst and repudiated Hearstism, it may land Hearst in the mayor's chair in Greater New York. The possibility of this extraordinary outcome of the State campaign has aroused intense interest in political circles. William S. Jackson, of Buffalo, the Democratic candidate for Attorney General, elected by about 10,000 plurality over Attorney General Mayer, may make easy way for a recount of the ballots cast at the mayoralty election last fall and thereby settle the contention of Hearst that he defeated McClellan and was counted out.

By the election of Democratic State officials in New York, excepting only the Governor, a vast amount of political patronage is directed from former channels. Republicans have held many subordinate positions for years under former administrations, and there will be numerous changes when the newly elected officials are installed. The Canal Fund Commission is one of the largest plums secured by the Democratic victory.

The Portland Oregonian has the following editorial comment on the result in New York:

Had Hearst won, he would have become at once the leading power in the Democratic party; he would have made himself the director of its course, the arbiter of its fortunes. This morning would have begun the work of his paid clacquers in New York to make him the candidate for the presidency, and the work could have been extended speedily to every State of the Union. The man who could carry New York at this time would have been acclaimed as the man who could carry it in 1908. This one would have forced his nomination for the presidency, and the contest whose features would have been the most deplorable presented in our politics—a class contest, stirring the worst passions and dividing the people of the whole country against each other, business, property and orderly government on one side, and all their negations on the other—would have been the consequence. Hearst has passed the zenith, he will soon reach the nadir, of his political fortunes.

At a Prohibition rally held in a Methodist church in New York on the eve of the election, Frederick A. Victor, chairman of the county committee, declared that William R. Hearst had offered the Prohibition party $50,000 for its nomination for Governorship. Continuing he said:

Many of us here remember that midnight meeting at Binghamton. It was denied a week later, but we know that Mr. Hearst not only made the offer, but you know that he made it to me personally and offered me the money.

In a statement made soon after the election, W. J. Bryan said:

President Roosevelt cannot find very much cause for rejoicing in the New York returns. To have his own State go Democratic cannot be gratifying to him, and to find that his personal attack upon Mr. Hearst had little influence on the result, compared with the influence exerted by McCarren, Croker and McClellan, will not gladden his Thanksgiving day. The President's personal attack on Mr. Hearst was in bad taste, to say the least. The Republicans have had an effective campaign cry in "Stand by the President." Two years from now that appeal will be of no avail, or the President will not be in office after March 4, 1909. Even if he were a candidate—which no friend of his can assume after his repeated declarations—he would have to confront the third-term issue, and I should say that that issue alone would lose the President enough votes to make his race hopeless. The popular vote, as indicated by the Congressional elections, shows that the Republicans even now have a narrow margin to go on, and that margin will be quickly wiped out if the President allows himself to be drawn into a race for a third term.

"Fingy" Conners, chairman of the Democratic State Committee, and next to Murphy the most important in giving Hearst the Buffalo nomination, said to his followers in Buffalo: "I have Hearst's word for it that he day after the election his Independence League goes out of existence."

The English press is a unit in regarding the Hearst candidacy and President Roosevelt's expressions in the campaign as the most notable features, but there is a variety of opinion concerning the results. The London Outlook says:

The election from first to last is among the most dramatic episodes of American politics. President Roosevelt in his tremendous indictment of Mr. Hearst imperiled his own credit. Nothing but the overwhelming response of the people could have justified his extraordinary appeal, and this was not forthcoming.

Many bets which were given wide publicity by certain brokers in New York City for advertising purposes were never made. The largest wager actually laid was one of $30,000 to $10,000 on Hughes, the long end of the bet being taken by John W. Gates. Allen McGraw & Co., representing a client, took the Hearst end.

Prominent Winners and Losers.

Speaker Cannon seems to have profited by the aggressive opposition of Samuel Gompers, as his plurality is larger by 2000 than that he received two years ago.

Democratic gains in Iowa include seventeen members of the legislature and a Democratic Congressman, but Governor Cummins, Republican, was re-elected by a plurality of 22,000.

Gilbert M. Hitchcock of Omaha was elected to Congress, the only Democrat in the Nebraska delegation.

The famous kissing charge made by Mrs. E. W. Stanley against Governor Hoch almost lost him the governorship of Kansas. In the State a majority of 30,000 was expected for him, but he barely squeezed in for a second term. Governor Hoch vigorously denied the kissing episode, but it was made a campaign issue by his opponents and campaign orators expatiated on it. Mrs. Stanley made her charge on the eve of the Republican State Convention. In spite of the sensation and the declaration of delegates that "the campaign will be a nightmare to us," Hoch was renominated. In her public statement, Mrs. Stanley, wife of a former governor, declared Governor Hoch attempted to kiss her in his private office, when she consulted him on business.

In Pennsylvania strenuous efforts were made to defeat Congressmen Dalzell, Dale, and Deemer, in districts where the labor unions were strong. The national secretary-treasurer of the mine workers was the candidate opposing Deemer, and the district president of the mine workers opposed Dale. President John Mitchell made speeches for the miner candidates, but the men refused to follow their leaders in masses large enough to defeat the Republican nominees.

Congressman Nicholas Longworth of Ohio, the son-in-law of President Roosevelt, was re-elected. The day before the election he received this telegram from the President:

"If anything is desired from me, you print what Root said about my desire for the election of a Republican Congress, and reprint portions of my letter to Congressman Watson."

Governor Johnson of Minnesota, Democrat, was re-elected by a vote larger than that given to him two years before, but all other candidates on his ticket were defeated by their Republican opponents.

John Sibley Whalen, the newly-elected Secretary of State in New York, is a labor-union man. He aided in the organization of the Tobacco Workers' International Union, and has served three terms as president of the Central Trades and Labor Council of Rochester. He is 38 years of age and has never held political office.

Congressman J. W. Wadsworth, for many years chairman of the House Committee on Agriculture at Washington, was defeated in the Thirty-fourth New York District, and Congressman Babcock, of Wisconsin, formerly Chairman of the Republican Congressional Committee, failed of election.

Senator Dubois of Idaho, Democrat, will not be re-elected, as the new legislature of the State will be strongly Republican.

Governor J. L. Toole of Montana, Democrat, who had pledged himself to his party to hold his office to the end of his term, and only a few weeks ago was released from that pledge that he might be available as a candidate for United States Senator, will not be tempted, as the new legislature will have a heavy Republican majority. Senator Clark will probably be succeeded by Congressman Dixon.

Senator Thomas M. Patterson, Democrat, of Colorado, will fail of re-election, as the new legislature is Republican.

Concerning States and Territories.

The Republican Congressional Committee closed its headquarters in New York City two days after the election. Before Mr. Sherman, the chairman, left for his home in Utica he said:

The result of the congressional campaign throughout the country is exceedingly gratifying to this committee. The Sixtieth Congress will be Republican by 58 majority. These figures correspond exactly with the prediction given out by the committee on the Thursday before election. Of the districts throughout the United States which the committee marked as certainly Republican, we failed in carrying but four. We have carried more than we marked as probably Republicans.

There was a Republican majority in every county of the State of Washington, though the total is only one-half that given Roosevelt two years ago.

It was remarked with frequency in the Rhode Island campaign that one citizen of that diminutive State has as much voice in the United States Senate as seventeen citizens of New York, but this is not more remarkable than the fact that one voter in the town of West Greenwich, R. I., has as much influence as 450 voters in Providence, so far as a seat in the upper house of the Rhode Island legislature.

The Washington correspondent of the Providence (R. I.) Journal wrote, just before election:

"It became apparent some days ago that there was danger of Hearst's election. It tied up the work of the various departments. Mr. Roosevelt was almost the last to take alarm. His cabinet officers were scurrying over the country on political missions or writing campaign speeches to be delivered in the closing hours of the contest in a last desperate effort to destroy the menace of Hearstism. Then the importunities for him to take a hand in the fight became so insistent that he inconspicuously fled, going to his 'shooting-box' in Virginia, 'Pine Knot,' for a few days of recreation and outdoor exercise, which he so sadly needs. The humor of this is heightened by the knowledge that the President has indulged in recreation and outdoor exercise a good part of the time since returning from his three months' vacation at Oyster Bay."

All the Democratic candidates in Florida are elected. The legislature is unanimously Democratic. The proposition advocated by Governor Broward to drain the Everglades was defeated.

The Democratic vote cast in Texas was the lightest for many years. There were two Republican State tickets in the field and the contest between the two factions brought out a heavy vote of that party. The Democratic plurality will be upward of 200,000 for Colonel Tom Campbell for governor. Two Republican representatives and possibly one Republican senator were elected to the legislature. Of the 141 members of the legislature elected about sixty-five are said to be opposed to the re-election of Senator W. J. Bailey. Bailey was not voted on in the election.

Arizona defeated the joint-statehood proposition with emphasis and the vote against the movement was larger than expected in New Mexico. They will remain two Territories until they become two States.

In the Territory of Hawaii J. K. Kalaniana'ole, Republican, was re-elected Delegate to Congress. The Hawaiian legislature will be made up of 35 Republicans and 10 Democrats.

Julie Larriana, the Unionist candidate for Commissioner of Porto Rico to the United States Congress, received a majority of 42,000 votes. The Federation of Labor party polled approximately 1,500 votes. The Federation claims an island membership of 30,000.

California Gains and Losses.

Congressman J. C. Needham, Republican, of the Sixth California District, was re-elected as usual, but by increased majorities. He carried Fresno County by 1780 votes, though all the Democratic candidates for county offices were elected.

California elected women as superintendents of public instruction in several counties. Miss Florence Boggs, Democrat, defeated her Republican opponent in Stanislaus County, and was re-elected, a deserved recognition of her energy and ability. Miss Lehner, Democrat, defeated the Republican incumbent in San Luis Obispo. Mrs. N. E. Davidson, Democrat, defeated her Republican opponent, Miss Inez Covert, in Calaveras County. Miss Irma McCarty, Democrat, was defeated in Solano County by her masculine opponent.

Langdon beat Bell in one county—Alameda. There the Union Labor strongholds all gave Langdon heavy pluralities, showing that Bell got very little of the labor vote in that county. The great bulk of the labor vote in San Francisco also went to Langdon, the remainder being divided between Bell and Gillett.

Truxtun Beale, who was a candidate for the State Senate from the district including Kern, Kings and Tulare, was defeated.

Frank H. Short, of Fresno, Republican, was defeated by George Cartwright, Democrat, for State senator. Short was considered by his friends before the election a promising candidate to oppose United States Senator Perkins for re-election, but his dream has faded.

Assemblyman Warren M. John, Republican, a newspaper man of San Luis Obispo County, was re-elected, and is now the oldest member of the lower house of the California legislature in point of service.

Sacramento county elected Democratic officials for county officers and endorsed some of the Democratic candidates for State offices, but Secretary of State Charles F. Curry and State Controller E. P. Colgan, Republicans, were given substantial majorities.

State Senator Frank French, one of the principals in the boodle scandal of the last session of the California legislature, and who sought a nomination for re-election and vindication, was defeated. His district is in the city of San Francisco, and he did not carry the precinct in which he lives.

Less than three-fourths of the voters in San Francisco went to the polls on election day. The registered numbered 51,634; the vote was 37,554. In Alameda county, which includes Oakland, Berkeley, and Alameda cities, only about two-thirds of the registered voters expressed their choice among the candidates on the several tickets. In Los Angeles county only a little more than one-half of the registered voters were numbered at the polls.

A Massachusetts Democrat is said to have resented an expression of sympathy on receipt of news that Moran candidate on the Democratic and Prohibition tickets for Governor, had been defeated. "You know the story of the professor whom the student tried to scare," the Yankee said. "He saw the ox-hide and horns, and the tiger teeth, but did not tremble. 'It is an impossible combination. There is no such animal,' said he. Well Democratic tusks and Prohibition horns are such a combination. There is no such animal." The story is new in fact or application, however, as it was told of Franklin K. Lane in his unsuccessful campaign for the governorship of California four years ago.

Immigrants from Italy outnumber those from Ireland four to one.

"TAY PAY" AND "PEARSON'S"

How the Irish Member of Parliament Bested the Big Publishing Company.

I take it for granted that most people know who both "Tay Pay" and "Pearson's" are. For those who don't, I will briefly point out that "Tay Pay" is T. P. O'Connor, the Irish Member of Parliament—such being the name he is best known by all over England—and "Pearson's" is the title most commonly applied in London to the conglomerate hotch-potch of journalism made up of various magazines and newspapers, and legally designated "C. Arthur Pearson, Limited." Of C. Arthur Pearson, presently.

Shortly before Mr. O'Connor went to the United States on his Irish Home Rule mission in the hope of raising funds for the hopeless cause out of the pockets of the Irish laborers and chambermaids of America, he read a little deal with "Pearson's Limited" and neatly bested them. O'Connor is a forcible speaker with an unobtrusive manner, and a pleasing writer of the sincerest of truths. But when it comes to business all the flies have been shoo'd away. He knows his way about with a man. This is how it happened.

A few years ago, O'Connor started a weekly journal in London and called it M. A. P. The oddness of the name itself attracted notice, and the fact that it stood for "Mainly About People" fixed popular interest in its contents. It caught on from the word Go! It was meant to deal almost solely with the doings and sayings of the famous and the famous, the prominent people of the moment, and, besides being edited by him, was written chiefly by O'Connor himself, in a breezy, readable fashion that didn't weary readers. "Tay Pay" has a light, interesting style with his pen, and the paper all over was spattered with his thoughtful brain. He never said anything grossly ill-natured, like Labouchere in the House, and did not perambulate the streets, like that gentleman, in fear of a thrashing. However, there was a touch of spice in the columns, and rapier-pointed satire. He liked the paper. There was a virility in its tone that suited the masculine mind, and wherever you saw him going by train they always took a copy of M. A. P. with them. In club reading rooms it never lay on the shelf. Somebody always had it. And so it won a large circulation and advertising patronage, and was making money hand over fist for the clever Irishman with the gift of the gab in ink.

About the same time—it does not signify exactly when—C. Arthur Pearson had been looming up as a journalistic power in London. His Daily Express was beginning to crowd the Daily Mail more than Harmsworth liked. In fact, Pearson was a sort of eager imitator of Harmsworth's methods, for, like him, he began to pick up and absorb every magazine and cheap penny paper he could find for sale. A few he started himself. In this way he became the proprietor of—besides the Express—the Royal, Pearson's, and Novel magazines, the Rapid Review, Pearson's and Smith's weeklies and some other smaller fry periodicals of trifling importance. People wondered where the capital for it came from, for Pearson not so very long ago was a reporter or compositor—some people tell you both—on George Newnes's Tit-Bits. He did a little free-lance journalism at the same time, but never made any money. He lived at Wimbledon in one room—so a lady friend who knew him there tells me—glad to be invited to dinner or other entertainment, by his neighbors. There is nothing against him. But it was what made people wonder where the money for the papers was possible. Many persons naturally supposed Newnes supplied the sinews of war. I have been assured that this was not so, but that quite another individual was the financier.

Letty soon Pearson coveted M. A. P. It was just the sort of thing he wanted. But he was wise enough to see that he must have "Tay Pay" with it. So, he prevailed upon O'Connor to sell him his sparkling paper, at a good round figure, on the agreement that O'Connor would stay on as editor for a year or more. O'Connor had shortly before founded another paper called T. P.'s Weekly, and was glad to sell at so good a price. However, as time went on he couldn't stand being directed and interfered with. The tone of all of Pearson's periodicals is the rankest Tory—what is known in fact as the Chamberlainism. "Tay Pay" was nothing without a Tory. He pined to kick a loose leg again. Therefore he gave notice that he'd leave when his first year was up. Consternation reigned in the "Pearson's" camp, for O'Connor wouldn't reconsider, though the salary was doubled. Then it was discovered that O'Connor had about to start a new weekly on M. A. P.'s lines, and all it P. T. O., meaning "People Talked Of." Pearson's at once applied for an injunction, but couldn't get it, and so "Tay Pay" walked off whistling.

His new paper has now been published about three months, and as it has returned to M. A. P.'s early style it is a huge success, leaving M. A. P. away behind. Rather hard on Pearson's, it is, but good business for O'Connor. You can imagine, too, the sort of literary food the readers of M. A. P. are being now offered when I tell you that O'Connor's successor in the editorial chair is Lady Colin Campbell. One is sorely tempted to quote the old line beginning "It is but a step."

As can be imagined, the paper has utterly lost its virility. It is gradually being moulded into a lady's journal, and has already been jocularly dubbed "The Penny Gentlewoman," there being a "Gentlewoman," a ladies' fashion paper that costs a shilling. But all the life and spice have flown, and the dull heavy respectability that permeates Pearson literature has taken its place. Even in the Express you find the same sort of thing. There are double headed head lines till you can't rest, for the editor is Ralph Blumenberg, an American from Wisconsin. He does his best, poor chap, to give the paper such American tone as flavors of Oshkosh and Baraboo. But he's handicapped like O'Connor was. Take the Standard. When Pearson's took possession of it, about eighteen months ago, it had a splendid opening, an uncommon opportunity. I can't say all I should like of the editorial staff, for there were some rattling good men on it. But it was, and is still, weighted down by dull wits. For example, the editor, H. W. Gwynne. He is a sleepy-eyed Irishman of aldermanic proportions, and unsuited to the editorial chair of a daily paper. He is much too heavy in every sense. His chief recommendation for the post was, I believe, that he accompanied Joseph Chamberlain to South Africa in 1902, as a sort of useful secretary—just about what he's best fitted for. As an editor, his sole aim and object is to keep anything out of the paper that might be tortured into what it should be best that old-fashioned young ladies of Charlotte Bronte's day, ought not to read. You can imagine the sort of reading that men and up-to-date girls find in the Standard under Gwynne.

No one wants the paper to be coarse and vulgar. That is not the point. But no paper can be made to pay where only the tastes of nice old ladies and goody-goody males are consulted. Now, William Goode, the news editor, is the exact opposite of Gwynne. If he had the running of the Standard it would be the biggest daily in London today. The Times would be a memory, the Telegraph occupying a seat far in the rear. Goode is a young man and the best-looking journalist in London, tall and straight, with clear-cut Grecian features. He learned his journalism in America under Melville E. Stone, when the latter had the Chicago News. During the war with Spain he enlisted in the Fourth U. S. Cavalry, and for some time was stationed at the Presidio. If he had his way the Standard would hum, but he's blocked at every turn by the chief sub-editor, a mite of a Scotchman named Maxwell, whose overweening caution is backed by enormous spectacles and an immense moustache. He prefers treatises on the "Auld Brig o' Aire" and things like that. Saunders, the foreign editor, with the clever face of a king's counselor, is one of the best men on the staff. Stanhope Sprigg is another. He is at present manager of the Standard's agency in New York. But with these, there is too big a leaven of mediocres and slow coaches.

Perhaps it doesn't signify so much whether the paper becomes a success or not. Pearson's only bought it from its former owners eighteen months ago for one object, to wit, to have another daily with the Express to boost and boom Joe Chamberlain and his son Austen. Both papers do that, if they do nothing else. People who used to wonder where the cash came from to stake Pearson's have been pretty well satisfied on the subject of whom the mysterious individual backer is, since the purchase of the Standard.

Cockaigne.

London, October 26, 1906.

An interesting feature in water transport appears in the completion of the latest and largest addition to the fleet of river steamboats plying on the Hudson. The Hendrik Hudson, 400 feet in length, 82 feet wide, and yet but 7 feet 6 inches draft, costing $1,000,000, represents the extreme development of the modern American river steamboat. With ample room for 5000 passengers this fine ship forms an interesting contrast to the tiny Clermont, Fulton's first steamboat, which, curiously enough, made its first trip between Albany and New York just ninety-nine years before.

For the first time in its history since it became a British possession, St. Helena is without a garrison. All the troops have been withdrawn as a measure of economy, the guns and ammunition have been removed and the island is left entirely defenseless. The outlook for the islanders is dark, as they practically lived off the garrison and will now have no market for their products.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

C. M. Hammond, brother-in-law of President Roosevelt, was defeated in his race for the State Senate in the Fourth California district by J. B. Sanford of Ukiah, a Democratic editor.

Senator Foraker, of Ohio, sees in the victory at the polls which has given the political control of the State into the hands of himself and Senator Dick, an encouragement of his aspiration to the nomination for President.

"Fingy" Conners, of Buffalo, who was nominal chairman of the New York State Democratic Committee, had no illusions concerning his position. He said: "This ain't no campaign. It's a Punch and Judy show and I'm Judy."

Governor John C. W. Beckham, of Kentucky, who has just won the nomination for United States Senator at the direct primaries, which is equivalent to election, is the youngest Governor in the United States. He comes from a distinguished Kentucky family and is 37 years of age.

Congressman Rockwood Hoar, of Massachusetts, died at his home in Worcester last week. He was the son of United States Senator George Frisbie Hoar, who died in 1904. He was educated in the public schools of his native place and at Harvard College, where he was graduated in the class of 1876. His term in Congress would expire next year.

A movement has been started in the American colony in Berlin to have Professor Burgess recalled to the United States. Professor Burgess is lecturing at the University of Berlin under the plan of exchange of American and German universities. In his first lecture he boldly asserted that the Monroe doctrine is "obsolete" and that our high tariff works great injustice to the people and builds up monopoly.

Congressman John James Jenkins of Wisconsin never signs his name to any of the numerous letters he receives from his constituents, nor does he use a rubber stamp, as do many of his colleagues. His typewriter does the work for him. Another of his peculiarities is that whenever possible he avoids using the telephone. Ex-Senator Cockrell, in all the unbroken service of thirty years in the Senate, replied by hand to every communication he received.

In a campaign speech at Denton, Md., Secretary Bonaparte likened the trusts to "a pen of pigs in which the big, strong, overfed hog crowded the little ones away from their feed and got far more than its share. The Democrats propose to cut off the supply of swill, or in other words, to destroy our prosperity by unsettling all our business relations. No doubt this process would soon make the big hogs as thin as razor backs, but would the small ones fare any better?"

Frank H. Waskey, the first delegate to Congress from Alaska, now on a visit to Washington, is a tall, alert, smooth-shaven man of 31, who looks one full in the eye and talks in straightout fashion. His term expires March 4 next, but he expects to accomplish a good deal by that time. Though himself a Democrat, he was elected on a strictly miners' ticket, and will refuse to follow Democratic leadership when by doing so he might go against Alaska's interests. He says that the legislation most needed by the vast section he represents is a special act to improve the system of granting land titles and mining claims.

A. E. Crane, a lawyer of Holton, Kan., is about to bring a number of suits to recover fines paid by "bootleggers" convicted of selling liquor to Indians. He claims that all red men who have taken allotments are citizens; that such persons have a constitutional right to drink whisky if they want to and that consequently the convictions complained of were irregular. On one occasion Mr. Crane, while pleading in the United States Supreme Court, addressed the Justices as "you fellows." The expression evidently was uttered without the slightest thought of disrespect, and the court took no special notice of the slip, though the Justices stared for a moment and other members of the bar gasped in astonishment. The Kansas lawyer won his case, too.

Early returns seemed to indicate the election of Charles W. Lefler, the young lawyer who ran on the Republican ticket for Congress as the successor of William R. Hearst, and was opposed by Charles V. Fornes, ex-president of the board of aldermen. His district is one of the geographical curiosities of modern politics. Beginning at Sixtieth street on the Hudson River, it runs south to Bleecker street, and across town until it hits Third avenue. Its outlines turn at right angles thirty-six times, besides running a half dozen times on the oblique. It was made up to meet the practical demands of the experienced and altogether practical politicians who made it up. Mr. Lefler's slogan was "Brush the cobwebs from Hearst's seat."

THIEF OR THUG.

Showing That There Is Aristocracy in Rascaldom.

"The sentence of the court is," said Judge Bucklilam, "that you be confined in the State Prison at San Quentin for the term of two years."

A modest flush, born of the pride he could not entirely conceal, passed over the face of the youth in the prisoners' dock. "San Quentin—and only eighteen," was his glad, unspoken thought. The boys beside him—there were three of them—strove to look composed and indifferent, as boys will under the circumstances, but their envy, tempered by friendship as it was, was clearly apparent. Each of them had his secret hopes, and each had been disappointed. And Jimmy Picklock had, without merit that they could see, gained the coveted prize. Only the House of Correction awaited them. Only varying terms of months and years, which would be entirely thrown away in an institution dignified by the presence of not one notable; an institution whose diploma was a shame rather than an honor, since it stamped them as mere tyros in the gallant calling of theft.

Jimmy went down the stairs scarcely feeling his chains. He strove to appear modest, not to manifest offensively his recognized superiority over his companions, but he was none the less exuberant in spirit, and they were none the less glum. Jimmy was a tall, slender youth. He had a frank, intelligent face, with the lines of ambition visible under the delicate, interesting pallor which the unfortunately confined air of our jails creates. His hair was tastefully plastered down upon his white forehead and puffed in airy circles behind. His clothing was dark and fashionable in cut, and there was a keen, fearless look on his face that had often excited the envious ire of the brass-buttoned hirelings of the city, paid to interfere with other people's business by the arrogant class who had simply stolen enough, in the channels of trade, to own houses, and gained money-power sufficient to claim legitimacy for their business methods. So Jimmy smoked his cigarette calmly and sedately as the guarded quartet marched along to the jail and said little. His new sense of importance had greatly altered him, however. It lent dignity to his carriage, his expression, and his gait.

That afternoon Tansy Mollie came up to the jail to bid him good-bye. He saw her to the visitors' room. She was more than ever tender, more than ever worshipping, in her simple, Tar Flat way. She congratulated him warmly, but he paid little heed. He was scarcely considerate. He did not attempt to thrash or kick her; was scarcely profane, even. And though she hoped against hope, the poor girl's doubts of his love grew greater and greater in the face of this undeniable change in him. Jimmy was getting too high for her now; Jimmy was a regular convict—an amateur no longer. And despite the consolation of her favorite stimulant, Mollie's heart that night knew the bitterness of love unrequited, just as woman's heart will till all time and love shall end.

Over the shining bay waters, with Deputy Marion Wilson, Jimmy rode expectantly next day. He smiled in superior complaisance at two tenderly unwise old ladies who were "coony" enough to pity him. They little knew. And when he had arrived at the old brick prison, and passed through the outer gate and the inner, and stood at last on the flag-stones of the walk within the walls, and viewed the gray stone cell buildings, and the men in stripes, who were his superiors no longer, he felt the warm glow of self-contentment that comes to one as each hoped for rung in the ladder of fond ambition is attained.

The preliminaries he underwent with the assumed composure of an old "con." He was diplomatic, was Jimmy, and he did not propose to be thought any the less of because it was his first seclusion. He submitted with dignity to being stripped and having his description entered; was properly authoritative to the barber, who deftly altered his scalp to the hirsute beauty of a match-scratcher. His clothes he picked out carefully, trying on several pairs of trousers and pledging his first plug of tobacco to the "imitation zebra" dressed gentleman in charge. When fully panoplied he felt something like an angle-worm externally, but he was a very happy angle-worm withal. He was conducted to one of the "house-cells," instructed in the regulations, and shown to his bunk, on which he lay down immediately, "just to try it," with a boy's ambitious delight.

All was rose-colored and scented for half an hour. Then the horizon was speckled with the first baby-cloud of gloom. He met an old friend.

"Hello, Jack!" he cried, warmly.

"Hello, Jimmy!" returned Jack, quite unmoved.

"Who's here?" he asked, with admirable sang froid.

"Oh, the usual run," said Jack, indifferently.

"Where's Bart?"

"Bart who?"

"Black Bart. I want to meet him."

"Oh, you do, do yer? Got your salt yet?"

"My salt? No. Where do I get it?"

"Over at San Rafael. The next time you take your mornin' walk, buy a ton or two at the grocery, an' git the man to sprinkle it on yer. Jest tell him you're so fresh you're 'fraid yer'll spoil," and Jack turned contemptuously away.

Jimmy blushed to the roots of his stubble. To crown all, a tall, dignified, imposing-looking man walked slowly by, nodded to Jack, and said pleasantly:

"Hello, Dolan!"

"Hello, Bart!" returned Jack.

It was Black Bart, the famous highwayman. Jimmy's discomfiture was complete.

It was pretty rough. He could not understand it. Instead of flattering recognition he received only evident contempt. Jack and he had been playmates, school-mates, and friends in the years ago. Born side by side, as it were, in two houses that touched each other on Tehama Street, they had been equally looked up to by theurchin-dom of Tar Flat. Together they had "belted" Chinamen, pirated around the Mail Dock, pillaged the freight cars at Fourth and Townsend, and shared their first cell in the city prison for the same eccentricity. They had been together for years, till time separated their paths, and why all the old friendship had disappeared on Jack's side his saddened friend could not fathom.

He saw one thing, however; he must be modest. He must win his friends by those rare personal qualities which had gained him popularity hitherto. An opportunity came that very evening.

When the iron doors were locked and the resonant clanging of metal locks on iron doors had ceased, the two coal-oil lamps were lighted in the big "house-cell." Jimmy was quietly admiring its picturesque shadows on the wall, the tiers of bunks, and the faces of the men in the shadows, when he heard the thrum of a banjo, followed by similar sounds in different parts of the room, as if instruments were being tuned.

"What is it?" he asked of the man lying below him.

"Concert," answered the man, gruffly.

Jimmy's spirits rose. The Silver Floss Banjo Band gave a concert that evening from eight till nine, the lights being banned after that hour. Jimmy was a "world-beater" on the banjo, according to the virtuosos of the Industrial School, and was eager for recognition of his talent in his new circle. After the band, composed of three banjos, a guitar, and a triangle, had assassinated "Waltz Me Around," and a pallid gentleman had done up "Killarney" in a falsetto that was very rare indeed among its kind, Jimmy seized the opportunity of silence that followed the applause to remark, confidently, to the banjo gentleman:

"Lemme hit that wunst. I kin play."

"Rattling Jack looked at him with undisguised surprise. Silence fell on all the company. They were quite indignant.

"Don't hit him, Jack," said a voice; "he don't know no better."

"Annie Laurie," said the leader. The music struck up, and the thing was passed over. Jimmy never opened his mouth again that night.

For a week this state of affairs continued. His expected happiness had turned to misery. Every anticipated sweetness of recognition by the honored men of his profession had been gall instead. He could not understand it. He was a stranger in a strange land. Even the boys in the tin-shop where he had been put to work, refused to chum with him, claiming a superiority over him that was a mystery. He grew bitterly ashamed of his clothes; they were so strangely, degradingly new. He was utterly lonely and disconsolate; he almost wished at times that he had not come.

One day, however, as he was passing by the east end of the cell-building he was accosted by a short, wiry, grizzled old man, who sat smoking a pipe on the lowest step of the balcony stairs.

"Got any terbacker?" asked the man.

Jimmy eagerly gave him his whole plug in exchange for a friendly word.

"I've been watching you for a couple o' days," his friend said; "your name is Picklock, ain't it?"

"Yes, sir."

"I used to know a Picklock in Sonora, in sixty-eight. Him and me was askin' stage drivers the time o' day all that winter. Any relation o' his'n?"

"I don't know. My father was a street contractor in San Francisco."

"Same man. Got to be Supervisor, didn't he? Yes? Well, I'm glad to see yer, my boy, glad to see yer. How's the old man?"

"He's dead."

"No! Ye don't mean it! Never seen a man I'd druther work with. Daisy, the old man was. What he didn't know about a mail-bag and express-box wa'n't wuth knowin'."

Jimmy felt a sense of pride in his father that was new to him. He inherited reputation, at all events. He determined to appeal to his friend.

"What's the matter with all these fellers?" he asked. "How?"

"They won't have nothin' to do with me."

"Guess yer been puttin' on airs. Small canaries is little too proud o' their cage sometimes."

"No I haven't. I give 'em straight business eve time."

"Wat kind of an accident got yer here? Wat d the guilty party as throw'd the blame on you get a he of?"

"An overcoat."

"Off'n a hat-rack?"

"Yes."

"Day-time?"

"Yes."

The old man looked disappointed.

"You've made a bad mistake, sonny. The best y kin do is to mind yer eye, and do wot you can to k'n it. Wat's a great, big, smart boy like you a-doin' snea thievin'? Ain't ye got no ambition?"

Jimmy understood it all now. His crime filled h with bitter regret. If only—if only he had thought a done a burglary!

"Ye see, my boy," his Mentor went on, kind, "ther's suthin' expected o' sech as you. A man grov ain't got no right to fool away his time on baby pla if he ever expects to accomplish anythin'. Ther's 'Fris boys no older nor you as is known, an' well-known Chicago an' New York. Sneak-thievin' is mean. I low down. Anybody kin sneak, an' no self-respect gentleman would think of it. The sneaks here is most Chinaman, and I'm glad to see the boys has draw the line."

"Jack Dolan ain't done much better," ventured Jimmy.

"Ain't he now? There is a boy for yer," said t old man admiringly. "Didn't yer read the pretty but lary he come over on? Didn't yer read it? As fine piece of work at his age as ever anybody heerd o. And three more before it—every one a credit to hi. Jack got 'em all in the papers soon's he was sentence and it gave him standin' the minute he got here. I wasn't goin' to let no other feller git credit for his wor. Why, Jimmy Hope, the great New York bank burglar the day Jack got there, Jimmy Hope, he says in th very yard, an' a dozen standers-around to hear it:

"'Mr. Dolan,' says he, 'I'm glad to meet yer. Y has a future before yer, me boy, or I'm a chump.'"

Jimmy turned green with envy. He, too, had look forward to meeting Jimmy Hope; had thought over t speech he would make to that quiet, modest, emine man. Alas! all had turned out so differently, and had only himself to blame.

"Then there ain't no show at all, is there?"

"Not much. I won't disappoint yer. But I've g some influence myself," he added, complacently. "a I will do what I can for the sake o' yer dad. It's th way, an' here's yer only chance. There's a hot fight the 'Independent Order o' Knights o' the Dark,' t burglars' socation. Jimmy Hope's been president t terms, an' some o' the boys swears they won't have third-term Caesarism in theirs. The 'lection comes next Wensday, an' Jimmy's only got sixty-seven vote. He wants eighty-two to be 'lected. Ten-Pin Bill h fifty-five, and they're huntin' for more. I might"—closed his eyes reflectively—"I might get yer in."

"Do you belong?"

"Scarcely, my boy," he said, with evident pride, belong to the 'United Order o' First Degrees.' Tha the top notch in these diggins."

"What are they?"

"Gen'elmen as happened to be standin' round wh somebody got hurt mortually. The second degree me bers has formed a society. Call themselves the 'Mah Aforethought,' but the bluff won't work. We're t aristocracy here. Bart's our president."

"Does Jack belong to the Knights?"

"Yes, he does; an' he's the dark horse for the pre dency, too."

"Mebbe he would help me."

"That's yer best holt. You better try him."

Jimmy went to sleep that night with renewed hop. In the yard next day he found Jack in busy conve over the election with two fellow-knights. He wait modestly for him to finish, and then pleaded for aid. Jack was touched.

"I can't do it, Jimmy; I can't do it, nohow," he peated. "It will cost me the election. But I'll tell y what I'll do—oh, Scraggsy!" he called.

Scraggsy, a fat, freckled young burglar, with t merry eyes and red head, crossed the yard in respo to the call.

"Mr. Mullony, Mr. Picklock," said Dolan.

The two bowed and shook hands. "Glad ter me yer?" said Scraggsy. Jimmy said: "I am honored, Mr. Mullony," and scored a point. Though a craftsman who stood high in his line, Scraggsy was human. "I want you to put Mr. Picklock up for election, Scraggsy," said Jack. "Get Fat Andy to second him, an' do the best yer can. Don't say nothin' about his record. He's got good stuff in him, and I'll go bail for him; but it's on the q. t. far's I'm concerned."

For three days Jimmy alternated between hope and fear. The voting took place in a large tin box hung at the corner of the cell-building nearest the jute factory. At last it was over. Jimmy awaited the result with palpitating heart.

But Scraggsy's face told the story before he spoke. It took only ten black balls to reject, and Jimmy had received twenty-seven. Clearly they would not have any sneak-thief in their number.

At first he despaired utterly. Then he honestly made up his mind to reform; to compensate as best he could for lost time. He remembered how, in the years preceding, Jack had improved his time while he, Jimmy, had idled. How, at the Industrial School, Jack was studying and getting information, while he had smoked cigarettes and loafed. How, later, at the House of Correction, Jack had by his diplomacy and industry got first a position as house servant and afterward been transferred to the County Jail as "trustee," where his position gave him confidential and intimate acquaintance with intelligent men from everywhere. The result was clear. There was but one thing to do—listen, learn, and make up for so many wasted opportunities. And this he determined to do.

When the time came for his departure he went quietly away with high and firm resolves. He had three dollars and a badly fitting suit of clothes, but Mollie had remained in love with him, and she was in affluence.

He became valiantly intoxicated at her expense, beat her black and blue, hit the pipe, and felt like a madman. Then he looked about him.

His disgrace still burned, though he said nothing about it to his inamorata. She might pedestal him as high as she liked. The Western Addition offered a fruitful field for burglary, and, with newspaper fame in view, Jimmy purchased a revolver, bowie-knife, and slung-shot. Whenever he happened to be caught the Knights should know what a mute, inglorious Milton and Cartouche combined they had so inappreciatively scorned.

The first two operations were brilliantly successful. They were neatly done; would reflect pride on anybody. During the third, however, as Jimmy was deftly picking the lock of the silver closet in a mansion on Pacific Avenue he felt himself grabbed by some one in the dark. The old highwayman's advice came instantly to him; he twisted his right arm free, slipped the knife from his sleeve and stuck it into something soft. He heard an "Oh!" and the fall of a body.

Jimmy dashed out of the back door while a woman's shrieks were ringing. He had scarcely jumped the fence into the street, however, before brass buttons were hotly in pursuit. As he ran, he drew his revolver and peppered away like a Gatling gun at his pursuer, the policeman also shooting rapidly at him. Then a shrill whistle sounded in front of Jimmy and the shooting behind him ceased. Something struck him out of a dark doorway, the left side of his head appeared to cave in, and Jimmy knew no more, but rather less than usual.

Only three months had elapsed since his departure when he passed the iron doors again. But there was no exultation in his manner this time. He was quiet, modest, and business-like.

"How are yer, Jimmy?" said Scraggsy, cordially. "Hello, old boy. Read all about it in the papers," said Jack. "Lemme introduce you to the boys."

"I know'd there was stuff in yer; I know'd it," said the old highwayman, fond tears in his eyes as he greeted him.

And Jimmy's hopes were realized at last.

Isaac C. Renfrow has a bee farm near Sulphur, I. T., which contains 120 colonies of bees. Recently he has imported bees from Switzerland because of their habits of making long flights to distant feeding grounds. He crossed these with his black and Italian or "five-band" bees and thus his bees cover a very wide range of country. He recently paid $50 for one queen bee from Switzerland.

PARISIAN MOB AT RACE COURSE.

Bookmakers' Booths Stormed, Robbed, and Burned in Spite of the Police.

Longchamps racecourse, near Paris, held a throng of one hundred thousand people on Sunday, October 14, and the day will long be remembered by the many English and American visitors present, as turbulent scenes ended what was anticipated as a pleasurable event. This is a description of the beginning of the trouble that finally led to rioting, robbery, and the destruction of property:

When the signal for the start was given in the third race, known as the Free Handicap of $3000, two of the horses became entangled in the tapes of the starting-gate, with the result that they were left. Nearly all the jockeys pulled up, expecting the recall flag to be raised, but the starter made no sign. Seeing that their chance was hopeless, the jockeys of the two horses referred to—Storm, who was a hot favorite at 5 to 1 on, and Pois Rouges—brought their mounts back to the paddock, while three others got so badly away that they were never in the race.

Immediately there came a storm of protest from the public in the stands and on the open field, and when the three horses finishing the course arrived at the winning post in the following order: Monsieur Perichon, Mlle. Markuerite, Bethsaida, there was tremendous hooting and shouts of "No race! It's a swindle." Monsieur Perichon, it should be explained, was an outsider.

What particularly inflamed the fury of the mob was the fact that the whole racing enterprise, including the betting system, the Pari-Mutuel, was under a single management, and the crowd easily jumped to the conclusion that this monopoly had engineered the false start to rob the public:

The people in the five-franc and ten-franc stands began rushing toward the pesage, or reserved twenty-franc enclosure, in which the paddock and weighing room are situated, and started pulling down the barrier which separates the stand from the reserved enclosure. Their example spread to the large crowd in the lowest-price field, who rushed across the course, and began clambering over the barrier into the stand. Others made a dash for the Pari-Mutuel betting-stand, demanding their money back, and in a few moments the whole racecourse was a howling bedlam of people who seemed to have gone stark mad.

The Pari-Mutuel shed was taken by storm and torn to pieces, the money scattered and quickly pocketed by the more unscrupulous of the rioters. A company of soldiers and a body of police quickly appeared on the scene, but their efforts were powerless against such a tremendous crowd.

Women screamed as chairs were hurled into the stands, men shouted, and the wreckage of the Pari-Mutuels was piled up and huge bonfires lighted. A clump of trees were fired, and added to the confusion. In the pesage, which was literally stormed by thousands of the public, well-dressed men and women in elegant toilettes ran wildly to the gate to get out of the way of the invading crowd, and a regular panic ensued.

Next, the windows of the weighing room and committee room were smashed in, and then winning numbers which had been hoisted on the signalling board hauled down. An excited section of the crowd from the field made attempts to fire the stands, which were only partially successful. Piles of the debris were made, gasoline from motor cars sprinkled over them and torches applied. The police were unable to prevent this.

A call for troops was sent to the neighboring fort of Mont Valerien, as the police and gendarmes were not in force sufficient to control the mob:

Not satisfied with burning the betting booths, two attempts were made to burn the grand stand. Men waved rolls of bank-notes from the bookmakers' hoards, gold and silver coins hurtled through the air, and men and women scrambled fiercely for the spoils, many of them emerging with cuts, bruises, or broken bones. It was reported that no less than $60,000 of the bookmakers' stock of coin and notes was seized and carried away.

The usual force of keepers of the peace and firemen found themselves outnumbered a thousand times:

When the firemen first came out the infuriated mob would not let them reach the burning booths. The rioters cut the harness of the horses attached to the fire engines, and the animals, which were at high tension and frightened by the noise, galloped across the course and rushed uncontrolled into the dense crowd, knocking down many persons. The police and gendarmes were powerless. Several of them were injured before reinforcements arrived. The police authorities ordered the races stopped, but the crowd refused to go home.

Meantime Lepine, the prefect of police, arrived and the crowd cheered him, but even from him they demanded that he refund their money. Lepine restored order. His reinforcements slowly and with difficulty forced the crowd to retire but not before the iron chairs ladies occupied had been hurled at the policemen.

Before the enclosure was cleared all the seventy-five betting booths were destroyed, as well as the tower from which the results were bulletined, and many men and women were injured:

Unable to quell the riot, the chief police official present telephoned to headquarters for assistance. Shortly afterward the engine from the fire brigade station at Passy arrived, and began playing on the fires, which had attacked the central office buildings. A detachment of cavalry galloped up, but it was not until past five o'clock that the disorder was quelled and the racecourse abandoned by the public. There was, of course, no racing after the fiasco, a continuance being impossible amid the violence. Never before has such a scene been witnessed on a French racecourse.

Several members of the party who were accompanying the Lord Mayor of London in his visit to Paris were present and saw the whole of the disturbance.

A number of arrests were made later of some people returning from the course who set fire to the booth belonging to the Pari-Mutuel in the Bois de Boulogne.

OLD FAVORITES.

Death of the Flowers.

The melancholy days are come, the saddest of the year,
Of wailing winds, and naked woods, and meadows brown and sear.
Heaped in the hollows of the grove, the autumn leaves lie dead;
They rustle to the eddying gust, and to the rabbit's tread.
The robin and the wren are flown, and from the shrubs the jay,
And from the wood top calls the crow through all the gloomy day.
Where are the flowers, the fair young flowers, that lately sprang and stood
In brighter light and softer airs, a beauteous sisterhood?

Alas! they all are in their graves, the gentle race of flowers
Are lying in their lowly beds, with the fair and good of ours.
The rain is falling where they lie, but the cold November rain
Calls not from out the gloomy earth the lovely ones again.

The wind flower and the violet, they perished long ago,
And the briar rose and the orchis died amid the summer glow;
But on the hill the goldenrod, and the aster in the wood,
And the yellow sunflower by the brook, in autumn beauty stood.
Till fell the frost from the clear cold heaven, as falls the plague on men,
And the brightness of their smile was gone, from upland, glade, and glen.

And now, when comes the calm, mild day, as still such days will come,
To call the squirrel and the bee from out their winter home;
When the sound of dropping nuts is heard, though all the trees are still,
And twinkle in the smoky light the waters of the rill,
The south wind searches for the flowers whose fragrance late he bore,
And sighs to find them in the wood and by the stream no more.

And then I think of one who in her youthful beauty died.
The fair, meek blossom that grew up and faded by my side.
In the cold, moist earth we laid her, when the forest cast the leaf,
And we wept that one so lovely should have a life so brief:
Yet not unmet it was that one like that young friend of ours,
So gentle and so beautiful, should perish with the flowers.

The report on the work of the medical department of the army by Surgeon-General R. M. O'Reilly, just made public, goes into that service during the calendar year 1905 and also compares the health of the different armies of the world, as far as possible, in view of the different conditions in each army. The highest rate is 13.21 per thousand men, with the American army ranking second, with 12.95, and the Russian army holding the lowest rate of 3.48 per thousand men. The British army ranks first in the death rate, with 7.13 per thousand men, the American army having the next highest, 6.28. The Prussian army has the lowest rate, two per thousand men.

Willett M. Hayes, Assistant Secretary of Agriculture, has deserted the study of scientific farming and taken up the task of improving the human race. He has appointed a committee to devise means of recording the values of the blood of the different races. Dr. Hayes, while head of the Minnesota Experiment Station, worked with plants and animals and gave his heredity ideas full play, and now wants to apply his scientific deductions to human beings.

A New York concern has begun the manufacture of a specially made rope for balloon purposes. One prominent aeronaut has given it an order for 60,000 feet. Heretofore these explorers of the faithless upper regions have been compelled to import the rope needed for their excursions. The kind now being made in America is hand-spun from the finest Italian fiber and laid up with the utmost care, so as to produce the greatest possible tensile strength with a minimum weight.

There is a training school for elephants at Apl, in the Congo State, where twenty-eight elephants are taking lessons. The training operations have produced encouraging results, says the Tribune Congolaise.

Receipts of the New York postoffice are far ahead of those of any other office in the world for the same extent of territory. At the present rate, for this year, they will be about $17,000,000.

When Hawaii was discovered by Captain Cook in 1778, it had a population of 200,000. There are now only 31,000 natives on the island.

LETTERS OF A WAR SURGEON.

Striking Incidents Chronicled by a Physician with the Union Army.

A novel contribution to the history of the Civil War is a volume containing extracts from letters written in army hospitals, in ambulances, in camp, on the march, and nearly always in the midst of a "perfect maelstrom of horror," by an army surgeon to his wife. The "Letters from a Surgeon of the Civil War," were written by Dr. John G. Perry, of the Twentieth Massachusetts Regiment, during the period from May 18, 1862, to August 13, 1864. From a field hospital two miles above Hanover Junction he writes:

I can scratch only a few lines, being up to my eyes in blood. Oh, the fatigue and endless work we surgeons have! About one night in three to sleep in, and then we are so nervous and played out that sleep is impossible.

It seems to me I am quite callous to death now, and that I could see my dearest friend die without much feeling. This condition tells a long story which, under other circumstances, could scarcely be imagined. During the last three weeks I have seen probably no less than two thousand deaths, and among them those of many dear friends. I have witnessed hundreds of men shot dead, have walked and slept among them, and surely I feel it possible to die myself as calmly as any—but enough of this. The fight is now fearful, and ambulances are coming in with great rapidity, each bearing its suffering load.

Dr. Perry cites many cases of remarkable recovery from severe wounds. The following is a striking instance:

On one of the recent days of fighting, at early dawn the troops were in line, when the order was given to charge without noise. While on the run—I following with my hospital steward about twenty yards in the rear of the men—we saw in a clump of bushes a pair of boots with soles up, as if the owner had taken a headlong leap into the hedge. Stopping to investigate, I pulled out Captain Kelliher of the Twentieth. He was horribly mangled about the face and neck, as if from a shell or solid shot; yet no gun had been heard, and no one seen to leave the ranks.

I found him bleeding freely from a laceration of the subclavian artery, showing that the injury could only have been received a moment before, else he would have bled to death. He was still living, though unconscious, and after tying the artery, so as to stop the hemorrhage, he was placed on a stretcher and carried to the rear. The fighting lasted but a short time; as the Confederates were but partially surprised, they rallied and held us in check.

As soon as the Division Hospital tents were up, I had Kelliher taken to Dr. Hayward, who, finding him still alive, though yet unconscious, decided to remove the shattered bones and clean and stitch the wounds, so as to give him all the comfort possible, but with no hope of saving his life. Under the chloroform the captain rallied still more, and a few hours after our work was finished he finally became conscious. Dr. Hayward had removed the shattered lower jaw, the whole arm, including a shoulder-blade, scapula, the clavicle, or collar-bone, and a large part of the first two ribs on the same side of the body, as all these broken bones were lacerating the flesh, and the surfaces of the lung were exposed. When the operation was completed, the line of suture for closing the wounds ran from the ear to within an inch or two of the pelvis.

I placed the patient under my shelter tent, and ordered the steward to feed and stimulate him as directed. In the night it rained so hard that I dug a trench about him to keep him from being drenched and chilled. The following day we were ordered to push on, and to place the wounded who were unable to march, in army wagons destined for the "White House Landing," which was twenty miles away. What was to become of poor Kelliher? Surely he could never survive such a strain, even though at the time he was doing well. After much deliberation I decided to consult the Captain himself, and to follow his decision. In presenting to him the situation, I offered to remain with him in case he wished to be left, and told him that we must simply make up our minds to be captured by the enemy; but his answer was clear and prompt: "I will go to the White House Landing, Doctor, and, Doctor, I shall live." So, doing what was possible to make him comfortable with the use of straw and grass by way of a mattress, I bade him goodbye, never dreaming that he could survive such a journey.

Captain Kelliher, after complete recovery, rejoined the Twentieth and was commissioned its major, and remained in active service with the regiment till the end of the war.

Many of the conscripts who were forced into the army by drafting behaved disgracefully, deserting at every opportunity. This temporarily demoralized several commands. Dr. Perry gives a graphic description of the murder of his friend, Captain McKay:

On the 5th of October, 1863, a horrible murder occurred in the camp of the Twentieth Massachusetts, and as the facts concerning it extended through many weeks, it seems well to collect and give them as a whole.

Our corps was encamped in a thick wood within a few miles of Culpeper, and its presence could only be detected by the clouds of smoke from camp-fires curling above the trees. Close to our rear was a regiment notorious for its drunken brawls and lawlessness. It was composed principally of conscripts, substitutes, and New York rioters, among them many jail-birds, and force and arms were often necessary to quell the incessant rows and disturbances among these rough characters.

On the evening of October 5, taps had sounded in the Twentieth Massachusetts, lights were out, every man was in his tent, and the silence of the night was broken only by the wind which swept fitfully through the pines. Only the officer of the day and I were in camp, the others being on a visit to another regiment, and the soft little glimmer of light which shone forth in the prevailing darkness came from the tent outside of which Captain McKay and I were seated.

The Captain had enlisted as a private when the regiment was first organized, and by his intelligence, bravery, and good fellowship had reached his present rank. Company F, which he commanded, was made up of the worst elements in the regiment, which was otherwise unusual for military deportment and manly bearing.

We sat talking of the incessant delays in hostilities, when a shout interrupted us, followed by yells and drunken laughter.

"The fellows in our rear," I said, after a moment's pause; but the Captain's face was anxious.

"No," he answered, "those are my men; they are drunk and quarrelsome; something tells me there is trouble brewing to-night; ever since I punished the ringleaders in those rows they have been sullen and out of temper. In the drill this afternoon I did not like their mood," and asking me to stand ready in case of need, he left and sauntered toward the company's tent.

I heard the Captain order his men to their quarters, but in so calm a voice that it seemed to me he dealt too gently with the brutes; and on the instant there was a shot and then a moan. I reached the spot in time to see the Captain leap into the air and fall, and to hear him cry, "Doctor, I am murdered!"

By the flickering light of the same little candle by which he had just sat, we bore him into the tent; but he was dead when we reached it. Dead! A little enough word, but with such weight of meaning!

Instantly the sergeant, then aroused, ordered the men of the Captain's company into line; the officers were sent for, and, on their quick return, the roll was called, and every gun examined. Every man was present, and each had his gun, but many of them were so drunk they could barely stand. Those who were sufficiently sober knew that they stood not only in the presence of a crime, but of their murdered Captain, whose body was now stretched upon the ground before them. Neither moon nor stars shone upon them; no other light than the uncertain glimmer of a camp fire and tent candle, which only added to the ghastly pallor of the men.

The officers gathered about the body of the murdered Captain, and after a brief consultation it was decided to dismiss the men and wait until the morning for further action. The body was removed to a large tent, where the sergeant and I watched over it for the remainder of the night. The wind moaned and whistled, things creaked and flapped in the blasts, and in this weary vigil even the monotonous tramp, tramp of a sentinel outside the tent took its place in the tragedy. The night wore on, and in the bleak and cheerless dawn all the officers of the regiment gathered about the dead Captain to hold a council. After long deliberation it was decided that the men of Company F should march into the tent one by one, kneel, kiss the Bible, and, with one hand on the heart of the murdered man, each should swear before God that he was innocent of all implication in the crime.

In the solemn silence of this Court of Officers, under the concentrated attention of all present, when not the flicker of an eyelid could escape observation, each man faced the ordeal without flinching, with no sign of guilt; and many bore themselves with the dignity of honest freedom, though in the presence of conditions before which even an innocent heart might quail. The experiment was a failure, and hours passed in which all available means to discover the assassin were fruitlessly tried. Even the lawless men of the Captain's company were shocked into good behavior, and in their bearing expressed respect and love for their dead commander.

The sergeant and I carefully watched the placing of the Captain's body in an ambulance for Alexandria, where the remains would be embalmed before the journey home.

As we were about to start we saw a stranger in officer's uniform approaching us, who asked where he could find the officer in command of the regiment. The Major, who happened to be near, heard the question, and said, "What is your business with me?"

"I hail from the same place as the Captain who was killed last night," answered the man. "I've served my time and am on my way home, and, if you like, will take charge of the body and see that it arrives safely."

The Major became interested. It seemed a most fortunate arrangement, especially in a time of so much hurry and confusion, and after a brief conference with the other officers of the regiment, it was decided that the opportunity was too good a one to lose, and that they had better accept an offer of such disinterested services.

Letters of sympathy were sent to the fiancée of the dead Captain, advising her also that the body was being transported to the North, in care of a life-long friend. But the sequel was startling.

More weeks passed, when one day, while the officers were together at mess, an orderly handed a letter to the Major in command of the regiment.

"By Jove!" said the latter, glancing at the postmark, "this letter is from the Captain's poor girl," and tearing it open, he read the contents aloud. They stated that neither the body of Captain McKay nor the man who left the camp with it in charge had arrived; nor would they ever do so, for she was absolutely certain that that man was the assassin. Some time ago she had refused his offer of marriage and, when he heard of her engagement to the Captain, he swore he would kill him, if it were necessary to enlist for the purpose. Subsequently he had enlisted in a New York regiment, from which she also knew he was dishonorably discharged at the date of the murder.

Wider interest in the matter was raised; more funds subscribed and detectives sent in all directions. The contents of the letter soon spread among the men of the regiment, and those concerned in the drunken brawl on the night of the murder finally confessed that the man who traveled from camp with the dead Captain was the same who gave them whiskey the night he was shot; that this man did his best to incite them to the murder, and, when he failed in this, grabbed the boy's gun, crouched in the bushes, and fired the fatal shot himself.

In course of time news arrived of the capture of the murderer in a Western regiment, and that he was then on his way back to our quarters under strict guard. The satisfaction of officers and men was immense, and not one would have tossed a penny to save the wretch's life. We had all the necessary proof and every witness of the deed was present.

When the man arrived, a court-martial was immediately convened. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to be hanged; but before the execution could take place the necessary papers must be supervised in Washington, and during this delay the prisoner was strictly guarded night and day.

But there was a legal flaw in the papers, and they were compelled to liberate the prisoner. During a lull in the fighting near Petersburg in June, 1864, there was a sharpshooters' duel which Dr. Perry describes as follows:

Towards noon, yesterday, weary, I suppose, of the inaction, a Confederate sharpshooter mounted his earthwork and challenged one of our sharpshooters to single combat. Lieutenant G., a fine fellow, standing at least six feet two in his stockings, accepted the challenge, and they commenced what to them was sport. Life is cheap in this campaign! Both fired, and the Confederate dropped. G.'s great size was so unusual that his opponent had the advantage, and our men tried to make him give way to a smaller man. But, no! He would not listen, became very excited as his successes multiplied, and when darkness stopped the duelling he remained unscathed, while every opponent had fallen victim to his unerring aim.

The lieutenant was so exhilarated that he claimed with much bluster a charmed life; said nothing would kill him, that he could stand any amount of duelling, and this he would prove in the morning. When he was in his tent for the night, we officers used every argument and entreaty to convince him of the foolhardiness and criminality of such a course, and also assured him of the certainty of his death.

As we all foretold, he was finally killed, but his death was due to treachery. In the morning, true to his mistaken conviction, he stood upon the works again and challenged an opponent. Instantly one appeared, and as both were taking aim, a man from another part of the Confederate line fired and shot G. through the mouth, the ball lodging in the spinal vertebrae, completely paralyzing him below the head. We dragged the poor, deluded fellow to his tent, where, after uttering inarticulately, "I hit him any way, Doctor," he died.

We then heard a tremendous uproar outside, and found that our men were claiming the murderer of their lieutenant; but the Confederates shouted that they had already shot him for a cowardly villain, and then came praises across the line for Lieutenant G.'s pluck and skill.

An interesting letter written at the commencement of the campaign of 1864 under Grant, is replete with vivid description of unusual incidents:

Hot firing opened at daybreak, and it seemed so near that when orders came to "fall in line," the new German recruits simply would not obey. They were so terrified that they lay like logs, and no amount of rough handling, even with bayonets, had any effect upon them whatever. The order to advance was given; still these fellows clung to the ground with faces buried in the grass, and, although some were shot by the officers, literally nothing moved them.

"Go on," was the next order, and on we went, leaving the miserable wretches lying there—a few may have fallen into line, but I doubt it. We pushed forward, and very quickly were walking over rows of dead bodies piled at times two and three deep, and they lay in lines, exactly as if mowed down, showing the havoc of yesterday's fight. These lines seemed to be equally distant one from the other, as if each body of men advanced a certain distance, received a volley, then advanced again, and received another. I noticed a man lying near me in the ranks at this time singing a hymn with all his might and main. His head was thrown back, his mouth wide open, and he seemed completely absorbed in the emotion called forth to the hymn, which made him oblivious to all surroundings. I watched him curiously, and understood that it was an instinctive impulse on his part to try to hold his senses together and to steady himself under the well-nigh unendurable strain. As long as I saw the fellow, he kept his place without stumbling, and obeyed orders.

Meanwhile reserves were brought up, and among them I saw General Bartlett at the head of his brigade; but we had time only for a passing salute. Shortly after that an orderly came towards me, leading a horse, with an officer in the saddle, back from the front. The man was bent far over the horse's neck, bleeding profusely from a wound in the head, and white as death. To my dismay, I saw it was Frank Bartlett, and I called his name again and again, but did not succeed in rousing him. Passing my finger into the wound before taking him from the saddle, I found the ball had not penetrated the bone, but had simply severed an artery in the scalp; so, pressing the artery till a steward brought a ligature, I shouted, "No harm done, old boy; this is only a flesh wound; you will be all right when I tie the artery and take a stitch or two"; and this good news seemed to bring him back to consciousness. I then laid him on the ground, and, after my work was finished, gave him a good horn of whisky, and very soon he rallied completely.

"John," he said, "I thought I was done for. Well, old fellow, if I'm all right, here goes!" and before I could stop him he had sprung into the saddle, waved his hand to me, and was off to the front again as fast as his horse could carry him. Such is the mental power of the two little words "death" and "life."

The "Letters from a Surgeon of the Civil War" were edited by Mrs. Perry, who contributes an interesting chapter on the draft riots of New York. The book is illustrated from historical photographs.

In Los Angeles the Superior Court has decided the suit of W. D. Turner, a stockholder in the American Boy Mining Company, against Governor H. H. Markham, president, and George H. Coffin, secretary of that corporation, giving judgment in favor of the plaintiff for principal and interest in excess of $100,000. The court found that the defendants had sold 3120 shares of the mining stock for $52,653.35 and had issued, without consideration, 2880 shares, for which they were charged $57,800. Turner, as a stockholder in the corporation, brought suit against Markham and Coffin several months ago, charging that they had issued many shares of stock for which the stockholders had received no returns. The defendants denied that the stock disposed of belonged to the stockholders, asserting that it belonged, instead, to them individually.

The directors of the United States Steel Corporation have declared a quarterly dividend of one-half of one per cent. on the common stock. This is the same as the last dividend on the common stock. The directors also declared the regular quarterly dividend of one and three-quarters per cent. on the preferred stock. The net earnings for the quarter ending September 30, were $38,114,624, as compared with $31,240,532 for the corresponding quarter of last year. The unfilled orders on hand September 30 were 7,936,884 tons, as compared with 5,865,377 on September 30, 1905.

The House of Representatives of New Zealand has approved the renewal of the San Francisco mail subsidy for three years, with the proviso that new steamships shall be provided within two years, in default of which the Postmaster-General is empowered to give six months' notice of the withdrawal of the subsidy. The House also authorized the making of a contract for the Vancouver service, giving $3000 to steamships making the trip in eighteen days, the maximum subsidy to be $100,000.

The Parrott estate has decided to rebuild at once on the site of the Emporium on Market street. The new structure will be designed for commercial and office purposes. It will cost $1,000,000 or more. While in general the architecture will follow the lines of the old structure the new edifice will contain an arcade with a spacious approach from Market street. It is to be a Class A building.

General Sir Ian Hamilton, who may succeed Kitchener as commander in chief in India, has been wounded in almost every action in which he has taken part.

James Hazen Hyde, ex-vice-president of the Equitable Life Insurance Company, who is living in Paris, has arranged for a debate in French between Harvard and Yale. He has offered a prize to the team winning such a contest.

George R. Peck, the general counsel of the United States, is one of the few men in the United States who refused to go to the United States Senate. He was appointed once by the Governor of Wisconsin and would not take the oath.

The wireless dispatches received on shore during the voyage of the battleship Louisiana, commanded by President Roosevelt and party to Panama, sent by Lieutenant Frank Taylor Evans, and Admiral Evans, who was recently appointed aid to the President.

Commander Peary's seventh expedition to the Arctic regions brought him a few miles nearer the North Pole than any former explorer, but astronomer, Morris K. Jessup of New York, who had the funds for the trip, is disappointed result, as announced a few days ago.

When Arthur J. Balfour was secretary for Ireland he once asked the celebrated Father Time: "Do the Irish really hate me as much as the newspapers say?" The grim old wit replied: "My dear sir, if they only hated the devil as much as they hate you my occupation would be gone."

Captain Amundsen and the five Norwegian men who accompanied him in his three years' voyage in the Arctic regions and through the Northwest Passage, were met in Chicago on their way eastward by the disappointing news that they had withdrawn the offered prize of $100,000, which it was believed they had won.

England's premier motorist, Charles Stewart Rolls, is in America. He is also a noted aviator. It is his first trip across the Atlantic, and on several occasions, when ballooning, he has been in it. Mr. Rolls is the third Lord Llangatock. He will make a tour of the United States in a twenty horse power car.

Mary Baker G. Eddy was visited at her home in Concord, N. H., recently by a number of New York and Boston reporters, who were anxious to learn of her health, as the New York World had just published a sensational dispatch saying Mrs. Eddy was dying and was impersonated in public by another woman. Mrs. Eddy, who is at the head of the Christian Scientists, a wealthy and numerous organization, answered two questions concerning her health and then walked to her carriage for her daily drive. She is eighty-six years old.

The energy of the Duchess Dowager Fitz-James cost France as much as the last war and had the indirect effect of making a sober nation one of dram drinkers. The duchess in her passion for self-aggrandizement imported vines from America to plant on her estate in Nugard. They brought phylloxera there. It spread all over France and ruined for years the vintage departments. Her American vines could resist this disease; French vines could not. This loss to the Gironde alone came to 500,000,000 francs. M. Fallieres' whole family and connections were nearly ruined by phylloxera.

Eleanor, Duchess of Northumberland, who is now eighty-six, belongs to the old-world type of aristocrat, and was a great social power in England in the middle of Queen Victoria's reign. Lord Prudhoe, as he then was—the title became extinct at his death—succeeded as fourth Duke of Northumberland in 1847, five years after his marriage to Lady Eleanor Grosvenor, eldest of the nine sisters of the late Duke of Westminster. Six of this remarkable group of sisters are still living, the next in order to the duchess being Lady Macclesfield. Her grace's marriage was childless, and the dukedom passed at her husband's death in 1865 to a remote cousin.

Because of failure to disclose the identity of some of their numbers, guilty of violence and murder, the President has dismissed in disgrace from the army the entire membership of Companies B, C, and D, of the Twenty-fifth Infantry (negro), which has been stationed in Texas. He accompanied this action by an order which may amount to the court-martial of a white officer also. The actions grew out of the recent race riots in Brownsville, Texas. The white officer, Colonel William L. Pitcher, who will be tried for his offense, is said to have reflected seriously on the character of the negro troops in a public statement, and also on the policy of the Government in enlisting them.

To offset the lingering effects of the San Francisco earthquake a movement which has been shaping for the past four months has at last taken definite form in the "Development Society of California." Its avowed purpose is to expend from half a million to a million dollars in legitimate advertising of California's unrivaled resources and attractions throughout the Middle West and the Eastern States. The officers of the company are: President, J. J. McMillan, general manager of the Huntington railway lines; first vice-president, U. S. Grant, of San Diego; second vice-president and manager, W. Scott Smith; secretary, O. V. Eaton, confidential secretary of H. E. Huntington. These gentlemen, with D. A. Hamburger, Frank Short, of Fresno, and Frank Miller, owner of the Glenwood Hotel at Riverside, compose the directorate of the society.

Major-General William Rufus Shafter, U. S. A., retired, died November 12, at the home of Captain W. H. McKittrick, near Bakersfield, Cal., after an illness of only a week. Captain and Mrs. W. H. McKittrick, the son-in-law and daughter, Miss Carrie Redmond, a niece, Mrs. Courtright, and James N. Shafter, a brother, were at his side when the end came. General Shafter was 71 years old. The experience of General Shafter ranged over a vast amount of territory with the serving through two wars. He fought through the Civil War and was in command of the army of invasion in Cuba. The forces stationed at Tampa, Fla., under his charge, crossed to Santiago, where General Shafter was present at the surrender.

Commissioner General of Immigration, Sargent, has left Washington for Honolulu, where he is to supervise the landing of the 1300 Portuguese immigrants, bound from the Azores Islands. They are aboard the steamer Sueve and are scheduled to reach the Hawaiian Islands about November 30. Mr. Sargent goes to Honolulu at the direction of the President, who deems this class of immigration into Hawaii an event of great significance. The Portuguese will settle on government land.

D. M. Delmas, the well-known attorney of San Francisco, has been engaged as counsel for the defense of Harry K. Thaw, now in prison in New York charged with the murder of Stanford White.

VANITY FAIR.

Dr. Emil Reich, who offended many Americans by his criticism of American women in lectures to British women, has made a thrust now at the men of the United States in giving what he evidently considers a scientific explanation of the riot at the Longchamps race-course in Paris a short time ago. The professor's remarks are noted in a London dispatch.

"It was the same," he asserts, "as a theatre panic or a lynching. It is only a country where there is absolute psychological equality of men that such a thing could occur. In France or America the men are like a prairie, they are all on the same psychological level. Frenchmen and Americans are as level and like one another as the blades of grass on a prairie. Two, five or nine persons become enthusiastic about something and the whole nation goes mad."

"The American nation is simply a series of John Smiths. Any one who ventures to express an opinion that is not a general one, is looked on as a crank or a madman."

"There is the same thing in France. The people are not sufficiently individualized. They are on the same prairie level and 'egalite' is realized, not only in law, but in the whole machinery and apparatus of life."

"I have actually seen a lynching in America; have watched madness grow. Some one shouted 'Lynch him!' and the excitement spread from one man to another until it accumulated momentum and became irresistible. Every one was swept off his feet. The madness caught me, too. I felt it myself."

"I am a great admirer of both the French and the Americans, but this is the true explanation of such an outburst."

"An English crowd is composed of many individuals—a gentleman, an officer, a clerk, a workman, etc. Some one may shout 'Lynch him!' but another will say 'No! We have courts of law.' The volume of indignation is too poor; there are too many different opinions for momentum to accumulate. There is no more possibility of a feeling of equality growing in England than there is of the people talking French. If there was there would be an end to the nation."

An incident that had a sobering effect on an English visitor is described by Mrs. F. H. Burnett in her latest story in The Century, "The Shuttle." Some men—hard-headed, rich stock-brokers, with a vulgar sense of humor—were enjoying themselves quite uproariously, one night at a club over a story one of them was relating of an unsatisfactory German son-in-law who had demanded an income. He was a man of small title who had married the narrator's daughter, and after some months spent in his father-in-law's house, had felt it but proper that his financial position should be put on a practical footing.

"He brought her back after the bridal tour to make us a visit," said the story-teller. "I had nothing to say against that, because we were all glad to see her home and her mother had been missing her. But weeks passed and months passed, and there was no mention made of them going over to settle in the sloop we'd heard so much of and in time it came out that the sloop thing—he meant 'schloss'—wasn't his at all. It was his elder brother's. The whole lot of them were counts, and not one of them seemed to own a dime. The sloop count hadn't more than twenty-five cents, and he wasn't the kind to deal any of it out to his family. So Lily's count would have to go clerking in a dry-goods store if he proposed to support himself. But he didn't propose to do it. He thought he'd got on to a soft thing. Of course we're an easy-going lot, and we should have stood him if he'd been a nice fellow. But he wasn't. Lily's mother used to find her crying in her bedroom, and it came out by degrees that it was because Adolf had been quarreling with her and saying sneering things about her family. When her mother talked to him, he was insulting."

"Then bills began to come in, and Lily was expected to get me to pay them. And they were not the kind of bills a decent fellow calls on another man to pay. But I did it five or six times, to make it easy for her. But that didn't work well. He thought I did it because I had to, and he began to feel free and easy about it, and didn't try to cover up his tracks as much when he sent in a new lot. He was always working Lily. He began to consider himself master of the house. He intimated that a private carriage ought to be kept for them. He said it was beggarly that he should have to consider the rest of the family when he wanted to go out. When I got on to the situation I began to enjoy it. I let him spread himself for a while, just to see what he would do."

The end of the story came with the description of the son-in-law's blunt request for an allowance, after a full statement of his condescension in marrying, and his noble deserts. The stock-broker heard him through and then got up and said:

"Well, it won't take long for me to answer that. I've always been fond of my children, and Lily is rather my pet. She's always had everything she wanted, and she always shall. She's a good girl and she deserves it. I'll allow you just five minutes to get out of this room before I kick you out; and if I kick you out of the room, I'll kick you down the stairs, and if I kick you down the stairs, I shall have got my blood comfortably warmed up, and I'll kick you down the street, and round the block, and over to Hoboken, because you're going to take a steamer there and go back, steerage-passage, to the place you came from, to the sloop thing, or whatever you call it. We haven't a bit of use for you here, and, believe it or not, gentlemen"—looking round with a wry-mouthed smile—"he took that steerage-passage, and back he went. And Lily's living with her mother, and I mean to hold on to her."

A family of Newark, N. J., has hit upon a solution of the servant problem. It is contained in the following advertisement in the Newark Evening News:

Wanted, by small family, girl to assist in general housework; no washing or ironing; mistress will do all chamber work, including sweeping and dusting; four nights a week allowed, also one whole day; night key given; private bath connected with girl's suite of rooms; no piano, but will get one if required; salary $29 per month and perquisites; will give references. Address Reference, box 87, News office.

The purpose of putting the wages at $29 a month is to make it easy for the applicant to say "One dollar more," thus raising her wages to $30 before she has begun her round of pleasure. The family have overlooked none of the details of their plan of salvation. Owing to the cost of newspaper space they did not enumerate the perquisites; but applicants probably will be told that they include liberal allowances of butter, coffee, sugar, cold chicken, bottled beer, cakes, the boss's cigars and such other staples as by time-honored custom go to the housemaid's friends or relatives.

Terpsichore is to come into her own again. That which has been termed dancing but which the muse herself would have blushed to acknowledge is to give place during the coming season to the curves of the old-time waltz, the grace of which is self-evident. Such at least was the ultimatum of the United Professional Teachers of Dancing reached at the convention which was held recently, reports the Chicago Chronicle.

The gradual ascendancy of the popular skip and slide two-step has made lovers of graceful movement tremble and grow weak in the knees. More than one anticipated the day when Darwin's theory would be borne out to the letter and we should find ourselves facing a future of monkeylike, swinging steps calculated to cover the greatest amount of space in the shortest possible time.

But all this, we are told, will soon be of the past. The future will not find us emerging from our terpsichorean efforts looking and feeling as though we had just come out of the steamroom of a Turkish bath. Men will no longer go to soirees supplied with two or three clean collars to be prepared in case of necessity.

With the rejuvenation of the real waltz, whose beauties prompted the immortal Strauss compositions, it presages at least a temporary dislocation of ragtime deliriums and Avenue A rhapsodies in favor of the old, easy motion.

According to the new decree we must glide instead of slide; we must turn and reverse to dreamy musical overtures, and the sudden spurt from one end of a room to the other, with its accompanying whirl that literally carries us off our feet, must be scorned altogether. The waltz in its various phases is to reign once more.

A momentous change has been decreed in the habits of London society, initiated by the King, says a note in the society columns of a London paper. His Majesty disapproved of the tendency to make the dinner hour later and later, and has decreed that hereafter the fashionable dinner hour shall be from 6.30 to 7.30.

Before this change was instituted society dined from 8 to 9. The new dinner hour, which is a return to earlier manners, is welcomed by everybody. It will benefit the theatres, which have lost many patrons through the late dinner hour, and it will also send more people to the restaurants for supper.

People who dined at 8 o'clock were not always inclined for supper afterward, and could not reach the theatre before the middle of the performance.

Rules for Automobile Guests.

Always tell your host that this is the finest machine you ever rode in.
Ask him if it isn't the best make there is.
Say you thought so, when he says yes.
Ask him what really makes it go.
Listen while he tells you.
Ask him if he isn't going very swiftly.
Express surprise when he says the machine is merely getting warmed up, and for you to wait.
Remark that automobiling is the poetry of motion.

And that you never before knew what it meant to really live.

And that you feel an exquisite, inexplicable elation.

Admire his motoring get-up.
Tell him how well he looks in automobile togs.
Ask him if you may suggest a name for his machine.

Ask him what are the spark plugs.
Ask him how to spell carbureter.

Express no surprise at his reply.
Say that you would be afraid to go as fast if any one else were driving.

Ask to have all the parts in sight explained to you.

Inquire minutely about the others.
Introduce no subject save automobiles.

Disparage all others and praise the one you're in.—Carolyn Wells, in Life.

The temporary Palace Hotel on the corner of Post and Leavenworth Streets is bustling with activity. The smell of fresh paint fills the rooms, but Colonel Kirkpatrick says that everything is in readiness. The first dinner in the new Palace will be served to-day, and meals will be served regularly and guests cared for from this time on.

The winter racing season at the California Jockey Club Track, Emeryville, begins to-day. The chief event is the opening handicap for a purse of $2000. The arrangements of boats and trains are made most convenient for those who attend.

Mayor Schmitz is on his way home and is expected to arrive early next week.

Dramatic Notes.

A temporary theatre is being planned by Gottlob, Marx & Co., to be erected on the old St. Ignatius site, at Van Ness avenue and Grove street. The building is to be constructed of fire-proof materials, and is promised for completion early in the new year.

"The Love Route," the new play by Edward Peple, produced a few days ago at the Lincoln Square Theatre in New York, gives Guy Standing, the favorite leading man a strong part, and is already a popular success.

Rex Beach has been assisted by James MacArthur in making a play out of his magazine serial story, "The Spoilers." It is said to be a series of true pictures of Alaska life. The play was produced at the New Theatre in Chicago a few days ago.

Forbes Robertson and his wife, Gertrude Elliott, produced George Bernard Shaw's travesty, "Cesar and Cleopatra," at the New Amsterdam Theatre in New York a few days ago, and made a favorable impression in the leading parts. Shaw's work is said to be very witty and sometimes startling in its unconventionalism.

Charles Ulrich, who deserted newspaper work in San Francisco to become a playwright, has two or three of his dramatic sketches on the stages of Chicago theatres.

Arnold Daly says that his bankruptcy is the result of the interdicted "Mrs. Warren's Profession," which cost him heavily and did not have an opportunity to become a popular success.

Goldsmith's comedy, "The Good-natur'd Man," first produced at Covent Garden in 1768, and a failure then, was recently revived in London, but it is still declared to be a bad piece of work for the stage.

Musical Notes.

The Lambardi Italian Grand Opera Company opened a season in Los Angeles last week at the new Auditorium, presenting "Aida." Esther Adaberto sang the title-role, Mathilde Campo-fiore was the Amneris, C. Bacchetta was the Amonasro, and D'Ottavi the Radames. On the second evening "Lucia" was given. The season will last four weeks.

Mme. Gadsby will give the first concert in a subscription course in Albany December 13.

Henry W. Savage will send the opera "Madame Butterfly" to the Pacific Coast this season.

Mme. Louise Cappiani, the noted music teacher of New York, recently returned from Europe with her arm and shoulder encased in plaster of Paris. While preparing to sail for home Mme. Cappiani had a severe fall at her Swiss villa, but the effects will not long delay her work. Mme. Cappiani, in addition to teaching many students and convent teachers, is busy in general musical work, being a director and officer of several New York City and national musical organizations.

Mme. Melba is singing at Covent Garden, London, in the season of Italian opera, but will sail for America next month. She will appear in only ten concert programmes during her stay in this country.

Camille Saint Saens, the French composer, made his first appearance in New York November 3, playing his own fantasia for the piano, "Africa," and a waltz-caprice, also his own composition, at a concert given by the New York symphony Orchestra led by Walter Damrosch.

Zoltan de T. Gyongyoshalasz, the Hungarian pianist and composer, is among the noted musicians now giving recitals in the East.

A testimonial benefit for Henry Clay Barnabee and the widow of William H. MacDonald will be given the afternoon of Tuesday, December 11, in the Broadway Theatre, New York City.

Plays that Have Earned Millions.

"Good old 'Rip Van Winkle,'" said a stage manager, "holds the record as a money maker among modern plays. 'Rip' has earned, down to date, something over $5,000,000.

"When 'Erminie' was first produced in London, it was a total failure. But Rudolph Aronson saw the possibilities of the pretty and graceful opera, he secured the American rights, he engaged Francis Wilson, Marie Jansen, and Pauline Hall for the leading roles, and he produced 'Erminie' superbly. The result was that this opera, which had been pronounced worthless, was acted 4,800 times, and earned $3,000,000.

"Kate Claxton played 'The Two Orphans' 500 times, making $2,000,000 out of the play. "Denman Thompson, when he wrote 'The Old Homestead,' little thought that his wholesome drama would earn $4,000,000 in twelve years. Yet those are the authenticated figures. "De Koven's 'Robin Hood' and Jones's 'Silver King' have each earned $3,000,000, and still bring in royalties to their happy authors.

"Among recent successes the greatest is Pinero's 'House in Order.' This play was put on at the St. James Theatre last February, and ran steadily through the summer. It earned at the St. James $1,100,000, and its provincial and American runs are still to be heard from."

The Passion of a Poet's Play.

In a recent issue of "The Outlook," edited by a clergyman, appears the following notice of the play in which Henry Miller and Margaret Anglin have achieved great success:

"It is an event of significance, when an American poet who stands in the front rank of our younger group, of verse-writers, Mr. William Vaughn Moody, not only produces an acting play in prose, but avoids conventional tragedy, and, in the main, poetic sentiment, and attempts to deal with a modern, American, passionately dramatic (one may almost but not quite say melodramatic) theme. And it is notable also, entirely apart from one's view of Mr. Moody's success or failure in working out his theme, that the play, 'The Great Divide,' as presented at the Princess Theatre in New York City, has taken an immediate and strong hold upon the public, and is evidently to have a long run before crowded houses. There is no question as to the forcefulness of the terribly cruel situation about which Mr. Moody's play centers; neither is there doubt of his intention to treat this theme seriously and with ethical purpose; there is great doubt whether this last intention is carried out clearly or consistently.

"Briefly stated, the woman whose anguish is pitilessly laid before the audience is attacked in a lonely Arizona cabin by three drunken and passion-inflamed brutes, and buys her honor from the least beastly of the three by promising to marry him immediately and live with him faithfully as his wife. The compact is carried out. What one expects to follow, and what may seem to be Mr. Moody's real purpose, is the gradual change of the husband's moral nature and character through the sight of his wife's suffering, distress, and degradation, through remorse, and through the growth of an ennobled love in his own heart. But what really does take place is an almost instantaneous transformation which is no more convincing than is the first presentment of the man as an unutterably vile and despicable villain. In fact, from beginning to end, in the present writer's judgment of the play as it actually affects the hearer, the man is a moral and psychological impossibility. Hardly more credible is the final discovery by the wife (a part acted with sincerity and emotional power by Margaret Anglin) that she not only does love but has unconsciously long loved her husband. It is not at all improbable that as originally written Mr. Moody's play may have worked out its tense problems more subtly and more consistently than in the stage version, probably condensed for practical reasons; and one even wishes also that he could have had the larger scope and opportunity offered by the novel to develop his thesis. As it is, the hearer recognizes in the play vigor, audacity, and originality; quite exonerates the playwright from unworthy appeal by the use of an almost unspeakably horrible situation; but fails to find precision of purpose or reasonable evolution of character out of passion."

A London Editor on Vaudeville.

William T. Stead, the noted journalist, has visited a London music hall for the first time in his life, and this is the way he describes the effect upon him of the show:

"If I had to sum up the whole performance in a single phrase, I should say 'Drivel for the dregs.'"

"My first impression was one of unutterable boredom. For three and a half solid hours I sat, patiently listening to the most insufferable banality and imbecility that ever fell upon human ears.

"My second impression was one of wrathful indignation. It seemed intolerable that in Anno Domini 1906, the heirs of thousands of years of civilization and the product of thirty-five years of the Educational act should relish this inane drivel. It was not the immorality that roused me so much as the imbecility. I did not feel that they were vicious so much as nakedly stupid and unashamed.

"My third impression was the absence, with one or two exceptions, of anything beautiful or melodious."

"La Milo's" classical poses met with his warmest encomiums, and he declared it impossible to see anything indecent in them.

The directors of the Pavilion, which Mr. Stead visited, are considering the question of bringing a libel suit.

The Fruit and Flower Mission.

Next Thursday is Thanksgiving. As in former years some will have a surfeit of good things, some a sufficiency, some—the poor and the sick—will lack not only the appetizing dainties but even plain substantial provisions. For many years it has been the Argonaut's privilege and pleasure to bespeak the bounty of our readers for the Mission of Fruit and Flowers. Every Thanksgiving the mission gives to the needy as many Thanksgiving dinners as its friends, in their generosity, provide. It asks of them all sorts of meats, turkeys, chickens, vegetables, wines and liquors (for medicinal purposes), raisins, figs, jellies, fruits, cakes, pies, bread, flowers—in short, anything good to eat. And since money will buy everything, it asks (especially of affluent bachelors) as much of the coin of the realm as they can well spare. Monday, Tuesday, and Wednesday are the best days to send these gifts. Your grocer will find the address, and the butcher, the baker, the wine dealer. Two minutes at the 'phone will do the business. If you live in the country, Wells-Fargo will transport anything you send free of charge. Address the San Francisco Fruit and Flower Mission, 1610 Pacific Avenue.

The Orpheum.

Nick Long and Idalene Cotton, great favorites, will return to the Orpheum Sunday afternoon after a long absence. They will present "My Wife's Diamonds," a protean playlet by Edgar Allen Woolf, in which Miss Cotton portrays four characters and Mr. Long two. Good ventriloquists are a rarity and always welcome here and there is none better than Trovollo. He comes back with his new and original ventriloquial comedy drama, "The Hotel Office." The Knight brothers and Marion Sawtelle have been seen here in the past and have always made a hit. Their act as a whole is one of the best costumed on the stage. The Kita Banzai troupe of eight Japanese acrobats, direct from the land of the Mikado, will make their first appearance in America. Their feats are said to be marvelous. Gus Edwards' "School Boys and Girls," will appear for the last times. Lillian Appel will vary her pianologue. Lee White will be heard in new songs, and the three sisters Herzog-Camaras, equilibristas extraordinary, and Orpheum Motion Pictures will complete a varied programme. There are attractions to suit every taste on the grounds of the Chutes, where the Orpheum is located.

The site of the old Russ House, on Montgomery, from Bush to Pine streets, has been leased, and an imposing and modern structure will be erected at a cost of about $1,250,000. The papers are drawn and will be signed in a few days. William H. Crocker, president of the Crocker National Bank, and Charles E. Green, secretary and manager of the Crocker Estate Company, have secured the lease from the Russ estate for a term of twenty years. They have also secured an option to purchase the property for $2,000,000 within five years from the commencement of the term of the lease. It is understood that the offices of the Southern Pacific will be located in the building when completed.

Mrs. Anna C. Spreckels has filed an application with the Board of Works for a permit to reconstruct the Spreckels mansion at the southwest corner of Clay street and Van Ness avenue at an estimated cost of $200,000.

An Old Landmark in a New Place.

Our readers will welcome the news of the re-establishment of the Louvre at the corner of Eddy and Fillmore streets.

An artistic restaurant has been fitted up in a manner to call forth praise from all who have seen it—with an entrance for ladies on Eddy street and an entrance for gentlemen on Fillmore. On Thursday night, of last week, a gala dinner was given for which more than 500 reservations had been made, and where there was an exceptionally pleasant time, the greeting of old friends, and the enjoyment of an excellent dinner.

The Louvre has long been recognized as a feature in the life of San Francisco, noted all over the world for its excellent restaurants.

The Germans, as well as the Americans who have traveled or lived on the continent, and have cultivated a taste for the famous beers of Germany, have for more than a generation looked to the Louvre for the importation of such beer as Culmbacher, Hofbrau, Wurzbürger, Pilsner, etc.

Music lovers congregate at the Louvre to hear the popular and classical music by the Louvre's excellent orchestra, led by Mr. Joseph.

Mr. Jesse Meyerfeld, than whom there is no more popular restaurateur in this city of restaurants, is the president and general manager of the Louvre now, as he has been in the past.

LITERARY NOTES.

Geronimo's Story.

Geronimo, the grim old Apache chief, has dictated his autobiography to S. M. Barrett, Superintendent of Education, Lawton, Oklahoma. Mr. Barrett first asked the officer in charge of the Apaches at Fort Sill, O. T., for permission to write the life of Geronimo and was refused; he then wrote to President Roosevelt and received authority for the publication; finally official permission was given by the War Department, with the understanding that the manuscript should be submitted for critical inspection. The story is published without the approval of the Department.

Geronimo attempts a vindication of his murderous career. His story of his life up to his thirtieth year is an idyll of the wilds; he had never seen a white man, and, at peace with the neighboring tribes, his days were spent hunting the deer, the elk, and the buffalo, or berry-gathering with his fair Alope—an Arizona Paul and Virginia. In the summer of 1858, the Apaches crossed the border, and were attacked by Mexican troops who killed, among others, Geronimo's aged mother, his wife, and his papooses. Geronimo says the Apaches were in Mexico to trade and were peaceable; but no one familiar with the history of Indian depredations in Northern Mexico at that period will sympathize with his yarn. At any rate, Geronimo had ample revenge. For the next 25 years he led scores of war parties into Mexico, burning, ravishing, stealing, murdering. The old chief says the Apaches went on the war path against the Americans because of a series of treacherous acts by the soldiers. In 1863, Mangus-Colorado, Geronimo's predecessor, and half of the tribe, accepted an invitation to live at peace with the whites at Apache Tejo, New Mexico. General Miles confirms Geronimo's statement that the Indians were murdered after they surrendered. From that time until the Apaches were made prisoners of war in 1886, the combined tribes have a record of murder and robbery, as General Howard says, "unparalleled in the history of Indian raids."

Geronimo's recital of his wrongs and his plea to be permitted to spend his last days in the lands of his fathers, will find a responsive chord in the breast of the Eastern sentimentalist; the heartless Westerner will applaud the remark of Lieutenant Purington to Mr. Barrett: "The old Apache deserves to be hanged."

Heine and Sill.

Editor Argonaut:—Through the courtesy of Professor Rendtorff of Stanford University, I have been able to locate the original of the Lill poem referred to in your Literary Notes last week. It is one of the songs of Heinrich Heine, being number 25 of the ninety songs written by him from 1823 to 1824 and collectively published under the name of "Die Heimkehr."

Just as I finished this note, I turned to Professor Rendtorff's copy of Heine's songs to find the place (page 85, volume I) where the poem referred to occurs, when I noticed between the leaves near the back of the volume a clipping which had escaped my attention. I opened it. It is from the Literary Notes of the Argonaut of February 15, 1897, and consists of a review of William Black's Reminiscences of Carlyle, and contains the latter's reference to Heine as "that slimy and greasy Jew, fit only to eat sausages made of toads; * * * but, after all, let us remember that he wrote 'The Lorelei.'"

Editor Argonaut:—Referring to column 2, page 202 of your valuable paper: It is correct; "Ihr Bild" is one of Heinrich Heine's lieder. The translations, reading one and then the other, are so execrable that it is like passing from a leaf-strewn wood path to a street paved with cobbles with here and there a rut.

The nouns in the German text, "Traumen," "Lacheln," and "Thranen" should have two dots over them; "Erlanze" the same, or there is no sense. Yours sincerely,

E. A. Denicke.

[We also noticed the omissions of which our correspondent speaks, but since the fire we have been forced to dispense with accents; we lost a number of circumflexes and cedillas, while a bed of young unlauts which we were raising with tender care were all destroyed.—Ed. Argonaut.]

New Publications.

An interesting historical romance, with the scenes laid in the latter part of the reign of Queen Elizabeth, is "The Queen's Hostage," by Harriet T. Comstock. Ben Jonson, Shakespeare, the Earl of Essex, and other notable personages move picturesquely through its pages. Little, Brown & Co., Boston; $1.25.

The renewal of interest in the works of that exquisite artist in words, Lafcadio Hearne, since his death makes timely a reprint of his remarkable volume of Chinese stories, "Some Chinese Ghosts." Probably no one could have translated the color and imagery of the East with more graceful effect than Mr. Hearne. The author stated in the original preface that in preparing the stories "he sought especially for weird beauty." Little, Brown & Co., Boston; $1.50 net.

"The Silver Crown," by Laura E. Richards, is another book of fables by the author of Captain January. These little stories are poetical and cheerful, but many of them are beyond the understanding of young readers. Little, Brown & Co., Boston; $1.25.

It has long been accepted without question that the ultimate standard of English prose is set by the style of the Bible. And the influence of the English Bible on English language and literature has been enormous. "The Bible as English Literature," by Professor J. H. Gardiner of Harvard, is a scholarly and interesting volume on the literary forms of the Scriptures, with a history of the translation into English. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons, New York; $2.00.

"The Open Shutters," by Clara Louise Burnham, is the story of a charming girl, the daughter of a ne'er do well artist, and her adventures among strange people and surroundings. A picturesque bit of the Maine coast is the background of the tale. The book abounds in fine character drawing and entertaining conversation. Mrs. Burnham has never written a brighter novel than "The Open Shutters." Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; $1.50.

So well has the "Child's Calendar Beautiful" been received that a new edition has been published. The book is a collection of old favorites in poetry and prose to be memorized by children. The compiler, R. Katharine Beeson, has made her selections with rare good judgment. Published by Charles Scribner's Sons; $1.00.

Very artistic in binding and printing, and beautiful in illustrations and decorations, is a new edition of Max Muller's "Memories, A Story of German Love." These graceful and pathetic poems in prose, appealing as they do to the tenderest ideals of humanity, will be read when the writer's scientific work shall have been neglected. The translator of the present edition has sought to reproduce the elegant simplicity of the original in equally simple English. Published by A. C. McClurg & Co., Chicago; $2.50.

"Realities of Christian Theology," by Clarence A. Beckwith, is a scientific restatement of theology in terms of modern thought. It is intended for the Christian who seeks for himself a rational interpretation of his faith. Published by Houghton, Mifflin & Co., Boston; $2.00.

Bryan on Newspaper Honesty.

William Jennings Bryan, soon after his return from Europe, attended a dinner given in his honor by New York newspaper men. Mr. Bryan said, during his remarks that evening:

"The problem before us is to stop in the editorial rooms the selling of consciences for a salary. No newspaper can be run without brains, and brains there must be in the editorial rooms. Men in this country who have grown rich by predatory means can not write editorials. There is one way to stop all unlawful accumulations of wealth, and that is to refuse to write one word that we can't put our consciences into."

"If a corporation starts to rob a city or a state it must have its attorney in the shape of a newspaper. Recently we had in this country a great investigation into a business, and the result of that is still fresh in our minds and we remember it with much sorrow in our hearts. Yet I venture to assert that most of the editors in this room knew as much about all this corruption five years ago as they do today. Yet you did not speak out. Why?"

"We would have lost our jobs," some one interrupted.

"Because you had not the moral courage to voice your knowledge and convictions," continued Mr. Bryan, ignoring the interruption.

"Fortune has smiled on me," said Mr. Bryan earnestly, lifting his head and talking with some emotion. "I can make my living easily. There is not a millionaire in this country who has a surer foundation for his income. I can travel around the world with my family and come back to my home with more money than I had when I left it—"

"Tell us how?" some one asked.

"With my pen and my speech," thundered Mr. Bryan, "and there's not a dollar of it all that has a single stain upon it. It may be some satisfaction to me to know where the greatest contributions to campaign funds came from, but I tell you the satisfaction is swallowed up in sorrow when I think of the disgrace, and all of which might have been saved had the editors been courageous."

Sir Thomas Lipton, baronet, yachtsman, and millionaire merchant, has appeared in Chicago in the role of a stage "angel." Miss Laura Heelson, a seventeen-year-old girl, with a beautiful voice and an ambition to become an operatic star, has found a patron in Sir Thomas, who will get her a place in a London theatre and watch over her interests while she is struggling to make a name for herself. Miss Heelson sang at the banquet and reception given to Sir Thomas.

The meat trust of Mexico City, having raised prices to a figure almost prohibitive for the poor, the governor of the federal district will open stalls in the markets where wholesome meat will be sold at usual figures or lower if necessary to conquer the trust. The government has employed expert cattle buyers and butchers and will go into the business on a large scale.

LITERARY NOTES.

A Story by Charles Egbert Craddock.

None of Charles Egbert Craddock's stories of the Great Smoky Mountain country is written with greater art than her latest tale, "The Amulet," although the climax is far from satisfactory. There are signs of impending tragedy in the early portions of the story, that lead us to expect an exciting denouement, but the incident of the surrender of the amulet, while picturesque, is disappointing.

The scene of the story is Fort Prince George, the British stronghold on the eastern edge of the Cherokee country, in the year 1763. The principal personages in the romance are two young English officers, the one an heir to a baronetcy, the other obscure and without prospects, and a young lady, daughter of the commander of the fort, who has come out from England, with a spinster aunt. The humble lover is sent on an expedition to recover three cannon that have been withheld by the Cherokees when they concluded a peace with the British. During the trip he comes into possession of a beautiful ruby, which the Indians worship as a fetish. The young heroine compels the restoration of the red stone, and is rewarded by something infinitely more precious. The conjuring jewel proves its great power to the young couple, for the episode reveals the love of the girl for the officer.

"The World's Christmas Tree," by Charles E. Jefferson; cloth, 75 cents; limp leather, $1.50 net.

Published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Co., New York City.

Alfred Noyes's Poema.

One of the most promising of the younger poets, whose work has attracted much attention in England, is Alfred Noyes. The brilliant young author is introduced to American readers in a volume, "Poems," representing his latest verse, with selections from his earlier work. Mr. Noyes is rarely gifted, but he seldom sounds an individual note and many of his poems are reminiscent of contemporary writers. Now we get an impression of the sensuous lyrics of the youthful Swinburne, again we hear an echo of the Kipling measure, "Silk o' the Kine" is suggestive of Yeats and the Dublin singers, and "The Highwayman" is as graphic as a Thorneycroft ballad. The author is an Oxford man, but the influence of the Celtic revival is strong upon him. He has a fresh touch and a charming melody, and we may expect much from his sturdier muse.

Published by the Macmillan Company, New York; $1.25.

Artistic Booklets.

A very handsome set of booklets is the "Chiswick Series," each of which has special type designs by the Merrymount Press, several of them profusely illustrated. They include "The Beauty of Kindness," by J. R. Miller; "Friendship," by Henry D. Thoreau; "Germelshausen," translated from the German of Friedrich Gerbel by Clara M. Lathrop; frontispiece by E. Lyd Smith; "Longfellow Calendar," by Anna Lyd Smith, with quotations for each day of the year; "Saint Francis of Assisi," by Oscar Reiss, illustrated from rare prints; and that immortal classic, "The Man Without a Country," by Edward Everett Hale, frontispiece by Ode De Land.

Published by Thomas Y. Crowell & Company, New York; price 50 cents.

Personal and Miscellaneous Gossip.

A new and cheaper edition of the novels of Ivan Turgenev in fifteen volumes is being issued by the Macmillans.

A writer in Putnam's Monthly has been studying and comparing library statistics and finds that reading habit prevails most extensively in New England and California, the States between showing varying degrees of interest in books. In New England, taken as a whole, 100 persons drew from libraries an average of 243 books in 1903; in California 227.

Henry Mills Alden, for thirty-seven years editor of Harper's Magazine, was 70 years old on the 10th of November. A dinner party in the historic printing office on Franklin Square was arranged in his honor by Editor Harvey of Harper's Weekly.

Among the photogravure portraits in the new edition of the "Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin," to be issued by Houghton, Mifflin & Co. this month, is that by Benjamin Wilson, painted in 1759. This picture was taken from Franklin's home in Philadelphia by Major Andre in 1778, and carried to England by Sir Charles Grey. At the Franklin Bi-Centennial, in 1906, it was presented to the United States by the Earl Grey, the present governor-general of Canada, and is now hanging in the White House, Washington.

Lewis B. Ely, an editorial writer on the St. Louis Republic, is author of the complete novel in the November number of Lippincott's Magazine.

The novel based on the career and work of Henry George, "The Romance of John Bainbridge," written by the reformer's son, Henry George, Jr., comes this week from the Macmillans. Not only is a picture given of modern political life, but the author reveals his talents by his vivid character drawing and novel plot.

Mr. Dooley's admirers, and they are more numerous than the members of any political party, will welcome the new volume of "Disquisitions," just issued by the Harpers. The philosopher of Archey Road talks on nearly forty important topics in this latest collection of his views.

John Ames Mitchell's "The Silent War" has puzzled the critics. They do not seem to know whether Mr. Mitchell is jesting or in earnest. The seriousness of part of that story which involves a warfare between the masses and the millionaires, with the latter on the defensive, and the levity of the love romance which becomes tangled up with the more serious element in the story raise the question of whether Mr. Mitchell has put out a joke, a sociological tract or a straight romance. It is interesting from any one of these points of view.

Mrs. Mary Austin dedicates her new book, "The Flock," "to the friendly folk in Inyo and the people of the book." Mrs. Austin is at present making her home at Carmel-by-the-sea, California.

One of the best selling books in the East, but one that is never reported as such, is "The Boston Cooking School Cook Book," by Fannie Merritt Farmer. Miss Farmer has now thoroughly revised the work, introduced additional recipes, and 130 handsome half-tone illustrations. An edition of 20,000 copies, printed from new plates, has just been issued by Little, Brown & Co., Boston.

It is understood that young Mr. Hall Caine is to be associated with the firm of Harmsworth in London, in publishing sixpenny volumes, one of which will be his father's novel, "The Eternal City."

Life is in trouble with the Post Office Department. The humorous weekly has widely advertised the offer of a picture as a premium to annual subscribers. It added as a postscript to the offer that the first one hundred persons who sent in their subscriptions would receive the first one hundred impressions of the plate, numbered and signed by the artist. The advertisement no sooner appeared than not only the publishers of Life but the publishers of the twenty-five or more periodicals in which the advertisement appeared were solemnly notified by the Postoffice Department that this offer was a lottery and that no publication which contained it would be permitted to corrupt the people of the United States by being carried in the United States mails.

Maarten Maartens writes under a pseudonym. Few people remember that his real name is Joost Marius Willem Van der Poorten-Schwartz.

Seumas McManus, well known as a writer of Irish stories and poetry, is visiting America and will be the guest of a number of the press clubs.

A little book likely to provoke considerable discussion among medical men and others interested in preserving health, is "Buff: A Tale for the Thoughtful," just published by Little, Brown & Co. The author views life, medical theories, and practice from the standpoint of nature, and is intent in exposing the charlatan within and without the medical profession.

Arthur C. Benson, who discusses "The Ethics of Reviewing" in the October number of Putnam's Monthly, is of the opinion that it is better, on the whole—for the author—to know what the critics make of one's work: rather than to seclude oneself in a fool's paradise. He may not get much in the way of trained criticism, but he will at least be able to estimate the general drift of opinion.

Edwin A. Abbott, the well-known English theologian and philosopher, is publishing this week through the Macmillan Company "Silanus, the Christian," the famous student of Epictetus, who attended the master's lectures at Nicopolis about 118 A. D. The work throws much light on the origin of the Epistles of Paul, which were obtained from the Apostle by Silanus in order to defend his old teacher.

If there is no break-down in arrangements the weather forecast made in Washington will be based on reports from Russia, Siberia, and Iceland, in addition to those from the United States, Canada, and the Atlantic territories heretofore covered. The arrangement has been perfected with the Russian Government by which the daily observations at Irkutsk, Toms, and Ekaterinberg, all in Siberia, are to be cabled to Washington. With the Danish Government arrangements have been made for beginning at the same time, the cabling of the Iceland daily report from London.

Dreamland Voices.

Now sings the mated bird,
Scarce knowing why he utters golden mirth.
The thrilling leaves are stirred
With melodies of bird and sky and earth.
From far-off fields of sleep
I hear the drowsy phantom voices rise.
There are no winds to sweep
The misty murmur-echoes from the skies.

Serene, soft stars eclipse
Their full-eyed gaze with lids of love half closed.
The great world gently dips
Beneath a sea of azure, opal-rosed.

The half-wake grasses droop
Where pools of moonlight lie between the trees,
And tall night-shadows stoop
Like timid silence shrinking from the breeze.

Those present were: Mr. and Mrs. James Tucker, Miss Alice Griffith, Miss Linda Cadwallader, Miss Gertrude Josselyn, Miss Anita Harvey, Miss Genevieve King, Mr. H. Carrington Wilson, Mr. C. Wentworth Dilke, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. Lloyd Baldwin, Mr. Allen Kittle, Mr. Arthur Brown, Mr. Gerald Rathbone, and Mr. Richard Tobin.

Mrs. W. M. S. Brede entertained at an informal tea on Tuesday of last week in honor of her guests, Miss Musto and Miss Lenore Musto of Stockton.

Mrs. Willard Wayman was the hostess at a luncheon on Wednesday of last week at her home in Piedmont. Her guests were: Mrs. Leonard Chenery, Mrs. Ralph Warner Hart, Mrs. La Boyteaux, Mrs. W. P. Fuller, Mrs.

Charles D. Farquharson, and Mrs. Frederick McLeod Fenwick.

Movements and Whereabouts.

Annexed will be found a resume of movements to and from this city and Coast and of the whereabouts of absent Californians:

Mrs. Francis J. Carolan arrived on Friday of last week from Chicago, where she had spent a few days en route here after a sojourn of several months in Europe and New York.

Miss Jennie Crocker, who has been in New York for several weeks past, is expected to return to California this month, to spend most of the winter.

Mrs. Joseph D. Grant has returned from a visit of several weeks to relatives in Portland.

Mr. and Mrs. William G. Irwin and Miss Helene Irwin sailed from England for New York on November 3d. They will remain in the East until after Christmas.

Mr. and Mrs. Timothy Hopkins and Miss Lydia Hopkins have taken apartments at an uptown hotel for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Gordon Blanding went down recently to Santa Barbara for a brief stay. Miss Susie Blanding is still in New York.

Mr. and Mrs. James Follis are back at the Hotel Rafael, where they will remain until their new home in San Rafael is completed.

It is rumored that the reception of Mrs. Eleanor Martin, that takes place on next Thursday from 4 to 7 o'clock, is to be for the coming-out of her niece, Miss Von Schroder.

Mr. Kenneth Lee, of Manchester, England, and Mr. Frank L. Hughes, of New York, who are touring California, have been stopping at Del Monte.

Sir John and Lady Leng, with Miss Leng, of Dundee, Scotland, will be at Del Monte for some time. Sir John Leng is one of the oldest ex-members of Parliament now living, and he was for many years Lord Mayor of Dundee.

Mrs. Hyde-Smith, Miss Gertrude Hyde-Smith and Miss Margaret Hyde-Smith will spend the winter in San Mateo.

Mr. and Mrs. Harry M. Holbrook returned on Sunday last from a stay of a few weeks at Hotel del Coronado.

Mr. and Mrs. William M. Gwin and Mr. Stanford Gwin arrived here on Saturday last from New York.

Mr. and Mrs. John W. Mailliard and their family have returned to their home on Gough and Broadway, after spending the summer at their cottage in Belvedere.

Mr. and Mrs. David T. Hanbury are spending the winter at Del Monte, and have decided to settle in California.

Mr. C. W. Clark is soon expected to return from his trip to Butte, Montana. He and Mrs. Clark are at Del Monte for the winter.

Mr. and Mrs. Henry Schneidell will remain for a part of the winter at Del Monte.

Judge and Mrs. W. W. Dixon are permanently settled at Del Monte.

Miss Stella McCalla arrived last week from her home in Santa Barbara for a brief visit.

Mrs. Samuel Knight has returned from a short stay at Coronado.

Mr. and Mrs. William L. Ashe are at the Hotel Touraine in Oakland for the winter season.

Mr. and Mrs. Frank A. West of Stockton spent several days last week in the city.

Mrs. J. H. P. Howard has returned to her home in San Mateo after a brief visit to Santa Barbara.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Moody and Mrs. Beverly MacMonagle will not return to San Francisco this winter but will remain in Europe.

Among those who came to Del Monte for the week's end were Mr. R. M. Tobin, Mr. Timothy Hopkins, Mr. Walter Scott, Mr. Arthur Pillsbury, and Dr. Gardner Perry Pond.

Miss Katherine Chandler, the well-known writer, who has aungalow in Pacific Grove, was at Del Monte on Sunday with her brother, W. E. Chandler.

Lieutenant C. K. Potter and his bride, who was Miss Nella McCormack, are now at Monterey.

Miss Edith Livermore will spend the winter in Berlin.

Mrs. Wenban, Mrs. William Shaw, and Mrs. Mills, whose handsome home on Van Ness Avenue was burned, will spend the winter at the Hotel Potter, Santa Barbara.

Mr. C. Wentworth Dilke, who arrived here last month from England, sailed on Thursday for Australia.

Mr. and Mrs. Fred Beaver have returned to Berkeley after a short Eastern trip.

Miss Alice Herrin has been spending some time in Fresno as the guest of Miss Thornton.

Mrs. Benjamin G. Lathrop has gone to New York, where she will spend the winter.

Mr. Frank Kink left last week for a month's sojourn in the East.

Mr. and Mrs. Sheldon Callin, Mr. and Mrs. Wm. T. Metzger of Philadelphia, and Mr. and Mrs. H. G. McCall of St. Paul have been at Del Monte during the week.

Mrs. James Follis, Mrs. George Pinckard, Mrs. John F. Boyd, and other prominent society ladies of San Rafael have formed a club to give a series of dances this winter at San Rafael. The initial dance takes place next Saturday night at the Hotel Rafael and refreshments will be served. Everything in way of appointments will be of the best.

Professor Payson J. Treat, of Stanford University, has left New York for Europe. He expects to take in Eastern Asia and Australasia before his return.

Dr. and Mrs. Paolo de Vecchi and their daughter and sons, who have been in Paris and sailed October 24th for New York, are at present in Baltimore where they expect to spend the winter.

Mr. A. Balfour has gone South for quail shooting at the Los Laureles Ranch. A number of Del Monte guests have been making that trip lately as the ranch is only about fifteen miles from Del Monte and the drive is a fine one.

Mr. and Mrs. William Sproule were at the St. Francis Hotel during the week just prior to their departure for New York where they expect to make their home.

Mr. and Mrs. John C. Klein have returned from a visit of several months to New York City and are at the Knickerbocker.

President David S. Jordan who is about leaving for the East, will go directly to New York to attend a meeting of the directors of the Carnegie Institute. The date of his return is not yet determined.

JOHN G. DORNIN, SECOND ASST. MGR.

SAN FRANCISCO, October 26th, 1906.

TO OUR AGENTS AND CLIENTS:

With the greatest satisfaction, we are able to say that, with the exception of three claims which are yet in the hands of Committees, every claim under direct policies has been paid. A few claims reinsuring other Companies yet await settlement by them with the assured, and the presentation of proofs of loss.

The very large volume of transactions between the NATIONAL of HARTFORD and the SPRINGFIELD, due to the association of the two Companies under Mr. Dornin's management, until his resignation of the NATIONAL in May, have been adjusted and satisfactorily settled. The record, at this writing, stands as follows:

TOTAL AMOUNT PAID UNDER DIRECT POLICIES.
Face of Policies.....	$1,430,606.15
Salvages	56,412.35	$1,374,193.
PAID UNDER POLICIES REINSURING OTHER COMPANIES.
Paid under National Claims.....		$ 401,018.
Paid other Companies Reinsured.....		206,669.
Total Amount Paid.....		$1,981,882.
Received Reinsurance from National.....	$ 276,915.79
Received Reinsurance from other Companies.....	127,855.84
Total Reinsurance Received.....		$ 404,771.
Net Paid.....		$1,577,110.
LOSSES IN COURSE OF ADJUSTMENT.
Under direct Policies (3) estimated Net Loss.....	$ 13,500.00
Reinsuring National, estimated.....	16,250.00
Reinsuring Other Companies, estimated.....	31,972.00
Total	$ 61,722.00
RECOVERABLE FROM COMPANIES REINSURING SPRINGFIELD.
National, estimated.....	$10,046.76
Other Companies, estimated.....	20,800.00	$ 30,846.76
		30,875.
Aggregate Losses including Estimated Claims Recoverable from Reinsuring Companies...		$1,607,985.

The ratio of salvages under "direct" policies (4 per cent) agrees with the first published estimates made by President Damon on his visit to San Francisco early in June. It is the source of the greatest satisfaction to us, and must be to our friends and agents, that the figures, on adjustment, do not vary materially from the figures given by the Company under sworn statements to the Insurance Commissioner of New York, as of June 30th.

As published in the Journal of Insurance Economics (Boston) for August, the "Gross Amount Involved" is given at.....$2,160,391

Reinsurance

$1,720,087

Estimated Salvage

Estimated Net Loss.....$1,650,000

Quoting from Manager A. J. HARDING of our Western (Chicago) Department:

"The Company, at the outset, promptly published the full amount of its liabilities, without attempting to palliate the truth by an over-statement of reinsurance or probable salvage."

"The Springfield was one of the first Companies to face the full measure of its liability and, from beginning to end, it has not taken advantage of the necessities of a single loss claim by deducting an arbitrary estimate of supposed earthquake damages."

In an interview with the reporter of the San Francisco Call, published June 5th, President Damon said:

"Our losses in San Francisco are approximately $1,676,455. They have not varied materially from the first report sent on to the Home Office, when we thought, for a while, that the greatest damage done in San Francisco was by the earthquake. We are proceeding to settle our losses upon practically the same lines that we have followed in settling fire losses in the past."

The small percentage of "salvage" is primarily due to the fact that San Francisco is largely under-insured. Quoting Mr. Geo. E. Brewer, an experienced Adjuster from Albuquerque on the SPRINGFIELD'S staff of Adjusters:

"Your first estimate of salvage, which seemed very small, is proving remarkably correct. The percentage of insurance to values did not average over forty per cent on buildings, and sixty per cent on stocks."

The entire review, as we look back upon the strenuous work of the past six months so intensely gratifying to us, and we are glad to know, by the expressions of claimants, and many unsolicited letters of commendation received by the Home Office and by ourselves, that (quoting from Best's Insurance News of New York, the most reliable and conservative source of information concerning the financial status of fire insurance institutions, in its August issue):

"The SPRINGFIELD is entitled to the highest praise for its honorable and liberal treatment of its San Francisco creditors."

Yours very truly,

Army and Navy.

The latest personal notes relative to army and navy people who are or have been stationed at Pacific Coast points:

Brigadier-General John J. Pershing, U. S. A., commanding officer of the Department of California, has been granted fifteen days' leave of absence and left on Thursday of last week for Cheyenne on private business. Colonel Charles Morris, Artillery Corps, U. S. A., assumes temporary command of the Department during General Pershing's absence. General Pershing is to be relieved from command of the Department upon his return and will go out on an early date to the Philippines, where it is probable that he will be assigned to the command of one of the brigade posts, Camp Stotsenburg or Camp McKinley. He will go to Manila way of Tokio, where Mrs. Pershing is staying at present.

Resr-Admiral Bowman H. McCalla, U. S. N., tired, and Mrs. McCalla have returned to their home in Santa Barbara after a six weeks' Eastern trip.

Colonel John L. Clem, U. S. A., chief quartermaster of the Department of California, returned on Saturday last from a brief trip to Cheyenne, Wyoming.

Colonel John J. Crittenden, Twentieth Infantry, U. S. A., Presidio of Monterey, has been granted two months' leave of absence.

Lieutenant-Colonel R. J. C. Irvine, Twenty-first Infantry, U. S. A., who has been in the Army General Hospital, Presidio of San Francisco since his return from the Philippines, is recently retired on account of physical disability.

Lieutenant-Colonel George F. Cooke, Twenty-second Infantry, U. S. A., has been detailed as member of the Army Retiring Board, Presidio San Francisco, vice Colonel George M. Dunn, U. S. A.

Captain F. J. Drake, U. S. N., has been ordered detached from command of the Wisconsin, when that vessel is placed out of commission, and ordered home to wait orders.

Captain E. S. Phelps, U. S. N., has been detached from duty at the Naval Station, San Francisco, and ordered to duty at Mare Island Navy Yard.

Commander R. H. Galt, U. S. N., has been ordered detached from the command of the Arkansas and ordered to the Navy Yard, Norfolk, Virginia, for court martial duty.

Lieutenant Commander A. S. Halstead, U. S. N., is ordered detached from the Chicago and duty as inspector of ordnance at the Union Works.

Winter Sports at Coronado.

The Coronado Country club has arranged for a series of outdoor sports during the coming season that will take high rank. Golf, tennis, polo, archery, automobile gymkhana and other gymkhana games, clay pigeon shooting, horse racing, rabbit chasing and paper chases are some of the diversions planned.

The annual golf tournament for men will be held February 4. Annual golf tournament for women February 11. Men's annual handicap March 4. Women's annual handicap March 11. Bogey handicap tournaments for men and women, driving, approaching, and putting contests will be held all through the season, beginning December 16.

The regular annual polo tournament will take place about the middle of March, in which the six California teams, Frank Mackey's English teams and a team brought out from the east by Foxhall Keene will compete. A team from Honolulu and other teams from the east are also expected to participate.

Arrangements are now being made for a week's horse racing after the polo tournament. Archery, clay pigeon shooting, and other contests will continue through the season.

The home of Captain Louis R. Burgess, U. S. A., and Mrs. Burgess, who are now stationed at Fort Totten, New York, has been brightened by the advent of a son.

The new card in the Educational column of this issue offering special instruction in Mathematics and English is of general interest, as showing that the demand for individual teaching is being met outside of the schools.

TWAIN'S SEAFARING ANCESTORS.

"The Reformer" and "The Admiral" of His Earliest Biography

Among the notes appended to one of his latest stories Mark Twain says:

"Along through the book I have distributed a few anachronisms and unborn historical incidents and such things, so as to help the tale over the difficult places. This idea is not original with me; I got it out of Herodotus. Herodotus says, 'Very few things happen at the right time, and the rest do not happen at all, the conscientious historian will correct these defects.'"

It is evident that the humorist was moved by the same spirit when he published his earliest biography, in 1871. From that small and half-forgotten volume the following sketches of two of Mark Twain's ancestors are taken:

Some years later we have the illustrious John Morgan Twain. He came over to this country with Columbus in 1492, as a passenger. He appears to have been of a crusty, uncomfortable disposition. He complained of the food all the way over, and was always threatening to go ashore unless there was a change. He wanted fresh shad. Hardly a day passed over his head that he did not go idling about the ship with his nose in the air, sneering about the commander, and saying he did not believe Columbus knew where he was going to or had ever been there before. The memorable cry of "Land, ho!" thrilled every heart in the ship but his. He gazed a while through a piece of smoked glass at the penciled line lying on the distant water, and then said: "Land be hanged—it's a raft!"

When this questionable passenger came on board the ship he brought nothing with him but an old newspaper containing a handkerchief marked "B. G.," one cotton sock marked "L. W. C.," one woolen one marked "D. F.," and a night shirt marked "O. M. R." And yet during the voyage he worried more about his "trunk," and gave himself more airs about it, than all the rest of the passengers put together. If the ship was "down by the head," and would not steer, he would go and move his "trunk" further aft, and then watch the effect. If the ship was "by the stern," he would suggest to Columbus to detail some men to "shift that baggage." In storms he had to be gagged, because his wallings about his "trunk" made it impossible for the men to hear the orders. The man does not appear to have been openly charged with any gravely unbecoming thing, but it is noted in the ship's log as a "curious circumstance" that albeit he brought his baggage on board the ship in a newspaper, he took it ashore in four trunks, a queensware crate, and a couple of champagne baskets. But when he came back insinuating in an insolent, swaggering way, that some of his things were missing, and was going to search the other passengers' baggage, it was too much, and they threw him overboard. They watched long and wonderingly for him to come up, but not even a bubble rose on the quietly ebbing tide. But while every one was most absorbed in gazing over the side and the interest was momentarily increasing, it was observed with consternation that the vessel was adrift and the anchor cable hanging limp from the bow. Then in the ship's dimmed and ancient log we find this quaint note:

"In time it was discovered yt yet troublesome passenger hadde gone downe and got ye anchor, and toke ye same and solde it to ye darn sauvages from ye interior, saying yt he hadde founde it, ye sonne of a ghun!"

Yet this ancestor had good and noble instincts, and it is with pride that we call to mind that he was the first white person who ever interested himself in the work of elevating and civilizing our Indians. He built a commodious jail and put up a gallows, and to his dying day he claimed, with satisfaction, that he had had a more restraining and elevating influence on the Indians than any other reformer that ever labored among them. At this point the chronicle becomes less frank and chatty, and closes abruptly by saying that the old voyager went to see his gallows perform on the first white man ever hanged in America, and while there received injuries which terminated in his death.

The great-grandson of the "Reformer" flourished in sixteen hundred and something, and was known in our annals as "the old Admiral," though in history he had other titles. He was long in command of fleets of swift vessels, well armed and manned, and did great service in hurrying up merchantmen. Vessels which he followed and kept his eagle eye on always made good fair time across the ocean. But if a ship loitered in spite of all he could do, his indignation would grow till he could contain himself no longer—and then would take that ship home where he lived and keep it there carefully, expecting the owners to come for it, but they never did. And he would try to get the idleness and sloth out of the sailors of that ship by compelling them to take invigorating exercise and a bath. He called it "walking a plank." All the pupils liked it. At any rate, they never found any fault with it after trying it. When the owners were late coming for their ships, the Admiral always burned them, so that the insurance money should not be lost. At last this fine old tar was cut down in the fulness of his years and honors. And to her dying day his poor, heart-broken widow believed that if he had been cut down fifteen minutes sooner he might have been resuscitated.

Loyalty of a District Leader.

There never was a place born like old New York, and its got the world skinned a million miles. The cities of Europe ain't in it with this little town. I went everywhere and saw a whole lot, but, fellers, I want to say right here that I'd rather be a door-mat on the Bowery with "Welcome" on it than the King of Carlsbad. I didn't run across no nobilities while I was over there, 'cause I wasn't looking for them. We must have been on their trail, though, for when I was in Paris I had the honor of being introduced to several waiters who used to work in palaces of kings. They showed me art goods and brick-a-bats that once belonged to Louis the Twenty-second, and I slept in a bed that had been occupied by Annie, Queen of Scots, or something like that. What surprised me in the German cities was the people eating on the streets outside the restaurants. Of course, that game never would take on the Bowery, for if a hungry gorilla came along he'd lift the first beefsteak put on for somebody else and get away with it. Another thing that 'ud draw tears from yer eyes was to see them Germans drinking beer at tables in public places. It was especially annoyin' to a feller like me, who got on the water wagon to dodge rheumatics. Yes, sir, it 'ud draw tears from yer eyes to watch them down those big steins. In Germany they call money marks, but I think the Americans who spend it are the marks. —Florence J. Sullivan, in Broadway Magazine.

Grave and Gay, Epigrammatic and Otherwise.

A husband was being arraigned in court in a suit brought by his wife for cruelty.

"I understand, sir," said the judge, addressing the husband, "that one of the indignities you have showered upon your wife is that you have not spoken to her for three years. Is that so?"

"It is, your Honor," quickly answered the husband.

"Well, sir," thundered the judge, "why didn't you speak to her, may I ask?"

"Simply," replied the husband, "because I didn't want to interrupt her."

A prominent physician, whose specialty was physical diagnosis, required his patients, before entering his private consultation room, to divest themselves of all superfluous clothing in order to save time. One day a man presented himself without having complied with this requirement.

"Why do you come in here without complying with my rules?" demanded the doctor. "Just step into that side room and remove your clothing and then I'll see you. Next patient, please!"

The man did as requested, and after a time presented himself in regular order duly divested of his clothing.

"Now," said the doctor, "what can I do for you?"

"I just called," replied the man, "to collect that tailoring bill which you owe us."

At a literary club in Boston one night, there was an encounter between a Bostonian, professing a love of art for art's sake, and F. Marion Crawford the novelist.

In a slightly patronizing manner the Boston man asked:

"Have you ever aspired to write anything, Mr. Crawford, that will live after you are gone?"

"My dear sir," replied Crawford, with a broad smile, "my principal effort just now is to write something that will enable me to live while I am here."

A thief broke into a millionaire's mansion early the other morning and found himself in the music room. Hearing footsteps approaching, he took refuge behind a screen.

From eight to nine o'clock the eldest daughter had a singing lesson.

From nine to ten o'clock the second daughter took a piano lesson.

From ten to eleven o'clock the eldest son had a violin lesson.

From eleven to twelve o'clock the other son had a lesson on the flute.

At twelve-fifteen all the brothers and sisters assembled and studied an ear-splitting piece for voice, piano, violin, and flute.

The thief staggered out from behind the screen at twelve-forty-five and falling at their feet, cried:

"For heaven's sake, have me arrested!"

Richard Mansfield contributes an anecdote to the old question of the sanity of Hamlet, says the Chicago Chronicle.

"One morning in the West," he said, "I met a young friend and asked him where he had been the night before.

"I went," my young friend replied, 'to see so-and-so's Hamlet.'

"Aha, did you?" said I. "Now, tell me—do you think Hamlet was mad?"

"I certainly do," replied he. "There wasn't 100 in the house."

"What is this dish, my good Francois?" the master asked of the proud chef who had been summoned to congratulate him. "We know it some kind of wild fowl, but it has a flavor all its own—a flavor none of us ever met with before."

"That dish," the chef answered proudly, "is triumph of the culinary art. Only a Frenchman could have prepared it. It is, in one word, owl."

"An owl!" cried every one, turning a little pale.

"But how," a lady asked, "could you have been so cruel as to kill the poor bird?"

"Ah, madam," said the cook, "I did not kill it. It was dead already."

When Blaine was a young lawyer, and cases were few, he was asked to defend a poverty-stricken tramp accused of stealing a watch. He loaded with all the ardor at his command, showing so pathetic a picture with such convincing energy that at the close of his argument the court was in tears, and even the tramp wept. The jury deliberated but a few minutes, and returned the verdict "not guilty." Then the tramp drew himself up, tears streamed down his face as he looked at the future "plumed knight," and said: "Sir, I have never heard so grand a plea. I have not cried before since I was a child. I have no money with which to reward you, but (drawing a package from the depths of his ragged clothes) here's that watch; take it and welcome."

Frederick Landis, who two years ago was elected as a representative from Indiana, is one of the most youthful-looking men in public life.

That Landis excels at repartee was proved at the time of his election, when, it is said, he appeared to be not a day over twenty.

"Say, boy," shouted a Hoosier to the candidate, as Landis was leaving the platform at a political meeting, "does your mother know you're out?"

"Oh, yes," replied Landis, with a smile, "and when the votes are counted to-night she'll know I'm in."

A Glasgow steamer was laboring in a heavy sea, the waves sometimes sweeping her decks, but the officers had assured the passengers that there was no danger, and all seemed reasonably calm with the exception of one meek-appearing little man, who, every few minutes, would approach an officer and anxiously inquire if he thought the ship would founder. "No, I tell you!" one of them finally exclaimed with impatience. "What is the matter with you? Look at those other people—they are not scared to death." "Oh, I'm not scared," the man replied, "but if the ship was going to founder I wanted to know a little ahead of time." "Oh, wanted to tell your friends good-bye, and all that?" "Well, not exactly," the man said, hesitatingly; "the fact is my mother-in-law is along with me. I wanted to say a few things to her."

A fond mother, hearing an unusual noise in the nursery overhead, hurried up stairs to find out what was the matter. She found Johnny sitting in the middle of the door quietly smiling. "Oh," said he, "I've locked Grandpa and Uncle Henry in the cupboard, and when they get a little angrier I am going to play Daniel in the lion's den."

Among the societies that have been least disturbed by the consequences of the fire, is the California branch of the American Folk-Lore Society. Though only a year old this club shows gratifying vigor, and despite recent events its officers report an increased membership. An innovation has been begun and the first of a number of informal meetings was held at the home of Professor A. L. Kroeber, on Washington street, Tuesday, October 30. Charles Keeler, the president of the society, gave an interesting talk on "Creation Myths of the Pacific Islanders." This is the first of a series of meetings to be devoted each to the discussion of the creation legends of some race.

Through their efforts to obtain laborers for work on the isthmian canal, members of the Canal Commission have found that there is a dearth of labor in all parts of the world. So great is the demand for labor in connection with railroad building and other improvements on a large scale, that countries which formerly have sent thousands of laborers to this country monthly are now using their labor at home.

The Salton Sea is doomed. The officials of the Southern Pacific announce that the last steps have been taken and the Colorado River will be turned into its old course, and no more water will flow into the great inland sea. The break in the banks of the Colorado River has been filled in with piles and stone. The work has cost the railroad company nearly $1,000,000.

Customer—"I want a piece of meat without fat, bone or gristle." Clerk—"You'd better have an egg, ma'am."—New York Mail.

Edward—"Why did Grace marry Fred? She wasn't the least bit in love." Edith—"Heavens no! She thought Ada wanted him."—Judge.

Mrs. Skinnum—"Why are you all hiding from 'ommy?" Little Lizzie—"Tommy is the butcher coming with his bill."—Philadelphia Record.

Gauss—"How does your dog like your new neighbor?" Matchett—"It's a little too early to say. Rover has had only one small piece."—Smart Set.

The Father (to boy back from college)—"Well, son, how much money do you owe?" The Son—"Well, er, dad, how much have you got?"—Harper's Bazar.

"The hotel is so crowded, sir, that the best we can do is to put you in the same room with the proprietor." "That will be all right; just put my valuables in the safe."—Chicago Journal.

"By the way, how did you come out with that drink cure you put in your husband's tea?" "First rate. He hasn't drank a drop since." "Of whisky?" "No, tea."—Milwaukee Sentinel.

Mrs. Flip—"I have just been talking to a specialist, and he says my brain vitality has all gone to my long hair. Do you believe it?" Flip—"Well, er, I knew it had gone."—St. Paul Pioneer Press.

He—"Miss Highnote is certainly a homely girl, isn't she?" She—"Well, she isn't a beauty, but when you hear her sing you will forget her face." He—"Gracious! Is her singing as bad as that?"—The Club Fellow.

Mr. Justup—"Let us go around to the De Rocks. They have just bought a Rembrandt for thousands of dollars." Mrs. Justup—"You don't say. Is it gasoline or steam, and what is the horsepower?"—Chicago Daily News.

"They've started a queer restaurant downtown; no tables, no chairs, no food, no waiters." "What are they running it on, air or water?" "Neither—Christian Science—you think you eat, so much a think."—Brooklyn Life.

"Is it a fact that your mother-in-law threw herself out of the third-story window and you did nothing to restrain her?" "Excuse me; I went to the first story to catch her, but she had already passed!"—Il Diavolo Rosa.

Laundryman—"I regret to tell you, sir, that one of your shirts is lost." Customer—"But here I have just paid you twelve cents for doing it up." Laundryman—"Quite right, sir; we laundered it before we lost it."—Harper's Weekly.

Stern Parent—"From my observation of him last night I came to the conclusion that that young man of yours was rather wild." Daughter—"It was you that made him wild. He wanted you to go upstairs and leave us alone."—Illustrated Bits.

"Come, Willie," said his mother, "don't be so selfish. Let your little brother play with your marbles a little while." "But," protested Willie, "he means to have them always." "Oh, I guess not." "I guess yes," cause he swallowed 'em."—Philadelphia Ledger.

"I can't understand this street railway situation," said Mrs. Wade Parker. "I wish you'd tell me just what you think of it." "Well, my dear," said Mr. Parker, "since you ask it, I will. But you'll have to send the children out of the room first."—Cleveland Leader.

Mr. Misfit (savagely)—"Before I married you, was there any doddering idiot gone on you?" Mrs. Misfit—"There was one." Mr. Misfit—"I wish to goodness you'd married him!" Mrs. Misfit—"I did."—Los Angeles News.

He was no advocate of race suicide, being indeed the father of seven daughters, but none the less his face lightened with a great joy when they told him that a suitor was in the parlor, talking to the girls. "What is his business?" he asked, rubbing his hands nervously. "A wine merchant," the mother answered. "A wine merchant? Heaven be praised!" the father cried. "He will be sure to prefer one of the older grades."—San Diego Union.

W. J. Clothier, the tennis champion of America, said at a dinner in Philadelphia: "Tennis is all very well in its way, but what is the excitement, what is the enthusiasm of tennis, compared to that of football? Perhaps you have heard of that Pennsylvania guard who, coming to at the end of a football game, whispered to the physician bending over him: 'Did we win, doctor?' 'Yes; hands down,' the physician answered. 'Never mind that fractured thigh, then, doc,' he said. 'Just take these broken teeth out of my mouth so's I can holler.'"

With tragic air the love-lorn heir
Once chased the chaste Louise;
She quickly guessed her guest was there
To please her with his pleas.

Now at her side he kneeling sighed.
His sighs of woful size;
"Oh, hear me here, for lo, most low
I rise before your eyes.

"This soul is sole thine own, Louise—
'Twill never wean, I ween,
The love that I for aye shall feel,
Though mean may be its mien."

"You know I can not tell you no,"
The maid made answer true;
"I love you aught as sure I ought—
To you 'tis due I do!"

"Since you are won, oh, fairest one,
The marriage rite is right—
The chapel aisle I'll lead you up
This night," exclaimed the knight.

Does Japan Think of War?

Not a little has been printed in the Eastern press concerning Japanese feeling over the present public school imbroglio. Oddly enough, California seems quite placid, and the whole affair has aroused but a languid interest here. But the Eastern journals are engaged in comparing the warships, armor, guns and coast defenses of the United States and Japan. Without going into their minute details, it may be said that Japan has in the Pacific eleven first-class battleships and four second-class battleships; the United States has nine. Japan has in the Pacific nine armored cruisers, the United States, four; Japan, seventeen protected cruisers, the United States, five; Japan, twenty-nine torpedo boats, the United States, twenty. In the Atlantic Japan has no warships at all; the United States has eighty-four, of which seventeen are first-class battleships. As for preparedness, Japan is probably ready and the United States probably not. It will be remembered that when we declared war on Spain we had absolutely no powder. Since then we have added to our possessions and our responsibilities without apparently adding to our fortifications. We have spent some $400,000,000 on the Philippine Islands, and yet we have not fortified them.

We have coal at Manila and Honolulu, but as we have no guns to protect it, probably the Japanese would burn more of our coal than we would. Our flag floats over the Island of Guam, Midway Island and the Alaskan Coast in the Pacific, but we have no guns on any of them. Manila is 1700 miles from the Japanese naval base. It is about 11,000 miles from the Brooklyn Navy Yard to Manila via Cape Horn. Our fleets would have to make a harder voyage than the Russian Baltic squadron did from Cronstadt to the Sea of Japan. We do not discuss the distance from California to Manila, for we have no warships here. Even if we had them, they would be considered necessary to protect our home ports. In 1898, Boston, Nantasket, New Bedford, Providence, New London, Bridgeport, Brooklyn, New York, Hoboken, Baltimore, Savannah, and Mobile all wanted all the battleships to protect them from Cervera's fleet.

If Japan decided to fight us, she would probably do as she did with Russia, attack without warning and without a formal declaration of war. If she decided to attack us she would have at Manila fifteen or twenty battleships and armored cruisers before we knew that she had started. Before we could get a few regiments across the continent Japan could land fifty or sixty thousand men in the Philippines. And when our fleet arrived off Subig, Japan would be occupying Manila and be all ready to receive us warmly.

The Argonaut does not believe there will be war with Japan. At the same time we believe that this country should be prepared for possible war. We should at least have adequate coast defenses and enough men to man them. As it is now, we have few guns at any of our great seaports and not enough men in the artillery to fire them. The Japanese government probably does not desire or intend to attack the United States, but the Japanese people are a hot-headed lot and the government may be forced to do that which it considers unwise. Of course it would be weak and foolish for a government to do that which it knows to be foolish and weak. But, as our own government in 1898 was forced into a declaration of war when it considered the movement unwise, and when it had no powder with which to shoot off its guns, it will not be strange if a less well-balanced people than we should force its government's hand.

Apropos. In '98 and '99 the Argonaut was one of the few newspapers in the United States—and the only one on the Pacific Coast so far as we are aware—that opposed the Philippine folly. We were told at the time by a number of sapient contemporaries that the Philippines were necessary as a "strategic frontier," and that they and the Hawaiian Islands would furnish "naval bases" for the protection of this country. We paid then $20,000,000 for the Philippines, and since we have expended about $400,000,000 on them. In case of war with Japan, if that Oriental power should seize the Philippines and use them to operate against Hawaii and this country, what becomes of the fine-spun theories of our sapient contemporaries? There is absolutely nothing to prevent Japan doing so next week. The California papers were the most rabid advocates of the Philippine purchase seven or eight years ago. We would like to ask those journals what they think about "strategic frontiers," "naval bases," and the Philippine folly now?

San Francisco's New Harbor Front.

A group of San Francisco citizens are now planning a system of modern docks designed to accommodate three or four times the present amount of shipping. The sum of twenty thousand dollars has already been pledged to cover the work of the engineers and draftsmen, and expert engineers have been employed to formulate plans. W. J. Bartnett of the Western Pacific Company is the leader in this movement; associated with him are James D. Phelan, Thomas Magee and other prominent citizens.

However diverse may be the views entertained by various persons concerning the future of San Francisco, no man yet has ventured to doubt that it would be a great seaport. It may not for some years to come be a great city—that is to say a metropolis, possessing all the attributes of a great city, including not only the merely material ones, such as facilities for feeding, housing and protecting its citizens, but likewise opera houses, theatres, art galleries, museums, and the many things which go to make up the higher life of communities of men. Even if San Francisco should not in a few years reach such a pitch as to command all these attributes of a great city, her position on the ocean, and on a bay which is the confluence of two great rivers, will force her to become a great seaport, even if she should not be a great city.

But a seaport to be great must have the facilities for safely and adequately harboring deep-sea vessels. In the days before the fire, it was to the observer a matter of constant wonder how the miles of shakily sheds, of inflammable piers, of rotting, teredo-pierced piling, extending along San Francisco's wonderful water front, from Black Point to Rincon Point, could endure for a single year. These flimsy structures seemed to extend a perennial invitation to fire. Yet by the irony of fate, when the great city was almost totally destroyed by fire there was little left of it along the water front save a fringe of man's handiwork—a strip consisting almost entirely of these inflammable wharves and sheds; not preserved from the fire by the interposition of Divine Providence, let us hasten to add, but because the United States Navy and the United States Marine Corps had taken charge of the water front, and supplemented the efforts of the Fire Department.

While San Francisco is rebuilding, it would be well for her to consider building her docks, piers, and wharves so that they will stand. It is the shame of America that so much of what we build is unsubstantial. Even in New York, the metropolis of the Western World, mangy, rotting slips, piers, and wharves defile the water front along the East River, the North River, and the Hoboken shore of the Hudson. So inflammable are these structures that at times they have caused the destruction of great ocean liners lying at their berths. Twice within the last five years the North German Lloyd Company has been forced to tow its giant liners out from the Hoboken docks on account of fire. On one occasion so swift was the march of the flames that one great steamer was burned at her wharf until her hawsers parted from the blazing fabric, and she drifted down the stream, with many human beings between decks doomed to an awful death from fire. Even if the steamship lines were willing to hazard their consignors' freight at such inflammable structures, they should be unwilling to hazard their own costly ships.

In the Old World a seaport one-tenth the size of New York possesses massive stone docks and quays whose buildings are always fire-proof. At these docks lie steamships worth millions; in these ships are cargoes worth other millions—teas, silks, wines, liquors, tobacco, and countless other valuable things. On these quays are piled vast heaps of other merchandise. To expose these cargoes to fire from flimsy wooden piers and sheds seems to the European mind mere madness. Yet not only is that practice followed in San Francisco, but in New York and in all other American cities as well.

There is scarcely a city in the Old World where one does not see docks and piers built of stone or steel. Even at such small ports as Brighton and Dover on the English Coast, the wharves are supported on massive steel piers. Hundreds of acres of London's great docks are also fire-proof and substantial. The docks of Liverpool extend along the Mersey for seven miles; there are some sixty basins and sixty miles of berth space at which ships can lie. These docks also are solidly constructed of masonry. The Hamburg docks extend along both banks of the Elbe River for nearly seven miles, and the port has accommodation for five hundred deep-sea vessels, fifteen hundred large river vessels, and five thousand canal boats and small river craft. These Hamburg docks are also massive masonry constructions. Yet they have not been handed down from past generations; they are not the work of many years. They have practically all been constructed since 1890, and Hamburg has expended on her harbor in the last fifteen years over two hundred million marks. The port of Havre is also a marvel of masonry docks and piers. So is Cherbourg, another French port. So is Genoa, which has an inner and an outer harbor, with magnificent cut stone jetties protecting the shipping from the sometimes stormy Mediterranean. Rotterdam and Amsterdam also have magnificent harbors built of stone. In fact, it is difficult anywhere in the commercial world to find harbors equipped with flimsy or decaying wooden piers until one comes to America.

Therefore, in building the new San Francisco, as her first claim to supremacy will be as a seaport, the first thing to do is to build up her water front for all time. The gentlemen who have headed this movement are deserving of high praise for their public spirit and their generosity. The work of building up the harbor is more than a merely municipal one; it is a question which concerns the whole State of California. The amount of money requisite for constructing such permanent and durable works can easily be borrowed on the faith and credit of the State. It would cost the citizens of the State nothing, for the harbor returns would more than pay the interest on the bonds, and would create a sinking fund which would extinguish the entire debt in less than a generation. This present generation would need to pay nothing; all that it would need to do would be to lend its credit to the undertaking. And then, long after this and succeeding generations shall have passed away, a permanent and massive improvement would still remain for the use and benefit of future citizens of California.

Reform Spelling in Advertising.

The reform spelling advocated by the Brander Matthews Board, and which has been endorsed by President Roosevelt, does not seem to have caused much of a boom. Very few prominent publications have taken it up. In fact, the chief use to which it has been put so far seems to be as a means of advertising. We refer here to its use by leading advertisers, like the great dry-goods houses and department stores in New York and other large cities. This paragraph was not intended as a reflection on the spelling reformers. But the quickness with which the professional advertising men divined the possibilities of spelling reform, and pounced upon it, makes one wonder whether the amateurs did not suspect its possibilities.

The Passing of "Steamer Day."

Away back in the fifties, when the water used to come up to Montgomery Street, the steamers used to sail from the Long Wharf twice a month, from San Francisco to "back East." Here repaired those rejoicing pioneers who had "cleaned up" their sluice-boxes, washed out the "riffles," and packed their gold dust safely from the diggings to the dealers here. It was from this point that they set sail for home. As the departing diggers sometimes did not settle, it was deemed advisable to collect from them before they sailed. Furthermore, the merchants then in San Francisco were obliged to make remittances to their creditors in the East on the date of every steamer's sailing. In short, the day the fortnightly steamers sailed for the East was the great settling day of all San Francisco. This dread day of collections came to be known as "Steamer Day."

Years passed, and soon two decades rolled away. When the two warring continental railways met near Ogden the East and the West were joined together. This was in May, 1869. It was not long before the steamers ceased to carry the bulk of the passengers "back East," and ceased entirely to carry the merchants' remittances. But Steamer Day did not perish. Through good report, through vile report, through good or grafting government, through Republican, Democratic, and non-partisan administrations, under the Consolidation Act, under the New Charter, under the Old Constitution and the New Constitution of 1879, through the Civil War, "Steamer Day" pursued its peaceful way. Nothing could kill it.

Occasionally strangers came to San Francisco and went into business. When these traders encountered this marvelous custom, by which an artificial stringency was created unnecessarily twice a month and when they pointed out that in other parts of the world mercantile collections were extended over twenty-eight days of the month instead of being crammed into two, these strangers were urgently requested to "go back East, if you don't like it." But no reform of the old pioneer practice was ever contemplated or entertained.

In addition to this curious and archaic custom, there continued also as an adjunct the habit of making these fortnightly settlements in specie. On "Steamer Day" in San Francisco one might see hundreds—yes, thousands—of men and boys lugging around canvas sacks filled with gold and silver. From counting-room to sales-room, from sales-room to shop, from shop to factory, these two-legged burden-bearers puffed and perspired beneath their loads, occasionally discharging cargo either at the home office or at the bank. And to crown this absurdity, all of the banks did exactly the same thing. They did not make a mutual daily settlement through a clearing house, the final balance being struck by a clearing-house check with the last bank. Instead of doing this, all the banks had messengers lugging around hundredweights of specie and each bank balanced in bullion daily with every other bank.

To distant readers all this may sound like extravaganza. It is not. It is plain, solid, sober truth.

For a number of years the Argonaut poked fun at these pioneer customs. At last the absurdity of their mediaeval portage plan impressed the banks and years ago they established a clearing house association. Even then—will it be believed?—some leading banks stayed out, on the ground that they "did not want to give away their business." One of these was the Nevada Bank, under the old management.

Our habit of speaking lightly of these pioneer customs used to cause much irritation in banking San Francisco circles. Still the Argonaut, being a iconoclast, dared to utter these words of reproach not only against the good old plan of canvas-ba banking, but also against that sacred institution "Steamer Day." We have not hesitated also to point out to the mercantile community that the settlement of accounts by means of specie instead of checks was absurd as the system of individual clearings formerly followed by the San Francisco banks. A bank check is the ideal system of exchange; it is drawn by a specified person to a specified person for a specific sum on a specific day. It is negotiable only by the payee. If crossed or double crossed as is the usage in London, it is negotiable only through the payee's bank. The it is at once a record and a receipt.

We have at times ventured to hint also that the use of paper money need not be so strictly tabooed in San Francisco, as most of the nations of the world, including over seventy millions of our own people, transact their business with a limited use of specie. But as the two millions on this side of the American continent know a great deal more than the other seventy millions on the Eastern side, and infinitely more than all the rest of all the people in all the other countries of the world, our suggestion has met with the natural scorn which was its due.

We are therefore glad to see that the Merchant Association and the Chamber of Commerce in San Francisco have now sent out circulars suggesting the abolishing of Steamer Day. They call attention to the scattered condition of the business houses now in San Francisco; they speak of the physical difficulty of covering so large an area; they say that collectors find it impossible to get over the ground in a single day; that they are obliged to carry large sums of money through dangerous districts; that the lawless condition of the city has led to many attacks upon collectors; therefore they suggest that all bills and accounts be paid in check when due.

It is said that "several firms doing a very extensive business have tried the new method, and find that it works admirably." Doubtless the more conservative San Francisco merchants will be surprised at this latter statement. It is extremely radical. However, the custom is followed in other large cities of the world, and is said to work fairly well.

Old customs, they say, die hard. "Steamer Day" certainly is dying hard. It and its kindred folly of logging around bullion defied even the stress of civil war. The "Steamer Day" superstition embarrassed the federal government when it was in its direst straits. California refused to accept the money of the federal government during the Civil War because it was not stamped on bullion. When cornered, California passed the "Specie Contract Law," in order to legalize the discrediting of the national currency. In short, "Steamer Day" and bullion payments have aside everything, including loyalty to the nation.

It has looked as if this mediaeval custom never could be killed. We do not know whether it is even yet dead. But if it is killed, it will have required a great earthquake and a colossal conflagration to do the deed.

Welching German Insurance Companies.

It is rumored in Washington that any attempt to compel the welching German insurance companies to pay their policy holders will not receive the support of the federal government. Even before President Andrew D. White was Ambassador to Germany there had existed highly strained relations between the United States and Germany.

over our tariff. At times these relations have been strained almost to the breaking point. Mr. White did his best to adjust matters, but did not succeed. Neither have his successors. Therefore our foreign office fears that this attempt to make the German capitalists pay their just debts will lead them to retaliate by attacking our tariff laws. Therefore, our Department of State will probably urge the federal government to take no part in this California claim, but sedulously to avoid being entangled in what Secretary Root would call a purely local controversy.

This does not look encouraging for the California claimants who are endeavoring to get their just dues. It is possible that a Pacific Coast delegation might prevail on Congress to force the State Department to request consideration of these claims purely as a matter of comity. As the Republican majority will in the new Congress be about one-half what it was in the last, a united delegation from this Coast could accomplish wonders in the way of holding up a stubborn Speaker. But, when all is said and done, this is only cold comfort. When an attempt was made in Congress to relieve San Francisco of the heavy tariff on building material until the city could be reconstructed, the California delegation did not make a good record. From the extreme luke-warmness shown by our delegation in that matter, it is not to be hoped that they would show any more energy in attempting to make the German welchers settle up.

Earthquake Cycles, Circles, and Scientists.

According to some geologists, a cycle of earthquakes is running around the great Pacific earthquake circle.

Some months ago, immediately after the disaster of last April, the Argonaut printed some extracts from esteemed and apocryphal coast contemporaries concerning the earthquake. Most of these utterances were ostensibly devoted to sympathizing with San Francisco, but each in reality was bent on explaining why its own favored city was outside of the San Francisco earthquake zone. In referring to our files, we find, for example, this extract from the Sacramento Capital:

"While the sympathy of Sacramento goes forth in a plentiful measure to her stricken sister city, San Francisco, we can not help but call attention to the fact that the great interior valley of the State was practically free from the effects of the recent earthquake. It was highly civilized in character, confined almost entirely to the region around the bay. Oakland, San Jose, and other cities were suffered severely, while the shock on the peninsula where San Francisco stands was of the most terrifying description. Nothing like it has ever been known in the history of California.

"Why was this shock not felt in Sacramento? This is the reason. It is evident that the vast bed of alluvial soil lying between the Sierra Nevada and the Coast Range contains acts as a sort of buffer, thus protecting us from the dreadful shocks which have desolated San Francisco the past, and which, alas, may also destroy it in the future. When we think of the dreadful fate which San Francisco barely escaped in the recent dreadful cataclysm, and when we reflect that their inevitable doom, like the sword of Damocles, hangs over the heads of the unfortunate dwellers down at the bay, we can scarcely restrain our tears."

Recoiling with a shudder from this gloomy picture, we turn for encouragement to the Portland Tripod. This is what we find:

"The terrible cataclysm which utterly destroyed San Francisco a few weeks ago was not felt here in Portland at all."

The Reverend Melchizedek Howler, while visiting us in the editorial room of the Tripod yesterday gave there a quite a luminous explanation. There is, he says, a distinct religious atmosphere pervading the State of Oregon. No such atmosphere is found in California. In California the conditions are even hostile to religion. Many there even go to the Park on Sunday. Given the presence of hundreds of thousands of persons in Oregon believing strongly in religion, will not such a belief create a religious atmosphere as to have some effect on the material atmosphere? What, after all, is belief but spiritual waves which impinge upon the ether waves of the material atmosphere? Every one knows that the atmosphere under certain conditions is highly electrical. Will not these spiritual ether waves have their effect on the electrical waves of the atmosphere? Will not the atmospheric electrical equipoise be changed by the pervasion of these ether waves? The electric theory of earthquakes is generally accepted nowadays. May it not be that the strong religious feeling which creates a distinct and dense atmosphere in Oregon thus neutralizes the electric atmospheric conditions which bring about earthquakes? And as a corollary it would follow that this favored city of Portland will probably always be free from such awful instances of the divine omnipotence as destroyed San Francisco."

Clammy, frog-like, web-fingered feels this sympathetic hand-clasp of the Portland Tripod. With a sigh we turn from the Oregon journal's cotton-matherisms to seek a sympathetic word from the sunny southland. This is what we find in the Los Angeles Times-Herald:

"A total absence in Los Angeles of any tremors of the earth, no matter how slight, during the recent dreadful cataclysm which destroyed San Francisco, has attracted much attention among the favored dwellers here. When they read the accounts of what took place in San Francisco it fairly makes their blood run cold. Credible narratives are told of six-story hotels telescoping on themselves and sinking down in the bowels of the earth; cracks six feet wide and a hundred feet deep are still to be seen on Market street; the seawall on the waterfront split off from the mainland and fell into the bay; Nob Hill was split fairly in twain, and the United Railroads Company is now using the enormous earthquake crevice through that hill as a railway cutting for its track. These statements have been suppressed or minimized by the journals of San Francisco, but they are entirely true. We are informed on the best of authority that the estimate of four hundred dead is false, and that the authorities threw several thousand bodies into the ocean near Baker's Beach, whence they floated out to sea.

"We have interviewed Professor Honk, the famous geologist, and asked his opinion concerning the reason for our freedom from any earthquake shocks in or around Los Angeles. The professor informs us that a vast bed of Miocene shale surrounds this city, running to a depth of probably twenty miles. In the post-Jurassic Time it is evident that glacial action eroded the old red sandstone moraines; hence accordeon pleats were made in the selvage or edging of the folds of the mountains. [This word "folds" comes from the Spanish "faldas," showing that even in the old Colonial or Spanish times and in her Mexican days Los Angeles was entirely free from earthquake shocks.] In the Quaternary period, or Age of Man, the Mesozoic ooze saturated or impregnated this shale. This, taken in conjunction with the accordeon pleats, constitutes a vast buffer, which prevents the dreadful earthquake shocks of the cataclysmic zone surrounding San Francisco from extending to this favored neighborhood.

"On the other hand, as Professor Honk points out, San Francisco is probably one of the most awful specimens of metamorphic catastrophism known to geologists. In a very recent geological period it is quite evident that the land under the present Bay of San Francisco suddenly sunk, and the peninsula was at once thrown up violently into the air. The islands in San Francisco harbor are the tops of sunken mountains which once rose high above the Coast Range. What has occurred before may occur again. Much as we regret the recent dreadful disaster in San Francisco, we greatly fear that it will be repeated on an even more cataclysmic scale. Suppose the phenomenon should be reversed—suppose the bottom of the bay should suddenly rise up—suppose Goat Island, Alcatraz Island, and Angel Island should begin to rock and wiggle—suppose the bay should suddenly run violently down through the Golden Gate into the sea, like a herd of swine in the Bible, what would happen to San Francisco then?

"Ah, what indeed!"

Dear! dear! It gives San Franciscans a creepy feeling to read these extracts from journals at the other ends of the earthquake belt when we are in the middle. But the whirligig of time brings its revenges. Some seven months have rolled away, and Mother Earth has continued to quake in various parts of the globe. Her upheavals have brought to light a vast amount of earthquake lore, the very existence of which most of us did not suspect. Some of it is, as Mr. Mantalini would say, "dem'd unpleasant reading," for those who live in earthquake belts, or zones, or circles—for so they are variously called by the unpleasant persons who write about them. For example: Some time after the San Francisco earthquake the prediction was made by Professor George Becker, of the United States Geological Survey, that inasmuch as this city is on the great Pacific earthquake circle, other shocks might soon be expected on that zone. When Valparaiso was turned inside out, Professor Becker remarked briefly, "I told you so." Professor Becker is probably the most profound and certainly the most disagreeable person in the Geological Survey. No one hitherto has questioned his hindsight. No one in future will question his foresight.

Hope springs eternal in the human breast. Turning from the gloomy words of these contemporaneous geologists, we have resorted for comfort to some of the older text books. Twenty years ago Chancellor Dawson was an authority on "The Harmony of Geology and Revelation"; he was not so prone to scare people to death with his pictures of geologic convulsions, past, present, and to come. But now we find little comfort even in the pages of Chancellor Dawson. According to him, "the most interesting period, geologically speaking," is the Permian, whose layers lie immediately over the Carboniferous; it is one of the sub-divisions of Paleozoic Time, and was immediately succeeded by the Triassic. Chancellor Dawson points out that much of the earth at the close of the Carboniferous age had slowly subsided beneath the waves of the ocean; that it was violently disturbed at the inauguration of the Permian period; that a great succession of earth-waves began west of the Atlantic in our hemisphere; that after the lapse of countless ages these waves erected what is now called the Appalachian range; that the earth movements which threw up the Appalachian mountains were strongest to the eastward; that the ridges of rock are steepest on their west sides, the forces which caused them coming from the direction of the sea. It is as if the Atlantic bottom, wanting room, had crumpled up the edges of the continent next to it. In the Paleozoic age the earth's crust had shrunk, creating in some places rock layers, in others great folds or wrinkles. Graphic diagrams show how the earth's crust, when thus pushed laterally, wrinkles; when beds of solid rock are met in the process, they break abruptly, and cause faults or slips. As the ocean basin is sufficiently strong to resist the immense lateral pressure, the yielding must concentrate on the weak parts of the crust, near the old fractures, at the margins of the great continents. Thus, according to Chancellor Dawson, the wrinkles, or folds, or mountain ranges near the edges of continents are caused by the pushing or thrusting-up pressure from the basin under the ocean. Thus they are liable to earthquakes. He remarks, enthusiastically: "The Permian is an intensely interesting period." So it is. Our earthquake zone seems to be something like it. Doubtless some future Chancellor Dawson, many years from now, will be interested in our earth-waves, and what they did to us.

Some other geological ruffians differ. They hold to this conception: The earth is an oblate spheroid; owing to centripetal force and the swiftness of its rotation, it bulges at the equator and is flattened at the poles; this process, continued through countless ages, finally results in an overbalancing of the heavier matter constituting the globe; as the earth's axis is inclined to its orbit, it brings about a sudden shifting, by which the polar region becomes the equatorial and the equatorial becomes the polar. This theory is corroborated by the finding of fossil remains of polar bears in the equatorial regions, and of lions and tigers within the Arctic circle. This theory was advanced by Laplace or Arago, if we are not mistaken. Those who support it believe that these little slips, quivers, and cracks, such as have taken place at San Francisco and Valparaiso, are the premonitory movements before our flattened planet changes ends.

There is little consolation to be had from these earthquake experts, new or old. The latest scientist to tap with his geological hammer on our hollow-sounding coffin, the stony carth, is Professor Ralph S. Tarr, of Cornell University. Professor Tarr in a recent paper discusses at length the causes of earthquakes, on which he is an authority. He also points out some most unpleasant facts. He says that extremely destructive earthquakes are taking place all the time, and the only reason they do not attract attention is because they break loose in desert places. For example, a violent earthquake in the middle of the Pacific Ocean or the Arabian Sea attracts little attention. But it is merely a matter of luck that it does not break out in a thickly settled country. Professor Tarr says that the great earthquake of Yakutat Bay in Alaska in 1899 attracted practically no attention at all, as that country was inhabited only by a few Indians. This shock took place in the same great mountain range which runs along the Pacific Coast all the way from the Arctic circle to Tierra del Fuego. Up in Alaska, it would seem, the same irresistible movement is taking place as here and in South America—the mountains are being thrust up out of the sea. When this Alaskan earthquake occurred, according to Professor Tarr, some of the ancient beaches which for ages had been washed by the waves were lifted up to heights varying from two to forty-seven feet above the present sea level. Fresh fractures in the rocks and raw scars on the mountain slopes are visible on every side, and the great tidal wave caused by this cataclysmic earthquake tore up by the roots great trees growing forty feet above sea level.

We will pass over the disagreeable remarks made by Professor Tarr concerning our own little earthquake of April, 1906. These remarks are calculated to produce melancholia. It will do no good to print them here. Forget it.

But we may talk of what is said by earthquake experts concerning other spots on the globe. A French authority, Count De Montessus de Ballore, has written a monumental work on earthquakes. The count is one of those irritating and statistical persons who pin you down to facts. He has charted out the earth's surface, and he finds that there are two great belts or circles within which have taken place ninety-four per cent of the recorded earthquakes on the globe. One of these belts passes through the West Indies, the Mediterranean Sea, and the Caucasus and Himalayan mountains; this belt is called by De Montessus the "Mediterranean" or "Alpine-Caucasus-Himalaya" belt. Within this zone forty-one per cent of all recorded earthquakes have occurred. Another great earthquake zone almost encircles the Pacific; it follows the Andes in South America and the various mountain ranges along the coast of Western North America; it curves around the northern Pacific Ocean, through the Aleutian Islands, and thence to Japan and the Philippines. This belt Count de Montessus calls the "Circum-Pacific" or "Andes-Japanese-Malayan" belt. In this earthquake circle have occurred fifty-three per cent of all the earthquakes that are of record. On these two comparatively narrow zones of land, therefore, practically all the severe earthquakes of the world have been experienced. Only six per cent of all the recorded earthquakes known to man have occurred outside of these two narrow zones. And it is a melancholy fact that we are in the belt where fifty-three per cent of all recorded earthquakes have occurred.

There is some comfort to be derived from the fact that the dwellers outside of these circles are not absolutely safe against earthquakes. Destructive shocks occasionally occur outside of the great earthquake circles, as at Charlestown, in 1886. But, generally speaking, the earthquakes which occur outside of these circles are minor shocks, they are few in number, and are rarely destructive. But in these two earthquake circles shocks may occur in many places and at frequent intervals, according to both Professor Tarr and Count de Montessus. "San Francisco and Santiago, for example, are situated on danger-lines in the earth's crust, as are many other places in the two great belts."

There is little comfort to be derived from the predictions of these two gentlemen, but still there is some. We would like to call the attention of our esteemed contemporaries at Los Angeles and Portland, San Diego and Seattle and other points on the coast, who consider themselves outside of the earthquake zone, to the fact that they are distinctly in it; that instead of being three hundred miles long, it is about twenty thousand miles long; and that they can not get out of it unless they move their burghs about a thousand miles to the east and on the other side of the Rocky Mountains. There, apparently, the country has stopped growing. But the land on the hither side of the Rocky Mountain range, westward to the Pacific Ocean, may be considered geologically as in the later Paleozoic Age. It is a young and growing country, the principal objection to which seems to be that it is growing too fast for comfort, even for Los Angeles.

Were There Republican Defections?

The week before the California election the Argonaut remarked that most of the Republican workingmen in the labor unions would probably vote the ticket of their party, notwithstanding the attempts to bulldoze them into voting the Democratic ticket under the guise of a "State Union Labor Ticket." We further said that the swarming, bolting, and realignment among voters would take place in the non-Republican portion of the voting population of California. This seems to have been the case. True, the vote of Gillett is lower than the vote of Pardee was four years ago, but his plurality is larger. Pardee and his office-holders are responsible for a part of the diminution; of the rest of the shortage, a part went to Langdon, a part to the Socialist and Prohibition nominees, and of course a part to Bell. But it is our opinion that a comparatively insignificant fraction went to the Democratic-Union Labor ticket; most of it went to the other nominees. Our belief is corroborated by the fact that San Francisco, although a labor union town, not only failed to get the heavy plurality expected by Bell and the labor union leaders, but even went Republican. Our belief is further verified by the fact that Labor Leader Parry has been attempting to discipline a number of the Labor Union office holders in San Francisco who failed to vote the regulation ticket and take programme. These men were silent before the election, and evidently voted for Gillett. Now they are not silent, but are freely admitting that they did so. Parry and the other labor leaders are calling secret meetings for the purpose of punishing these recalcitrants. This proves what we said—that Gillett would hold the mass of the Republican voters together, and even the votes of the Republican workingmen belonging to the labor unions.

San Francisco's Municipal Investigation.

The attempt by Abraham Ruef to oust F. J. Heney, assistant to District Attorney Langdon, has failed. The courts have decided that the mayor and Board of Supervisors have no right under the charter to remove the District Attorney, he being a county official. Attorney Heney has therefore continued his crusade against Ruef and the municipal officials.

At its first two sessions the Grand Jury found five indictments against Mayor Schmitz and Mr. Ruef for extortion. They are accused of obtaining money from certain French restaurant-keepers under the threat of depriving them of their liquor licenses in case of refusal. Some of these restaurant-keepers support the allegation; others deny it. The charges, it seem to us, will be somewhat difficult of proof. If the restaurant-keepers paid the money knowing that it was to be used to bribe the municipal officials, they also are guilty. If, as some of them claim, they paid the money merely as an attorney's fee to Ruef, the charge falls to the ground. Ruef claims that he acted as an attorney, representing the restaurant keepers before the Police Commission; that he made a contract with the restaurant men: that the existence of this contract was a matter of common knowledge. Ruef fills no official position, and he can claim with much show of reason that he was acting in this matter merely as an attorney. The attitude of the public and the Bar Association toward the methods of attorneys in this bailiwick is so lenient, not to say lax, that almost anything an attorney may do, short of manslaughter, is winked at. The daily papers state that the Grand Jury will indict for perjury those among the French restaurant-keepers who may endeavor to screen Ruef by swearing that they merely paid him attorney's fees. If the restaurant keepers swear the way they are desired to do, and if they continue swearing in the same way—which seems a trifling doubtful—perhaps the indictments will stick.

The daily papers state that the Presidio and Ferries Railway was forced to pay a large sum for its franchise to the supervisors. This statement is denied by President Geo. A. Newhall.

Supervisor F. Nicholas has been indicted for bribery. He is charged with receiving $26 from a furniture firm which supplied $260 worth of desks.

Rumors of remittances to the Relief Fund having been stolen have not been proved.

It is said that numerous other indictments will be found against municipal officials for demanding money for liquor licenses, for building permits, and for prize fight permits.

Arizona and New Mexico.

We rejoice to see that the result of the election in Arizona has been that the proposition for joint statehood with New Mexico was overwhelmingly rejected. In New Mexico a small majority—six thousand—declared in favor of the plan. In Arizona the vote was nearly unanimous against it—over eighty-five per cent of the voters declaring against joint statehood. If this ill-omened proposition had carried, it would have brought about the erection of a State which would from the first have been doomed to disaster. The two Territories are utterly dissimilar in blood, in religion, in training in interests, and in political faith. We regret that President Roosevelt should have been prevailed upon by interested parties to cast his great influence with the wrong side. His letter—practically addressed to the people of Arizona—strongly urged them to vote for joint statehood. But popular as the President is in the Southwest, where his old regiment was largely recruited, the people of Arizona would not listen to him. Personally we are very glad the vote was so decisive. Arizona had not scorned this marriage of convenience, it would have shown that she was not fitted for any kind of statehood, joint or other.

The New York Journal editorial ridiculing Richard Watson Gilder has called out many vigorous rejoinders. Jacob A. Riis published a letter describing one of Gilder's heroic acts while a Union soldier in the Gettysburg campaign. The Boston Traveler said: "Before Hearst was born he was a mere boy, fighting bravely in the civil war. About the time that Hearst was misbehaving himself at Harvard there existed in New York a monstrous conspiracy against the poor. Heartless landlords backed by a cruel and wicked political machine built tenement houses which coined them money and from which the undertakers reaped a rich harvest from the bodies of the children who died for want of the things which God meant should be always free—light and air. Mr. Gilder took up the fight, at first almost alone. It was a hard and a long battle. It cost him much money, unlimited time and probably caused the frailty which inspires Brisbane's sneers. But he won glorious victory. The Legislature was compelled to act. The Gilder tenement house commission exposed the conspiracy between the landlords and the politicians. Hundreds of tenements were torn down. The result was a decrease in the death rate of from 28 to 14 in a thousand, a saving of baby lives alone in New York City estimated at 12,000 a year."

The new "freeboard tables" issued by the British government allow ships to be loaded nearly a foot above the present Plimsoll mark. This is to meet the competition of German ships, which are being loaded to the margin of risk and beyond.

UNDER THE KAISER'S COAT.

How the Town of Koepenick Was Taken By a Cobbler-Captain.

There is still opportunity for ability and courage in Germany. By one bold stroke a battered old cobbler has achieved military fame, brought an obscure village into prominence before the eyes of the world, and added a new word to universal language. And all this after half a lifetime spent behind prison bars. In the story of his exploit there is rare humor.

Voigt began his preparations for the grand coup by purchasing the complete uniform of a captain of the First Guards Regiment from a second-hand dealer in Berlin. The rest was easy in spite of the fact that his figure was no semblance to a correct military bearing. His ears protrude, his shoulders are stooped, one leg is slightly deformed, his cheeks are hollow, yet when attired in the white coat of the First Guards Regiment he was described as "dashing."

His first step was to secure "accomplices." He appeared in one of the streets of Berlin just as a squad of our soldiers and a corporal from a swimming commando belonging to the Fusilier Guards, and a similar squad from the Fourth Guards Regiment, were passing on their way to their barracks. The soldiers were halted and told they were to place themselves at his disposal for special service. While they might have argued with the man, they dared not dispute the authority of the uniform, even though, as is improbable, they had any suspicions.

Koepenick, a little municipality which lies in the valley of the Spree, an hour's ride east of Berlin, was selected as the scene of the pseudo-officer's important operations:

The bogus captain placed his soldiers on the train and took them to Koepenick. Upon their arrival in the town the cobbler first visited the postoffice, where he gave orders that all communications, telegraphic or telephonic, with the town hall were to be cut off for two hours. The captain produced no orders. The uniform was sufficient to have his wishes carried out in a thorough manner.

Proceeding to the rathhaus or town hall, soldiers, with bayonets fixed, were placed on guard. The bandit coolly entered and saw the mayor, Herr Langerhans, who was immediately placed under arrest. He wanted to know why he was being arrested. "The Kaiser's orders," replied the captain. Still unwilling to be so cavalierly captured, the mayor asked to see the orders. The brigand waved a hand in the direction of his soldiers. So the mayor succumbed to the witchery of the Kaiser's coat.

Even in Koepenick there was curiosity and somewhat alarmed interest among the unsophisticated inhabitants:

When the detachment occupied the town hall a large crowd gathered, naturally attracted by the sight of soldiers with fixed bayonets guarding the doors. One of the principal police officials of Koepenick also appeared and demanded entrance, which the soldiers refused, threatening to shoot him if he attempted to pass. When the robber heard the police superintendent was before the door, he summoned him, and told him he required assistance. The superintendent, like all others, stood at attention, and, after receiving the captain's orders, proceeded to execute them. He summoned eight policemen, and directed them to keep order among the crowd.

There was one vulnerable point in the captain's armor, and a woman found it, as woman has done in all ages in similar circumstances. Had the men of Koepenick possessed her bravery and energy they might not now be famous.

The only heroic part in the drama was played by Mayor Langerhans's wife, who on learning of her husband's arrest rushed to the town hall, forced her way past the soldiers, entered the room where the mayor was held prisoner, and threw herself into his arms, declaring that she would share his fate, whatever it might be. The disguised brigand was so impressed by her energy that he permitted her to remain with her husband and accompany him when he was escorted to Berlin by the grenadiers.

Carrying out the orders of their commander, squad of the soldiers conveyed the captured mayor to the railway station and set out by train, leaving him in the hands of the military at Berlin. Meanwhile the captain set about the real object of his enterprise:

Herr von Wildberg, the town treasurer, was approached by the bogus captain, who calmly seated himself at a desk and called for the treasurer's books. The brigand intimated that some irregularity had been detected, and that by the Kaiser's orders he had been sent to Koepenick to look into the affairs of the office. When the big folios and cash books had been laid before the bold auditor, he turned the leaves over in a rapid, businesslike way, and then called to the astonished treasurer: "Make up the cash accounts!"

In the presence of the Kaiser's coat the accountant did not hesitate. He made up his accounts and handed the sh. 3559 marks 12 pfennigs, about $900, to the important personage. The robber, in a perfectly natural manner, wrote out a receipt for the money, and signed it "v. Aloysen F. G. R.," meaning Von Aloysen, Captain, First Guards Regiment. Once the bogus captain had the money, the treasurer was handed over to the waiting police whom the robber had commanded, and was soon on his way to the mayor in Berlin.

In possession of the money, which was a mere trifle compared with the cash and securities at his disposal, the captain took his time in disappearing. After perpetrating the raid the brigand chief drove to the railway station and took a train to a junction on the outskirts of Berlin. There he left the train, hired a cab, and drove across Berlin to the southern end of Friedrichstrasse. Entering a clothing shop he bought a ready-made suit of civilian dress. Then he re-entered the cab and drove to another railway station, and in a deserted waiting-room, exchanged his uniform for the civilian attire. His sword was found in a corner of the room. The uniform was subsequently found concealed in the bushes of Tempelhof Plain, on the southern outskirts of Berlin.

It was a matter of only a few hours for the Berlin officials to discover that a grand hoax had been perpetrated, and as soon as stupefaction had been overcome by anger all the detectives of the city were sent out to run down the audacious rogue who had imposed on soldiers, town officials, and the people. A big reward was offered and after several days the culprit was detected. His career had been a vicious one, but hardly to be accepted as likely to fit him for such an achievement:

Voigt is fifty-seven years old, a gray, haggard, sorry specimen of humanity, with marks of his criminal career indelibly printed on his hard, bad face. He has been several times confined for long terms, having received seven years' penal servitude for forgery practised on a post-office, and only last February he completed a term of fifteen years' penal servitude for robbing the safe of courts of justice at Wongrowitz, in Posen. In February he settled in Wismar, under police surveillance, and worked as shoemaker, but the eye of the law was too much for him, and he migrated to Berlin, where he took up his quarters with his sister.

He fully realizes the fame that he has achieved, and not even the prospect of spending the rest of his life in prison lessens his satisfaction. When the idea of his coup first came to him Voigt frequented music halls and other places where military officers resort that he might study them and their ways. The deference with which he observed they were everywhere treated soon convinced him that the uniform counted for vastly more than the man inside of it.

From the time when Voigt's exploit first became known up to the present he has been a hero with the public, and he will have sympathy in his punishment:

A parody on the raid was produced with great success at the Metropole Theatre, and a humorous novel, based on the arrest of the municipal officials, was published. It had a great sale. Hundreds of hawkers sold postcards in the streets bearing comic illustrations of the Koepenick capture.

"Koepenick" has been added to the Berlin vocabulary of slang. Hereafter, whenever any one has been made the victim of a practical joke or a fraud, Berliners will declare that he has been "Koepenicked."

The Emperor was greatly impressed with the audacity of the raid. He is reported to have declared to a member of his suite that "a man who could carry out such an enterprise in time of peace would be worth an entire army corps in time of war."

The result of the affair may be more than a momentary criticism of the enforced attitude of the people regarding the uniform of an officer:

As a matter of fact, the Kaiser's coat in itself is a sort of fetish, with legal privileges attached to it apart from its wearer. If a man in an officer's uniform in the broad daylight boxes citizens' ears in the Friedrichstrasse, or even if he commits lese majeste or smashes shop windows, neither citizen nor policeman has the right to arrest him and convey him to the lockup. The officer in uniform is a sacred person so long as he is in uniform. Should he disport himself in this manner while wearing civilian clothes he may be arrested by any one, even by a policeman. It is not the officer in himself who is immune, it is his coat.

It is pointed out that the soldiers who assisted Voigt in his coup acted correctly in obeying the orders of a man whom they regarded as a superior officer. No blame attaches to them. Forty years ago a mad officer ordered the men of his company to swim across a swollen torrent in their full equipment. Obedience to the order meant death. The men hesitated to obey the officer, who rushed at them with drawn sword, intending to compel obedience. As it was clear he was mad the men disarmed him. Every man was sentenced to lifelong penal servitude. Some died in prison, and the others were pardoned by the present emperor after serving more than twenty years.

There is in French history a notable precedent for the German hoax, though it is not probable that the Hauptmann von Koepenick ever heard of it as it took place nearly a hundred years ago. But for a slight mischance—a woman's wit—Paris, and France even, would have been captured:

Malet had been a Republican general, was ruined by the rise of Napoleon, betook himself to plotting, was arrested, and finally put in a madhouse. During the emperor's absence in Russia in 1812 Malet escaped one night from his prison, obtained a general's uniform, and with an accomplice dressed as an aide-de-camp, made his way to the prison of La Force, where the unsuspecting governor released, on his command, two other ex-Republicans—Generals Laborie and Guidal, prisoners on a like charge to his own. Together they proceeded to a neighboring barracks, announced to the commandant that Napoleon was dead, and that they were acting by the decree of the senate, ordered the troops to be paraded, and despatched bodies of men upon various duties. Some arrested Savary, the minister of police; others the police prefect; another battalion seized the Hotel de Ville. Everybody obeyed Malet implicitly, even the Prefect of the Seine and he would undoubtedly have gained possession of Paris had he not been recognized by Laborde, chief of the military police, as an escaped prisoner. He was arrested after a scuffle, the plot was unravelled, and in due course Malet, with twenty-three of his abettors, was shot.

POLITICO-PERSONAL.

Secretary Shaw in fifty days visited sixteen States and made ninety-three speeches, averaging an hour and a half each. He had his secretary with him, and was in daily touch with the department, conducting a large correspondence.

Oscar S. Straus, soon to be Secretary of Commerce and Labor, addressed the voters of Brooklyn Friday night before election in opposition to Hearst. Shortly before, Nathan Straus, his brother, the rich philanthropist, issued a statement telling why he intended to support Hearst.

James H. Higgins, Democrat, is 30 years of age, and Governor-elect of Rhode Island, the smallest State in the Union. He has been mayor of the city of Pawtucket, R. I., the past four years. He is popular and even his political enemies have for him only respect. His habits are exemplary, and he uses neither tobacco nor intoxicants.

Secretary of the Interior Ethan Allen Hitchcock will retire from the Cabinet on the 4th of next March, and James R. Garfield of Ohio, the present Commissioner of Corporations, will succeed him. Herbert Knox Smith, now Assistant Commissioner of Corporations, will be appointed to Garfield's place. The retirement of Commissioner Richards of the General Land Office will take place at the same time.

Harry S. New of Indiana, is said to be slated to succeed George B. Cortelyou as chairman of the Republican National Committee when Cortelyou retires from the position, which will be before January 1st, when he becomes Secretary of the Treasury. New now is vice-chairman of the committee. He was the power behind the throne in the Harrison campaigns, and also managed the last National Republican Convention.

The New England Democratic Progressive League has been formed in Boston, by representatives from five New England States, Vermont being unrepresented. Alexander Troup of New Haven was chosen president and George Fred Williams of Massachusetts of the executive committee. The New York World remarks of this that a few undaunted souls are planning "a Democratic revival," and concludes by saying that about the best Democratic revival it can think of would be the nomination of some candidates that Democrats could and would vote for.

Attorney-General William Henry Moody of Massachusetts, now appointed Justice of the Supreme Court to succeed Justice Henry Billings Brown, who retired some time ago, has filled the office of Attorney-General since July 1, 1904. Previous to that time he had served for more than two years as Secretary of the Navy. He had also represented his State in the Fifty-fourth, Fifty-fifth, Fifty-sixth and Fifty-seventh Congresses. It is generally expected that Mr. Moody will retire from the Department of Justice the latter part of December.

Leaders of both political parties in Colorado assert that no woman will again be nominated for a legislative office. They say that equal suffrage in Colorado is rapidly becoming a farce, and the rank and file of citizens, women included, wish the fair sex eliminated from the political game. Four women ran for the House of Representatives recently. Three of them were on the Democratic ticket and one was on the Socialist ticket. All were defeated by decisive majorities. It was during the administration of the 'Populist Governor Waite, in 1893, that woman suffrage was granted in Colorado, and since then nine different women have been elected to the House.

In commenting upon President Roosevelt's action in sending a telegram of condolence and a floral offering to the family of Mrs. Jefferson Davis, newspapers in the South do not forget an episode which concerned the husband of the dead woman, remarks the Springfield (Mass.) Republican. In one of Mr. Roosevelt's early books were bitter references to Mr. Davis, to which he took exception on matters of fact, and wrote to Mr. Roosevelt requesting that a correction be made. This resulted in the returning of Mr. Davis's letter with these words written across it: "Mr. Theodore Roosevelt desires to have no communication with 'Mr. Jefferson Davis.'" So that incident was emphatically closed. When President Roosevelt began his tour through a portion of the South and the Southwest last year, he was called upon by newspapers of the South to make amends for that youthful action, but nothing came of it. Now it is being said that the conduct of the President toward the bereaved family, is, as one of the Southern newspapers put it, "his way of apologizing."

A SINNER IN PARADISE.

How He Crept In Under Cover of His Wife's Wing.

Never in the memory of good St. Peter had a Vauvert man been able to get into Paradise.

Not that at Vauvert they were more wicked or more quarrelsome than elsewhere, and not that they went to confession less, or cheated the housewives more than was reasonable; no, not at all; it was simply because they loved bull-fights far too well. When the bull-fight was announced all else was abandoned, and in the whole of the city, in the streets of an evening, under the trees of the sidewalks, before the cafes, and above all, upon the steps of the houses, nothing was heard but a discourse upon bulls, their origin, their form and possible strength, their agility and their power of muscle.

On days like these the occasions for sin were multiplied, and the exuberance of passions knew no limit or restraint. The Recording Angel, writing on high in his great book the actions of men, found the columns devoted to Vauvert on the evenings of these courses stretched to an interminable length.

No, a Vauvert man had never entered Paradise, whether from this or some other reason, till the day when Mark Sistra attempted the enterprise and succeeded.

This Mark Sistra was a scamp of the first water, lazy, quarrelsome, drunken, brutal, and a liar; he made a martyr of his wife, who was a veritable saint; he ran after the bull-fights like a perfect lunatic. Every time a fight was billed for Vauvert, Mark was the first to know it, to examine the animals, to proffer his advice, and then upon the day of the courses no one drank, gambled, swore, and fought as he did, till even the Vauvert people declared among themselves that, of all its many miscreants, Mark Sistra was the one for whom the devil watched with the most impatience.

Well, one evening, as the result of repeated libations, and while discussing the singular fate of the Vauvert men unable to enter heaven, Mark Sistra swore by all the heathen gods that he, at least, would enter there, and there he would remain, despite the fact of which they warned him, among other things, that he would certainly weary of passing eternity in the singing of hymns. The more they argued, the more firmly did he hold to his promise.

Meanwhile, as these scenes were occurring, Marion Sistra, worn out by chagrin, broken with sorrow, and crushed by the brutalities of her husband, was passing away, like running water. She, whom they had known in youth so gay and fresh, had become pale, wan, and shrunken as a winter leaf, and so chagrined that day and night she wept and sobbed, and, at the time of our story, was unable to leave her bed, even to go to church. The doctor, when they asked him about her, shook his head with an air of mournful augury, for well did he know that she was sick unto death.

This illness of his wife, however, in nowise hindered Mark from going as usual to pass his hours at the cafe, to play at billiards or bet at piquet with gay young bloods, who twirled their mustaches and prolonged their orgies till morning. If anything, he went more than ever. But on a certain Sunday, Marion Sistra was given extreme unction, as they knew not if she would last till night, and this same Sunday was the day appointed for a grand bull-fight at Vauvert.

Still, Mark Sistra had no idea of absenting himself from so fine an occasion of gaining cockades and prizes, and then the bulls were better than usual and conducted by a cuadrilla renowned from Saint-Gilles to Remoulins. He would go to show these toreros, whose names were posted in big letters all over the walls and fences, how they did things at Vauvert, for they had jeered at him at the cafes till he had accepted battle with a bull whose horns had been specially sharpened for the fight. Truly a "master toro," in the language of the experts, and one who had "ripped" many a better and more skillful player than Mark could boast of being.

Alas! at the very moment when he, Mark Sistra, was striving to hold his own, she, Marion Sistra, was in the last agony, all white and cold, in her little chamber with closed shutters, blessed candles at her head and feet, and the good priest of Vauvert reading beside her the prayers for the dying while neighbors came and went about the bed, sprinkling it with holy water, and walking upon the points of their toes for fear of disturbing her last hours.

Suddenly there was a terrible tumult in the street below, the cries and shouts of an excited crowd; then the sound of footsteps on the stairs, and the entrance of two men bearing on their shoulders a stiffened corpse, pale and bloody. Marion, half dead already, raised herself with a gasp of horror—to fall back dead. Mark was already dead, his body transfixed by the bull's horns.

Chance had settled everything; the good and the bad had gone together, and their two souls, destined to a fate so different, cast off at the same instant their mortal remains to meet again upon the road precisely at the turning when one was nearing hell, the other heaven.

The black soul of the husband spoke first.

"You, Marion!" he cried, astounded, "and whither go you, my little one?"

"Where God has called me," said the soul of Marion.

"Is it far?"

"Very far; yonder on high!"

"To Paradise, then?"

"Yes, to Paradise."

"Well! How lucky we met; I'm going there too; we can go together," declared the black soul, as if he saw not the ineffable whiteness of the other, he, as black as soot itself, and spotted with sins.

"You, to Paradise?" repeated Marion; "but, Mark, do you not know that the weight of your iniquities weighs you down, and that hell awaits you?"

"Me? pooh!" laughed Mark; "calm yourself, little one. I have told you I am going to Paradise, and I tell you again I am going!"

"But how? How will you enter there? Did you take out the indispensable passport before starting? Did you die in prayer, receiving upon your body the unction of holy oils?"

"Pooh, pooh! no, certainly not; I had too much to do."

And the white soul, veiling her face, sought to flee from her companion, but Mark caught her by a wing and held her fast.

"A minute," said he; "you say that one must have a passport to enter above there? Have you a passport?"

"I? Of course."

"Good! So much the better—it will serve for both."

"What—for both?" exclaimed the white soul, in horror.

"Yes; for both. I shall hide behind you; you will present your passport, and, hoop-la! once in, I ask nothing more!"

This was too much. Horror paralyzed the white soul; she strove to murmur, "Get thee behind me, Satan!" But, without disquieting himself at the exorcism, Mark laughed and repeated:

"Yes, you must smuggle me in!"

And, with his brutal hand, he still held her fast by the tip of the wing, and still she continued to struggle.

"You are a wretch!" she cried; "a wretch, I say. Do you think for a moment I would deceive St. Peter?"

"My dear little wife! my dear little love! my precious flower! You would not abandon your husband, whom you love so much, and who loves you so well?" and Mark giving to his voice the tenderest inflection, with bowed head and lips wreathed with a smile, softly caressed with the free hand the white plumes of Marion, seeking to convince her at once by speech and gesture.

Nothing moved her, and Mark, reduced to violent means, proceeded at last to tweak out a feather, heedless of the victim's shrieks of pain.

"I'm your husband," he declared, as he pulled a second one; "your husband, whom you must obey!"

"Obey? That order? Never! never!"

And this was Marion! formerly so gentle and submissive, who dared to speak in this way! Mark tweaked all the harder. What mattered to him the prayers, lamentations, and refusals of his wife? He was too well accustomed to making her obey, to heed either pain or indignation.

The habit of the yoke is so strong, that presently, despite her horror, Marion's poor white soul, faint and conquered, abandoned itself to the worst, consented to become the accomplice of the criminal project, and to attempt the introduction of this miscreant into the kingdom reserved for the just.

So on they went together, Mark smiling and proud to be the first from Vauvert to enter the happy realms; doubly proud of the trick he was going to play upon the good St. Peter, and with Marion dragging after him, sighing and sobbing pitifully.

But why was the devil not waiting for his own at the cross-roads? Upon that day, as it happened, Beelzebub was celebrating his birthday fete, and at the moment when Mark died he was about to dine upon a truffled turkey, presented him by his friend Belial, and so much to his taste that he would not have stirred from table to have greeted a pope. Moreover, what respectable demon would have dreamed that Mark, the miserable scamp, would have chosen a bull-fight day to depart the earth.

The one dragging the other, after long fatigues, the two souls arrived at the gate of Paradise. An what a spectacle! That great golden door, studded with precious stones, shining like an illuminator and with St. Peter, pen in hand and keys at belt, receiving upon one side the necessary passport and pushing back on the other the hypocrites and knaves who sought admission under cover of the crowd.

But when he raised his head at the name of Vauvert, and saw that it was Marion Sistra who stood before him, that noble woman who weekly burned a candle in his honor, he threw open the door without more ado.

"Enter, my child," said he.

She entered, feeling always behind her the black soul of Mark, making itself as small as possible despairingly hooked to her wing, and scarcely daring to draw a breath for fear of being discovered. And when night came, and St. Peter still pore over his hieroglyphics, in his quality of apostle reading all languages, he never for an instant suspected that Mark Sistra, that rascal watched for by the devil, had forced himself, through the complicity of his wife, into Paradise.

During the first days all went well with Mark. He filled his lungs with the delicious air; he boated upon the great blue lake, with its silver swans; he wandered under the trees from which, in a perfumed rain, fell flowers of ideal beauty; he listened to the concerts of the seraphim and the angels; he slept eight hours out of twelve—in short, he continued the life of indolence so well begun when living upon the earth.

He, the first Vauvert man—despite the fact that he had done nothing to deserve it—who had ever crossed the sacred threshold! Only to think of it! He was greatly amused, and placing his eye at one of the loopholes through which from above they regard the earth, he gazed upon his old home tranquilly sleeping upon the banks of the Vistre, even the cafe, in which he had played his billiard and paid his wages for mugs of beer, showed plainly beneath him. Mark sighed as he thought of the cafe; heaven was pleasant, but there were no cafe there.

The simple pleasure of seeing Vauvert suffice him for a while and might have continued to suffice him, had it not been that one Sunday, when the saints were all at mass and he, as usual, peeping from his hole, he saw a sight that stirred his blood. A sight indeed—a monade of bulls, such as Mark had never seen before; Spanish bulls escorted by toreros in velvet costumes, covered with passerilles and gay cockades; nervous and agile bull, lustrous of skin, brilliant of eye, and with long and slender tails ending in tassels of silky hair; super animals, one brown, one black, and so elegant of form, so proud of bearing, that never in its greatest day had Vauvert known the like. At the head marched the toreros and the picadores, lances in hand, behind them a gaping multitude.

From that instance Mark was weary of Paradise. He had enough of eternal promenades beneath the trees and eternal boatings upon placid lakes. The country was beautiful, truly, but there were no billiards, no cafes, no games of piquet. He was tired; tired even of the endless perfume, the long sleeps, the continual serenity of everything.

Ah! if he had not been sure that hell awaited him, and that even at that moment the devil was not rummaging the world to find him, how quickly he would have fled from this delightful sojourn that wearied him so terribly for lack of bulls and races! He had only to say the word to go, but that word—Mark was not willing to pronounce it. Satan waited with his uplifted fork to pop him in to the vat where already, for centuries, perhaps had been boiling and roasting players of games and runners of bulls such as he. Sooner than enter that yawning furnace he would continue to bore himself in Paradise, and, if needful, since it was the custom on high, to sing hymns like the other. Yet this bull-fight at Vauvert, with its chulos, its ganderillos, and its two thousand francs' worth of prizes in a lump, ran through his thoughts and dreams; and he saw always passing and repassing before him those two beautiful bulls, tossing the sharp white horns, agitating their slender tail with the tassels of hair at the end of them.

* * * * *

Perhaps you think the devil did not jump though he had dined so well on truffled turkey; when his valet came to inform him that at last Mark Sistra was dead.

"And where is he, the brigand?" he cried out, joyfully.

"No one knows, my lord."

"What? And have they let him escape?"

"My lord forgets; he charged himself personally with securing him; no one dared to forestall your ordship."

"Ha! the rascal!" cried Satan, furiously, "to profit thus by my natal fete! All the same, he doesn't escape me; wherever he is I will find and take him!" And swearing an oath that made even his myrmidons tremble, he leaped from his bed and shot like a bomb on his way to earth. But at auvert he learned nothing, save that Marion Sistra was dead, and upon the same day as her husband. In purgatory it was the same thing—no one of the name of Sistra had been heard of by the guardian of that sombre place, and none of Sistra's comrades who incumbered hell could give tidings of the missing one.

Frantic at his ill success, Beelzebub was going into a terrible rage, when suddenly an idea occurred to him; Mark Sistra was a cunning rascal, and doubtless was precisely where he had never been sought for—that is to say, in Paradise! Instantly, with excitement, the enemy of the human race spread his bat-like wings and speeded away toward the celestial heights.

"Rat-tat-tat-tat!" sounded upon the golden door.

"Who's there?" St. Peter demanded.

"Tis I, friend Peter—open the wicket."

The wicket opened, but closed immediately, not, however, without allowing to pass a cry of error, to which the devil responded with a shout of laughter.

"Ho, there!" he cried; "truly, Peter, you are stupid; do you think I have come to invade your paradise with a legion of evil spirits? No—listen to me."

As the wicket remained obstinately closed, the evil, who knew nevertheless that St. Peter was stening, resumed:

"Open it, I say; it is for a damned soul I come."

A damned soul in Paradise! Impossible! The evil was fooling him—he was too old to be mystified thus! What! he, St. Peter, allow a black bull to pass without suspecting it! And yet! Well, he had better open the wicket and see what the devil—he was too big to pass three gratings re upon the other—was talking about!

He opened a slit in the wicket.
